3089. Do you mean steam mills for grinding corn?—Yes, alongside whose wharves vessels go laden with corn, and they have lately taken upon themselves the prerogative of employing labourers to perform the privileged work of the porters, viz., in assisting the City meter in filling and striking the City bushel. I beg to refer the Honourable Commissioners to the evidence on this subject as given by corn merchants, millers, and granary keepers before the Select General Purposes Committee late inquiring into the privileges of meters, &c., as to the usefulness of the fellowship porters in corn ships and granary deliveries.

3090. The owners of the mills have themselves excluded the porters?—Yes.

3091. Under what right have they undertaken to exclude them?—I do not know by what particular right. They have assumed that power to themselves; the dock companies have done the same, and make a profit on the labour.

3092. Have the fellowship porters taken any steps to assert their right?—The fellowship porters petitioned the common council in the year 1847, calling their attention to the poverty brought upon the members generally in consequence of that portion of the employment being taken away from them, and praying the corporation to take the necessary steps for restitution thereon; but from that time to the present they have not had any assistance from the corporation.

3093. If the wages of the fellowship porters, fixed by the tariff, are scarcely remunerative, is it any object to them to extend the occasions on which they are employed?—I am not saying that the fellowship porters are not satisfied with their corporate tariff of wages, if they received them, which they do not, on corn labour. In the case of potatoes they are so; but the impression has gone abroad that the fellowship porters' earnings are excessive. It is not so; for under the best circumstances they are working no better than from hand to mouth.

3094. You do not find practically that the fellowship porters are better off than labouring men in the same class of life?—No; in many cases they are worse off; for instance, last Saturday, about half past two o'clock in the afternoon, I was myself on duty in Tower street; a meter applied to me for a man to go to Blackwall, saying he had fifty quarters of grain to measure and deliver into a craft. Those men had to pay 6*d.* each for the railway, 3*d.* each waterage, and when they got on board the vessel they measured but two quarters, which amounted to 5*d*, out of that they had to pay a half-penny shift, and then the 4½*d.* was to be divided among those six men.

3095. Is that a case of frequent occurrence?—Of hourly occurrence. Men go off from Tower Street, which is the principal place for labour; they go on board vessels to do the merchants' work, and come back frequently money out of pocket.

3096. It would seem from your statement that the present tariff of rates is not equitably adjusted?—It is not the corporate tariff of corn wages we complain of, but the extreme smallness of the majority of the jobs being debarred from going into the docks, where the large ones are done. The small jobs in the river, compared with the large ones, are as one to forty.

3097. If the trade were left open, and the parties made their own bargains in cases of that sort, do not you think matters would come right, and the porters would obtain sufficient payment?—I have no doubt but we should obtain proportionate prices for the jobs; but under existing circumstances the small ones do not pay at all.

3098. What is the advantage of keeping up this system of regulation? Would not it be better to allow parties to make their own bargains for themselves?—The advantage of a system is, in obtaining at all times prompt and careful men to perform the merchant work. As a large number of men would necessarily be required, a regulating power would, I think, be absolutely necessary. The corporation compelled us, in the first instance, to purchase our citizenship, if by redemption, and I paid 50*l.* I then paid 5*l.* on my admission into that company, with the impression on my mind that this was labour which the corporation were bound to maintain inviolate, having sold me a vested right therein. Instead of their performing their obligations to me and others, I find the corporation suffer the dock companies to take this labour away, and we are not compensated for the loss thereof.

3099. Are there many persons who have paid as much as 50*l.*?—Yes, many.

4000. Are there hundreds?—I should say there were a hundred; but still the whole of them were compelled to be citizens of London, and before 1835 they were compelled to belong to one of the trading companies, and must have paid very large sums of money to the corporation for their citizenship, whether they obtained it by patrimony or servitude. They have had to pay fees, and also a large sum of money has been paid to the Government in the way of stamp duties on their obtaining their freedom, and on each admission to the fellowship 2*l.* is paid to the Government as the duty on the bonds.

4001. What you complain of is, that the City has taken your money in the shape of redemptions and freedoms, and does not give you efficient protection by the assertion of your exclusive privileges?—Exactly so.

4002. You stated that the privilege of the fellowship porters is by prescription?—Yes.

4003. They form a corporation?—No. If they were, they could then sue in their own name for a restitution of privilege labour.

4004. Not by any grant or Act of Parliament?—Not directly to them.

4005. How comes it that the privilege goes beyond the limits of the City?—I cannot say. That is the limit which the Lord Mayor claims, from Yantlet Creek to Staines Bridge.

4006. The corporation has the conservancy of the Thames between those points; but you have nothing to do with the conservancy of the river, have you?—Nothing whatever.

4007. You claim your privilege as a trade privilege under the corporation?—Yes.

4008. How comes it then that your privilege goes beyond the limits of the City?—The City claim jurisdiction over the whole distance I have mentioned.

4009. You conceive that your privilege extends over the whole port of London from Staines to Yantlet Creek?—Yes.

4010. Do your men ever go up as far as Staines?—I cannot take upon myself to say that I ever knew a team of men to go up so high.

4011. Do they go down so far as Yantlet Creek?—I have known them go as far down as Gravesend; that is the lowest place I have known them go to.

4013. Your statement is, that the porters are only paid for the work actually done by them; but, whatever profit there is, accrues to the meter?—Yes; the porter is paid one penny for each peck of oysters he receives from the hold of the vessel and carries on shore. There are certain distances fixed, and for an excess of those distances he charges three halfpence a peck. The boats sometimes lie twenty bottoms out. The difficulty of purchasers getting their own goods must be very great, and attended with considerable danger. If it were left to any person who might be disposed to apply for labour, a great quantity of the goods would be lost. When the fellowship porters are employed, the salesman is perfectly satisfied, that as soon as the goods are in the porter's possession they will be delivered safe to the party who has purchased them; and if the goods by mistake should be put into the wrong cart, or anything of that sort should happen, the purchaser has nothing to do but to go to the Fellowship Porters' Hall, and the money is immediately paid for the loss.

4014. You say the privilege of the fellowship porters only extends to a limited class of articles. If a ship contain some articles to which the privilege applies, and certain other articles to which it does not apply, do the porters assist in landing the articles to which the privilege does not apply?—I can mention one instance, which is where a vessel comes up loaded with apples and eggs.

4015. What would be done in a case of that sort?—The porters claim the apple work; the egg work belongs to the wharfinger. They generally come to an arrangement thus: the fellowship porters' team is twenty men; the wharfinger will say, I will put on twenty men, but to prevent confusion, get the goods out just as you can lay hold of them. They mix them together, and do the best they can for the dispatch of business.

4017. Is it found in practice that no inconvenience arises from that sort of compromise?—None whatever. Some evidence has been given that we are excluded from the docks by clauses in the Dock Acts, but it is no such thing. The rights and privileges of the corporation of London are all reserved in each of the Acts. We are expressly mentioned as fellowship porters in the Commercial Dock Act; so we are in the Victoria Docks; and in all the Acts our rights are reserved to us as the rights of the Lord Mayor and commonalty of the City.

4018. You think the corporation might more effectually protect your privileges if they were disposed to do so?—I have no doubt of it; and I am borne out in that opinion by the opinion of counsel. The case has been laid before a barrister, and he is clearly of opinion that our rights might be enforced; but not being a corporate body ourselves, we are obliged to apply to the corporation to take the necessary proceedings for the establishment of the right.

4019. What do you think is the reason why the corporation show a reluctance to enforce your privilege?—My idea is that shareholders and parties who have the management of those various docks are in connexion with the corportion, and mixed up with them. And, on the other hand, I think the dock companies being very rich, the corporation does not like to commence a contention with them.

4021. Is your meaning this: that they got the work done more cheaply than you would have charged, but that they charged their clients your rates?—Yes.

4022. How came it that they were able to get the work done so much more cheaply than they would have got it done under your charges?—The corn vessels which go into the docks, which the majority of them do at the present time, when at work,—the jobs generally are what we term days' works,—such men as the dock companies employ will be induced to work cheaper than responsible practical men,—particularly as the dock labourer is not subject to the drawbacks and expenses entailed on the fellowship porter; besides, the dock companies afford them facilities for doing the labour with less men than we do.

4023. Then by the arrangements which the dock companies were able to make they got the work done cheaper than they would have paid if it had been done according to your rates?—They got the work done, but they charged the same amount to their customers.

4024. Supposing persons who are not in the docks, but on the quays of the river, had the same privilege which the dock companies have, do you think they could get the work done cheaper also?—I think not.

4025. What is the reason of the difference?—They could not, unless they were to adopt the same system that the dock companies do, of introducing machinery, so as to enable the men to work shorter handed than we do.

4026. You think that persons on the quays of the river have not the same advantages for economizing labour which the dock companies have?—They have not at present; at all events they have not with respect to corn labour.

4027. Have not your privileges rather a tendency to prevent those arrangements for economizing labour from being introduced?—I do not see that the privileges would in any way affect the delivery.

4028. You say in the docks, where your privileges do not interfere, means have been found of economizing labour, and getting it done at less charges than your tariff, would not a similar arrangement be made on the quays of the river if persons there had the same privilege?—No doubt they might. Another of our complaints against the corporation is this, that they have passed acts of council regulating our body, in which they have coerced us to make payments to officers of their appointing. Our principal corn shifter borrowed of the company 7,000*l.*, which the corporation compelled the company to lend him, to carry on his business as a corn shifter. He was appointed in 1827, and by the return he has made it appears that he has received the sum of 87,000*l.* out of the earnings of the porters from that branch of employment of corn labour. Although a portion of this sum has been paid over to the rulers of the company at different times, no effective provision is made for old members of the body.

4029. You say the corporation compelled you to lend this officer 7,000*l.*?—Yes, without interest, to carry on the business which they appointed him to do; and he has received, during the time he has been in the office, from the year 1827, the sum of 87,000*l.*

4030. How has he received that large sum?—This is what we term the counting-house department of the fellowship. The porters themselves do not receive the money immediately from their employers, but when they have done the job they make out an account, and they go to this man, who is called the corn shifter; he shifts the bill, and they have to deduct a penny from each shilling coming to them, and this has been the amount he has received from those pence taken out of the shillings.

4031. What was the ground on which the corporation required you to advance the sum of 7,000*l.* to this officer?—I can give no explanation of it.

4032. Did they make an order upon you to that effect?—They made an act of council in which they inserted a clause that the company should advance the shifter any sum he might require to carry on the business. He availed himself of that clause in the Act, and he had 7,000*l.* of the company's money for the purpose of carrying on his business.

4033. I suppose he employed that sum in providing an office and paying clerks?—He did, in the first instance, no doubt, use a portion of it for that purpose; but look at the inconsistency of the thing, for a man to be found that amount of capital without interest, and thereby enable him to realize a large annual income for his own advantage.

4034. Do not you suppose he spent the whole of this 7,000*l.* in the interest of the company in some way or other?—Not at all; he is indebted to the company for it. Whenever settlement day comes we shall expect him to repay it.

4035. It is still a subsisting debt on his part towards the company?—Yes. I believe he has given security for the money, and has repaid a part of it to the company. There is another complaint we have against the corporation, that in the case of the potato shifter, their principal meter, who purchased his situation some years ago, was appointed fruit shifter, and upon his returns made to this same inquiry in eleven years the amount averages 791*l.*, within a very small fraction, per annum. Out of that he pays 130*l.* to the court of rulers, making a profit of the rest. We contend that the corporation had no right to impose this officer upon us, but that this money ought to have been, under their direction, appropriated as a provision for the members of the company when old or worn out.

4036. The shifter is in fact a sort of cashier, who receives the payments from the importers?—Yes.

4038. How often are his accounts settled?—He gives in his account monthly to the court of rulers.

4039. I still do not quite understand your statement about the loan of 7,000*l.* Why was that made a loan? Why was not it a grant, if the shifter was bound to provide officers and clerks?—I cannot explain it, any further than this, that it is a clause in the act of council in 1822.

4040. What was the ground on which the clause was inserted?—I cannot say. It might have been upon this ground: previously to 1822 those shifts were farmed or leased; in 1822 they were to be leased no longer: they were to pay a certain portion of what they received over, retaining a certain amount themselves.

4041. He now collects everything upon your account?—Yes.

4043. So that you never knew before that time what the amount levied upon the public was?—No.

4044. Is there anything else which you wish to state?—I am not aware that there is anything else, except the general observation, that the body of the fellowship is not in that flourishing pecuniary state which the public is generally led to believe, nor do they receive those large sums for their labour which is supposed. The majority of them, at the present moment, and particularly that portion which follows the corn department of the labour exclusively, are in a state of comparative destitution. I could, if it was necesary, show what the men have received for years, and I could show that those men who follow the corn trade, even the best of them, do not now average a pound a week; and I could show that men who have been twenty-two years members of the body do not average more than fourteen or fifteen shillings a week.

4045. You consider in general the trade of the fellowship porters is a bad one, and their pay unremunerative?—The pay awarded to them by the corporatin would be remunerative if they had the whole of their legitimate employment.

4046. There is a fund, of course, belonging to the entire fellowship?—Yes.

4047. Is that fund in a flourishing condition, or is it rather low?—It is quite the reverse of flourishing; unfortunately the expenditure far exceeds the income; and this is another subject that we petitioned the corporation about in 1845, but to the present time we have not been able to get them to interfere in the matter. I have in my possession an official return of the references to the several corporate committees on various subjects, but I cannot find in this return any mention of those two petitions of which I have been speaking, viz., one for them to interfere as to the rights of labour, the other for an investigation into our pecuniary affairs, and for a superanuation fund to be established. I am therefore led to think that the corporation, as far as they are concerned, have burked or shelved them, or something of that sort. The body of the fellowship feel particularly dissatisfied in that respect. We also complain that the wages lately have been reduced, at the recommendation of two members of the corporation and their principal corn shifter, when that reduction was not asked for by one single member of the corn trade. We think, under these circumstances, that we have great reason to complain of the corporation's indifference and non-interference 4048. Do you consider that your fund is in fact insolvent?—We have to make the deficiency in the expenses good out of the stock. We shall be forced into insolvency if we go on in that way much longer.

4049. And the corporation do not interfere to give you any assistance in your difficulties?—No. We consider that if we have outlived our utility, which it does not appear that we have, the corporation ought to meet us fairly upon the question of compensation for the loss of the privilege labour which they have sold,* we having purchased the right to it of them, and therefore we expect it at their hands.

Adjourned to Friday next, at 12 o'clock.

* In 1807, the London Dock Company paid to Sir William Curtis, as governor of the ticket porters, the sum of 11,339*l.*, as a compensation for loss of privilege employment by a branch of that society.

Friday, 9th December 1853.

The Right Honourable HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

J. Lawrence, Esq.

9th Dec. 1853.

Joseph Lawrence, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4050. You are stockbroker in the City of London, are you not?—I am.

4051. How long have you been established in that capacity?—Many years; above twenty years.

4052. Is your business extensive?—It is.

4053. Have you a licence from the corporation of London?—I have; I am obliged to have one.

4054. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commission what is the system under which the business of the Stock Exchange is carried on in the City of London, so far as it relates to the Corporation?—The business of a stockbroker is strictly regulated by a committee of members of the Stock Exchange. They act under the most stringent regulations; each member on his admission to the Stock Exchange is obliged to find three securities, not only for pecuniary payment in case of default, but also as recommending him in point of character.

4055. How is that committee constituted?—It is selected from the oldest members of the Stock Exchange.

4056. They are all stockbrokers, are they?—Not necessarily stockbrokers; they are members of the Stock Exchange.

4057. Is that committee altogether unconnected with the corporation?—Entirely so, except as to the claim the corporation sets up to oblige every broker to take out a licence. A stockbroker is obliged to become a sworn broker of the city of London, previously to which they compel him to take out his freedom, and to give a bond, and subscribe to the regulations of the Court of Aldermen, a form of which I have here.

4058. What is the general purport of those regulations?—In the first place, he engages that he will only carry on his business during the pleasure of the Court of Aldermen; in the next place, that he will keep certain books in the form they prescribe. They are regulations but little differing from the rules and orders they prescribe to brokers in goods and merchandise. There are also other vexatious regulations, and some which are quite inconsistent either with the freedom of trade, the spirit of the age, or the position of the parties on whom they are imposed.

4059. Will you have the goodness to specify some of those regulations to which that observation applies, in your opinion?—In the first place, they require him to make stipulations which are quite impossible, under the present system of carrying on the business of the Stock Exchange. They require him, for instance, as is done in the case of brokers bargaining for goods, to give to both parties, the buyer and the seller, the names of the principals. Now this is impossible to be done in dealings on the Stock Exchange. They deal with a class of persons called jobbers, who are not the principals, and to whom the names of the principals are never given, and in fact would never be given. I may instance the case of purchases and sales made by the Government broker, or the broker for the Bank of England; it would be highly objectionable if he in every case stated to the jobbers the party for whom he was acting. The same observation applies in the case of bankers and others; therefore there is a regulation here which he enters into bond to fulfil which is entirely opposed to the mode of carrying on his business. I speak now not of any irregular practices on the Stock Exchange, not of anything that approaches to gambling business, but the regular mode of dealing on the Stock Exchange. There are clauses in the bond which the City compels him to subscribe which impose a penalty in such cases, never, it is true, exacted, because they have never proceeded upon such clauses.

4060. In point of fact, are those regulations altogether set aside?—They are perfectly in abeyance. I never knew an instance of any interference of the City, except to compel the payment of the rent or penalties.

4061. What is the amount of the payment?—The amount is indirectly very considerable. The amount of annual payment by each broker is 5*l.*; but, from the City claiming to regulate who shall be admitted as brokers, they oblige them to take up their freedom, involving considerable fees and expenses; and until very lately that freedom was refused to any except through the great trade companies, which led to a very considerable further expense. I applied to the proper office at Guildhall for a table of the fees. They declined giving me any information. All that is required is to follow their regulations. I could not find a record of the sum I paid, except that I found a cheque for 12*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* for fees to one office there; but one of my partners, Mr. Philip Cazenove, gave me this copy of his charges. He paid 18*l.* for town clerk's fees, 8*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* for chamberlain's fees, and 31*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* for taking up his freedom through the wheelwrights' company, which he selected as being the cheapest company. So that before he could act as a stockbroker he was obliged to pay 58*l.* 7*s.*, and to make himself a freeman of the company of wheelwrights, which of course involves the liability to serve the offices of a City company. Another of my partners, Mr. Charles Pearce, paid a still heavier sum for admission through the worshipful company of painters; and one consequence of this necessity of enrolling himself in a company before he could act as a stockbroker was that he afterwards underwent the office of master of the painters' company, at the very time that he was serving as Chairman of the Stock Exchange. From a third person, Mr. Francis Atkinson, a broker, I inquired the amount exacted from him by the corporation on his admission. He stated that he paid altogether 80*l.*, and he took up his freedom through the Coopers' company.

4062. At what time was that?—It was some time ago, before the regulation was passed which allowed a person to be a freeman without becoming a member of a trade company. Those large sums which for years have been collected have a bearing upon the origin of the claim of the corporation to levy any of these amounts. The annual charge, paid in advance on admission, and then yearly afterwards, is 5*l.* There are at present upon the published list more than 400 stockbrokers paying 5*l.* a year; so that there is a sum of 2,000*l.* a year levied without the smallest advantage to the public, inasmuch as the supervision by the Court of Aldermen is altogether nominal. The parties are required to enter into a bond of 1,000*l.* in their own name, and two sureties of 250*l.* each. Those are not inquired into. Any one who presents himself, with the fees, is taken. The only case in which I know of any inquiry having been made has been a recent one, in which the surety of the defaulters was found to be one of the waiters on the Stock Exchange. Independently of this, every member of the Stock Exchange has already provided an efficient security to the body of which he is a member, which surety goes to the payment of any loss that may be incurred by his creditors; whereas this is in the shape of a penalty to the City of London, and when recovered is appropriated by them.

4063. Are the Commissioners to understand that the present system affords no security to the public at all with respect to transactions on the Stock Exchange?—None at all, beyond that which is already provided by the committee of the Stock Exchange and the common law.

4064. The interference of the corporation in regard to the bond and the sureties they require, you say affords no protection nor security to the public at all?—I think not; I see none, inasmuch as if a perfect stranger applies,—a man who may the day before have been released as a fraudulent bankrupt,—if he goes with the fees in his hand, and presents himself with two housekeepers, who may be two 10*l.* householders, to sign his bond, he is admitted on the payment of the fees.

4065. No inquiry would be made into his previous character?—No.

4066. What is the practice with regard to the committee of the Stock Exchange?—There is a searching inquiry, inasmuch as the party applying must in the first place be recommended by a certain number of members of the Stock Exchange, who attend before the committee invariably to answer any inquiries respecting him, and the security given there is by members of the Stock Exchange, who are themselves known.

4067. To what amount is security given?—There are three sureties of 250*l.* each.

4068. In case of misconduct on the part of a stockbroker in the City of London, would the committee of the Stock Exchange have the power, and would they exercise that power, of preventing that stockbroker acting afterwards in that capacity?—They have most unlimited power. They act, not only as a court of law or even of equity, but as a court of honour. They have the power of expulsion for misconduct.

9th Dec. 1853.

4069. Supposing a broker had been thus expelled for misconduct by the committee and he still had the licence of the City of London to act as a broker, what would happen; could he still come upon the Stock Exchange, and defy them?—He could no longer be a member of the Stock Exchange, with a certificate of his respectability, but he might freely exercise his office as a broker elsewhere.

4070. Then he acts in the Rotunda, does not he?—He acts outside.

4071. In fact, the two sets of regulations do not clash?—They do not, except in the points regarding the mode of carrying on the trade which I have pointed out.

4072. The Stock Exchange regulations are superadded to the others?—They are much more stringent, and they are constantly in operation; whereas I never heard of a case, except the case of some public default or misconduct, which was investigated by the Court of Aldermen, and in those cases anything like redress from the friends of the party has already been exhausted by the Stock Exchange.

4073. In speaking of the City jurisdiction over stockbrokers, you use the expression jurisdiction which they claim to have. Is there any doubt upon the legality of that claim?—I shall take the liberty of pointing out to you grounds upon which there is very considerable doubt, inasmuch as I should contend that the persons now exercising the office of stockbroker do not come within the meaning of the term "broker" as defined, and clearly defined, in the Statute of the 6th of Anne, which is the only Statute under which the City can claim those payments. The Statute of the 6th of Anne is a simple and short Act of Parliament, reciting, "Whereas the old Statute of James the First. " providing for the well garbling of spices in the City of London, hath been made use of " to vex the citizens by threatening prosecutions by common informers, and therefore " this office of garbler of spices should be abolished." This was the sole preamble of the Act. I find by the debates in Parliament, on the discussion of it on the third reading, through the influence of three aldermen who were in the House, and on the committee, a rider was added to the Bill, providing compensation to the City for those fees (which they rented to one William Stuart) of 300*l.* a year. For the loss or abolition they were to be compensated by the payment of 40*s.* a year, and a penalty of 25*l.* in default of that payment, from every broker in the City of London. There the business of a broker is defined to be that of contriving and making bargains between merchants English and merchants foreign in goods, wares, and merchandises, and the said brokers are to be men recommended by at least six of their own trade and mystery as men of integrity and experience, and well skilled in the trade and mystery which they follow. From those so recommended by six persons of their own trade the Court of Aldermen were to select the brokers, so that they were in fact a kind of valuators or compensation jury, acting for both parties, equally for both buyer and seller, evidently for the sake of protecting foreigners in their dealings with the English merchants and tradesmen. Now the stockbroker is really only employed by one party; he is in fact the attorney of the banker or person who employs him; he has no duty at all towards the other party; he is not at all the same character or description of person as those here described under the name of brokers in the City of London; and though the amount of annual payment has been increased from 40*s.* to 5*l.*, and the penalty from 25*l.* to 100*l.* by a subsequent Act, the 57th of George the Third, still it refers only to the same class of persons acting as brokers as are recited in the Act of the 6th of Anne; and therefore I should feel that I am warranted in arguing that the stockbroker of the present day, dealing in Government annuities, a species of property that was not even in existence at the time of the passing of the Act of Anne in the year 1707, cannot be said to come under the description of one dealing in goods, wares, and merchandises. I need not say that a penal Act must be construed strictly, and not enlarged to include a different class of persons than its language describes I am aware it is somewhat presumptuous to speak of the legality of a conviction under this Act, since there has been a decision of the Court of King's Bench on the subject, in the case of Clarke v. Powell. There the Court of King's Bench decided under this Act the broker was liable to penalties. That case I have here reported. But besides that I know personally Mr. Powell was one of the most respectable men on the Stock Exchange. He had been thirty-six years acting as a stockbroker without any interference. He had a great dislike to taking upon himself any of the City offices, and was never a freeman. A person came into his office, and requested him to buy 50*l.* of Government Reduced Stock. He said he was a stranger to him, and he had better go to some one about the Bank. He said, "I am afraid of being cheated. I wish to come to a person I know." He purchased them for him. This person was an informer, and the next day he laid an information against him. He defended the case. It was decided against him in the Court of King's Bench, and he told me he paid 1,200*l.* for penalties and the law expenses; the expenses being of course swelled by the enormous fees of the City solicitor, the remembrancer, and the law officers of the City.

4074. When was that case decided?—About ten years ago.

4075. Was the prosecution instituted by the City?—Yes, in the name of Mr. Clark, who was the chamberlain, on the information of an informer whom he employed for this purpose. It is rather remarkable that the very Act of the 6th of Anne is stated to be brought in to put a stop to vexatious proceedings of the corporation against the citizens through common informers, under that old Act, as to the garbling of spices, and yet it is the very course which is now pursued under the substituted provision. Whatever opinions may have been entertained on the law of the question, after such a decision, accompanied by such a mulct as 1,200*l.* for fine and expenses, it is very natural that most persons have preferred submitting to a burdensome exaction to defending themselves, or trying the case again; but I should think it is a question of doubtful legality.

4076. What is the date of the City regulations on the subject of stockbrokers?—They have varied the regulations; but the authority dates from the 6th of Anne. I presume they have kept to the old form.

4077. What is the date of the institution of the committee of the Stock Exchange?—It is about fifty years ago. The brokers used to meet before at a coffee house. There is another very strong point on this subject in confirmation of the view that the terms of the Act must be strictly adhered to, that in the subsequent Acts, as in the 8th and 9th of William III., when enactments were made which were intended to include other persons than the brokers so designated, additional words were introduced into the Act, and they were described as brokers and "stockjobbers." They were two Acts of a very penal nature; they are no longer on the statute book; but still it confirms the view, that if the legislature had intended to enlarge the description of the parties they would have used terms wide enough to designate them. I wish just to show that the pretext, if I may use the term, or the object, of levying those sums, is simply stated to be to provide a compensation to the City for abolishing the office of garbler of spices, which was rented by them at 300*l.* a year; and afterwards there was a similar compensation for the abolition of the office of gauger of liquors in the City of London, which was found to be not only useless but mischievous. The object of this provision was compensation for the abolition of those two offices. Now we see that one class of brokers only, namely, the stockbrokers, pay annually above 2,000*l.* a year, and, taking the fees exacted from them on their admission at the very low average of 30*l.* each, there has been no less than 12,000*l.* levied from them in fees; yet still, 150 years after the abolition of this office of 300*l.* a year of garbler of spices, when the object of providing compensation must have been satisfied a century ago, the corporation continue to levy the fines and penalties.

4078. The object of the legislature in creating this system was not to give any protection to the public in respect to the dealings on the Stock Exchange, but to provide a compensation to the City for certain abolished offices?—Strictly so, as stated in the preamble of the Bill.

4079. According to your view, that object has long since been satisfied?—Evidently, from a calculation of the amount, which is now enormous.

4080. Under the present system, however, there would be no fees for admission to the office of broker by the City, would there, except the 5*l.*?—Yes.

4081. It is no longer necessary to be enrolled as a member of a company?—No; but you must become a freeman, and there is a very heavy list of fees payable on becoming so.

4082. The fees for admission as a freeman of the City of London must be still paid?—Yes; they will not entertain the application of a person to be admitted as a swornbroker till he shall have made himself a freeman of the City of London.

4083. Which now costs about six guineas, does it not?—It cost me twelve guineas. It may perhaps be reduced. There is no table of fees in the office of the remembrancer, otherwise I would have produced the actual amount.

4084. Can you state whether at the present time, and for some years past, in mercantile transactions in London, it is still the case that there is one broker between the parties; is not there a broker for each party?—It is not always so. A broker employed by one merchant to purchase goods may buy them at a public auction without the intervention of a broker. He is employed to make a purchase or sale. On the Stock Exchange the broker's duty is only to one party; he owes no duty to the other party, and therefore he does not come within the denomination of those who are to be so selected.

4085. In mercantile transactions between the buyer and seller there are frequently two brokers, are there not, one for each party?—It is frequently the case. The brokers of the present day, I contend, are not the class of persons who were intended to be described in the 6th of Anne. In fact I should take the liberty of contending, that if the stockbroker had only called himself a stock factor or stock agent, as there are corn factors and hop factors, and agents for the purchase and sale of land, the City would never have had a pretext for calling upon the stockbrokers to take out their freedom.

4086. Would not it appear that your observations apply more or less to all brokers, as well as to stockbrokers?—More or less so. I stated at the commencement that I could give no information, except as to the particular branch of business to which I belong. But there is also a distinction; the case of the stockbrokers is stronger, because the dealing in goods, wares, and merchandise, which might be made to apply to others, cannot apply to them.

4087. Is there any other point to which you desire to call the attention of the Commission?—Having pointed out what I still consider the doubtful legality of the authority under which this payment is levied, and the burdensome nature of the incidental fees and charges which are thrown upon the brokers, I may state that there is in the bond much which is objectionable, as interfering with the freedom of trade, and much which is utterly degrading. Fancy, for instance, Mr. Capel and Mr. Norbury, the agents of the great banking houses of Coutts and Drummond, or Mr. Mullins, the agent of the Bank of England and the Government, forced to sign an engagement that they will only carry on their business during the pleasure of the Court of Aldermen. And more than that, those persons are not allowed to exercise a lawful calling till they promise to carry about with them a badge, with their name and number upon it, and engage to produce it whenever they are required. Men of education, intelligence, and wealth are by the Court of Aldermen subjected to a positive engagement to carry about badges, with their names and numbers, and produce them to any one who asks for it, like a cabman on the stand.

9th Dec. 1853.

4088. In point of fact, the pleasure of the aldermen is never exercised to suspend them, is it; and they are never called on to produce their ticket?—The engagement is nevertheless very stringent. They are called on to sign that engagement, and many of them feel it to be a great hardship; and there are many whose consciences even have been grievously offended by some of the clauses in this bond, which they find themselves unable to fulfil.

4089. Do they undertake to observe the regulations, or merely to submit to the penalty in case it should be exacted?—Formerly the City exacted an oath which included all these regulations; but that was found to be so objectionable that they have separated them, and the oath now is merely that they shall perform justly the duties of their office. Persons of course have less objection to sign a bond that they will pay the penalty; but every person not producing his badge when called on is really liable to this penalty of 1,000*l*.

4090. Supposing a sum of money deposited in the hands of a broker for the purpose of purchasing stock were appropriated by him to his own use, of course the bond to the City would be forfeited, would not it?—It would.

4091. And the bond to the Stock Exchange committee?—No doubt.

4092. Suppose you proceed against the sureties under the City bond, the penalty would be taken for the use of the City?—Quite so.

4093. On a recent occasion, some member of the Stock Exchange committed a fraud of that kind; it is said many applications were made to the City authorities to issue a warrant. If they had any authority to issue a warrant, I suppose it would be quite independent of any of those bonds?—No doubt it would. In that case the parties applied to the Court of Aldermen; but already the committee of the Stock Exchange had taken very prompt measures, and had handed over to the parties suffering all the money collected from the sureties.

The Rev. C. B. Dalton, M.A.

The Rev. CHARLES B. DALTON, M.A., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4094. You are rector of Lambeth?—I am.

4095. I believe there are some points connected with the conservancy of the River Thames, and its effect upon a part of your parish, upon which you are able to make a statement to the Commission?—I attended here in consequence of being summoned.

4096. Are the banks of the Thames adjoining the parish of Lambeth in good repair?—They are, but they are not high enough; we suffer very much from floods.

4097. Do floods frequently occur?—Whenever we have high tides the water overflows the banks and damages the property.

4098. Are there many dwellings of the poorer classes affected in that manner?—There are.

4099. Can you state what the number is?—From the Archbishop's Palace to Vauxhall Bridge there are a great many. The residences of the poor, however, do not always abut upon the river; there are several large wharfs and boat builders' premises; but the dwellings of the poor are just above them, and when the water overflows the banks it comes into their dwellings. At the spring tide which is just passing away the water overflowed the banks, and injured the property of the barge builders, and considerably injured the residences of the poorer classes. Occasionally the misery caused is very great. Two years ago there was a very high tide, and the misery to the poor was extremely great; so great that we were obliged to have a public subscription, and it cost a considerable sum to pump the water out of their rooms.

4100. Has any representation been made to the corporation of the City of London on the subject?—No. I am not aware that the corporation have anything to do with it. Mr. Edwards' statement I understand to be this, that none of this inconvenience took place before old London Bridge was removed, and that it is caused by the greater freedom of the water coming up through London Bridge. Since I received the letter from the secretary to the Commission, I have made a great deal of inquiry of the watermen on the river, and I am told that before London Bridge was built this did not take place. The City of London, I believe, are not responsible for repairing the banks of the Thames; but, as they built London Bridge, it is argued that it was their duty, before they did so, to take care to require the holders of property to raise the banks, and provide for the consequences which would ensue.

4101. On taking down old London Bridge, which operated as a dam, you think they ought to have guarded against the consequential damage of the alteration?—That is the argument that is used.

4102. Has the City of London never done anything to repair the banks of the river in the parish of Lambeth?—Not that I am aware of; there is no doubt that the misery to the poor, and the injury to property, is very great; and the second point, it is equally clear that it did not take place before London Bridge was built. Those higher tides to which I refer do not happen frequently. There was one about two years ago.

4103. Do you happen to know whether it would be attended with great difficulty or expense adequately to protect Lambeth against the effect of those tides?—I think so. I am told that a Bill is proposed to be brought into Parliament to embank the Thames the whole way from Lambeth Church to London Bridge. The holders of property say that their places were built before new London Bridge was built, and had they been aware that the tide would ever have come up as high as it does now they would have built them higher. Every one on the spot tells me that formerly the tide did not go down nearly so far in the middle of the river, and did not come up so high as it does now. The water runs over close by Lambeth Church. The idea would naturally be, that it comes up over the bank; but I believe the real fact is that it comes up through a sewer which is there. I believe the banks of the Thames in Lambeth belong to the lord of the manor and the owners of property, though they cannot drive a pile into the river without the permission of the City.

Mr. E. Beck.

4104. Is there anything which you wish to add to the evidence you gave on the previous occasion?—When I gave evidence before the Commission on Friday last, in the apprehension that I must be very brief, I omitted much that I intended to have said; and having made a slight mistake, although of little importance, I will, with permission, substitute my present evidence for the former. The existing rules and regulations for the watermen's company are felt by others and myself to be very oppressive. First, as to the origin of the laws for regulating the watermen and lightermen of the river. An Act was passed in 4th and 5th years of Queen Anne, called "An Act for the the reign of en- "couragement and increase of seamen, and for the better and speedier manning Her Majesty's "fleet." It would therefore appear this Act was passed for the object of supplying the navy in cases of emergency, and that watermen were at all times liable to serve; and in case of refusal they would be deprived of the benefits as free watermen. The before-mentioned Act, with others, were, by an Act passed in the 7th and 8th George IV. chapter 75, called "An Act for the better regulation of the watermen on the River Thames between Yantlet "Creek and Windsor," repealed, or consolidated into this Act of George IV., and by section 57 the Court of Mayor and Aldermen were empowered to make byelaws for the government and regulation of the freemen of the company of watermen, and therefore the watermen's company are not, as supposed by many, independent of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London. Secondly, to become free waterman a person must serve seven years' apprenticeship to a free waterman, or the widow of a free waterman; and by section 11 of the byelaws, dated the 2d of April 1828, made in pursuance of the last-mentioned Act of Parliament, it is expressly stated that apprentices shall not be employed to work at any business than as a waterman or lighterman during the term of his apprenticeship; and by section 15, after some byelaws, it is ordered that no apprentice shall depart from his master or mistress's service, unless impressed into His Majesty's service; but such apprentice may serve on board any merchantman, by the consent of his master or mistress, if he has been in his other employ for two years; and during the time of his serving on board of any merchantman, or in His Majesty's service, his wages shall belong to and be paid to his master or mistress. It is generally supposed that these Acts and byelaws were made to insure a requisite number of skilful watermen and lightermen; but it will be seen by section 101 of the Watermen's Act it does not extend to any western barges; and that all flat-bottomed boats and barges, navigated from the town of Kingston in Surrey, or place or places beyond the said town, should be deemed western barges, and shall and may be navigable on the said river as far as London Bridge. And also these laws do not apply to barges or vessels trading without the limits of the corporation; nor do they interfere with the Trinity House of Deptford Strand, save as to the prices or fares, which are to be the same. These sll show that an apprenticeship is not necessary to ensure skill and ability in watermen and lightermen. The same laws and regulations apply to barge owners. None but freemen are allowed to carry goods upon hire or reward for other persons. The working of the monopoly thus created I can best exemplify by my own position; premising, that whilst I cite it I do so, not on private grounds alone, but upon the same principle that the abolition of the East India Company's charter and the Corn Laws have been advocated, and feeling satisfied in my own mind that it will tend to the advantage of all those who think themselves benefited by the present restrictions. After being at sea many years, and trading to all parts of the globe, I settled at Isleworth, where I have a large wharf, but to which there was then no established business. It never occurred to me that I could not employ my capital in working barges for carrying goods upon the river for any one who thought proper to employ me. But I found that, not having been apprenticed to a free waterman, I could not do so without employing another person who was in that position. I did not find the plan to answer, and was glad to give it up when the other branches of my business allowed me to do so. I continued to employ the free waterman for some time longer

to carry my own goods, but from the trouble I had with the men employed by him I took the earliest opportunity, when my business allowed, to build a craft of my own, for which I obtained a licence from the Watermen's Hall, which enables me to do my own lighterage only, but which does not permit me to carry for others. This restriction I consider a great hardship, for it often happens that I could get a freight down for my barges for other persons, whereas they regularly go down empty, except upon rare occasions, when, by mutual accommodation, I carry down small quantities for a friend. But I feel there ought to be no restrictions enforced by the before-mentioned rules and byelaws, in these days of almost unrestricted commercial freedom. The before-mentioned laws regulating the apprenticeship, as well as those affecting barge owners, are easily and constantly evaded; the former by binding a boy to a free waterman for the sake of obtaining the privileges, who hardly shows himself on board a barge, and can never be capable of managing one; and the latter by purchasing the use of the number and name of the widow of a free waterman. Instances of both evasions are under my daily observation. The byelaws also expressly forbid the employment of men or boys in barges who are not free watermen or apprentices; yet this is continually done. There are many men who have been employed upon the river and in barges for many years, but who, from want of friends to get them bound apprentice when young, although perfectly capable, and whom I would trust with my craft without hesitation, are obliged to turn their hands to other means of living, or put up with occasional employment at small wages. This appears a great hardship upon such people. Barge owners would gladly have the number of such men and also apprentices increased, to break down the monopoly of the free watermen; though many of them are adverse to throwing open the lighterage business altogether. Some that I have spoken to, both masters and men, are indifferent to the subject. I find I unintentionally committed an error in saying that I was not at liberty to carry lime from the Medway upon hire. At that time I was under a misapprehension as to the limits of the jurisdiction of the watermen's company. The absurdity of the restrictions alluded to I will endeavour to show. Not far from my place of business resides a gentleman, who is a coal owner in the north. If he hires my vessel to bring him a freight of coals from the colliery, my crew may bring her up the river opposite to his house without the aid of a free waterman, and without let or hindrance; but if it happened from any circumstance, such as want of sufficient water to go close to his premises, that it became necessary to take any of her cargo out, then I must not use my barge for that purpose, but must employ the barge of one that is a freeman. Whilst upon this subject I may just add, as bearing upon the question before the Commission, that when I bring a cargo of coals to my own wharf, direct from the collieries, my men must not unload them in the manner customary in the port of London called whipping, but they are obliged to carry them out on their backs in sacks or baskets. As to the conservancy of the river, there are numerous shoals. Isleworth is a place of great trade; but either for want of money being expended in the river, in clearing away those shoals by soil accumulating, we have not a free passage. As to the amount of trade which is done at the adjoining wharf and my own, I may state as much as 25,000 tons come up to our wharfs during the year; but sometimes it happens, on account of the shallowness of the river, we are obliged to go to considerable expense in rigging out a kind of landing way, over which the goods are brought on shore. I should wish to say of Mr. Leach, the gentleman who acts for the City in our neighbourhood, that I have always found him most accommodating, and ready to do everything he can; but for want of funds I suppose he cannot do what is necessary. I cannot see why the City, as conservators of the Thames, are not bound to have cleared away the obstructions offered by Putney and Battersea bridges. They are of so narrow a character that they to a considerable extent impede the navigation, and subject barge owners occasionally to a loss, by their vessels running against them, under the most skilful management. We pay City toll 2½d. per ton to Isleworth. I consider the duties of the conservancy of the river have been inefficiently performed by the corporation, and that it is not suitable that the City should have the charge of the conservancy of the river, because those who sit upon that conservancy committee can hardly, I should think, be acquainted with the subject. In conclusion, I would suggest that the carrying trade upon the river should be thrown entirely open; that the system of free watermen should be abolished; that bargemen should be registered in a similar manner to seamen. Barge owners, as carriers, are responsible for goods committed to their care; and they would be foolish indeed who employed incompetent men. I do not think it would injure the sober, honest, and industrious watermen at all. I think it would tend greatly to improve the character of the watermen. I hear many complaints of their conduct from barge owners, but personally I have none to make, having two excellent men in charge of my own barges. Observation confirms me in the opinion that monopolies of all kinds are not favourable to the development of energy and skill. As to the conservancy of the Thames, I would place it under no existing branch of the Government machinery. I should recommend a separate and permanent establishment, with district boards working under its orders. I conceive that under such a board the river would soon assume a different character for depth of water, &c. It is the natural communication with the interior, and might be made available for the passage of vessels of at least 200 tons burden. Such a board should compel owners of property to maintain it, and not allow it to waste into the river for want of embankment. The wash of the steamboats is carrying away, year by year, portions of islands into the Thames, which should be prevented. The tolls levied, and to which I alluded before, are partly applied to maintaining the towing paths.

4105. How do you propose that the board to superintend the conservancy of the river shall be appointed?—By the Government, from men well acquainted with the subject.

4106. Do you propose that any member of it should be elected by the corporation, or that it should be exclusively composed of members appointed by the Crown?—I would let the corporation have nothing whatever to with it.

4107. Nor the citizens?—Nor the citizens. I may just add, which I think an important thing, and which I omitted in my last evidence, that I consider the present regulations are exceedingly oppressive upon many honest, industrious, and deserving and able men, who, because they had not an opportunity of being bound apprentices when they were quite young, have lost all the advantages of free watermen, though certainly with respect to some of them I should be quite ready to put my property under their charge directly.

4109. Sea-going vessels?—Yes; sea-going vessels, which can get under all the bridges at certain times of the tide, with the exception of Battersea and Putney bridges, which are too narrow to admit them. I believe we have those very great floods in the Thames now which have been spoken to from the admirable system of drainage which is carried out in all our agricultural districts. No sooner do we have a heavy fall of rain than it is evidenced in the water directly. The water, instead of hanging in the land, as it used to do, comes down the ditches into the Thames, and we see it immediately.

Mr. G. C. Ashley.

Mr. George Crowley Ashley, having affirmed, was examined as follows.

4110. Where do you reside?—I reside at Isleworth.

4111. What business do you carry on?—I am a roman cement manufacturer.

4112. Are you in that capacity affected by the regulations with regard to watermen upon the River Thames?—Very seriously.

4113. Have you heard Mr. Beck's evidence?—I have.

4114. Do you take the same view that he does of the system pursued?—Fully.

4115. Have you been ever subject to any penalties for the infringement of the laws of watermen's company?—Yes.

4116. Under what circumstances?—In August 1850 I was summoned to the Mansion House, and fined 2*l*., and 2*s*. for expenses of the summons. The "case" was this: I had a barge in London. The captain of the barge came on shore to me for orders, leaving three other persons on board the barge. Either one of two of them I should have been quite satisfied to have trusted with the barge. The barge was moved away from Lambeth about a mile down the river. She had only about five tons of goods in then. It seems there was an informer, who saw this, and he immediately rowed on board, and took the command of the barge,. Almost immediately afterwards the captain arrived, and found this man in possession. The reason I was fined was, neither of the parties on board the barge were free watermen or apprentices to the water, though either one of two of them I would readily have trusted under similar circumstances with any amount of property.

4117. The captain's absence for a very short period was sufficient to render you liable to the penalty?—Yes. If the captain had been on board, although in his cabin asleep, I could not have been fined. The waterman who laid the information was a man from Kingston, who, I understood, got his living principally by this means.

4118. Are you in the habit of bringing canal boats down to your wharf?—For many years a considerable portion of my business has been carried on along the line of the Grand Junction Canal. My factory is about a mile higher up the river than the entrance of the Grand Junction Canal into the Thames. I load and employ the boats which travel on the canal to take my goods up the canal. The parties who have the management of those boats dare not move their boats one yard on the River Thames without a "free waterman." It happens generally that those boats which are called monkey boats travel in pairs on the river, and the law, as it now exists, requires that there must be two watermen to the two boats, though actually moving as one boat. In only two of the contracts which I had upon the line of that canal, I see I paid those useless watermen 124*l*. I have not paid much less than 1,000*l*. these last fifteen years for those watermen. I will cite one case in which I was a serious loser. Most of those watermen who look out for those jobs are not men of regular employ, but generally lazy characters, but have the "privilege of being free watermen," by which privilege they get those jobs, and come up to us with these canal boats. While the boat is being loaded they have nothing to do, and frequently get intoxicated. In one case a drunken man of this class ran a boat ashore, at a loss of 60*l.* to me, and I believe at least 40*l.* to the owner of the boat.

4119. When a waterman comes into your boat, does he take the command of it, or does he stand there, and let your people navigate it?—They have nothing to do. The tide takes up and brings back the boat, the master of the boat himself steering. I generally profess to keep a spare barge by me for emergencies, and it frequently happens, on receiving pressing orders, that I have had this barge loaded, hoping to get a "free waterman' (being obliged to do so by the present law) to take her away. The result has been in many cases that I have not been able to obtain a "free waterman" in my own village, or the neighbouring one, although at the same time I have had men in my employ, and there have been others in the village out of employ, infinitely more capable of taking this barge away than one half of the free watermen are. The result of the law is, that I dare not put any of those men on board to navigate her, and consequently I have sometimes been unable to send the barge away for a day or two, to my inconvenience and loss. As to the efficiency of those watermen, I may state that one man (who is now in our employ for want of a better) in broad daylight one afternoon ran one of my barges into Kew Bridge, which is one of the easiest bridges to pass through on the river. The barge was sunk. I lost 120*l.*, but I had no source for recompense.

4120. Are you aware of any benefit whatever which arises from the system of free watermen?—None whatever. I have now a man in my employ, a steady respectable young man, who from his childhood has been continually working on the water. I would rather trust him with 1,000*l.* of my property than eight out of ten of the free watermen; but on account of the existing law I dare not put him into a barge to navigate her.

4121. You would throw the trade completely open?—Entirely.

4122. You think it would not be necessary to substitute any system in the nature of police in any manner to protect the public against the risk of negligence or inefficiency of the watermen?—It is just the same in principle as applies to a man driving a horse and cart. If I trust a man to drive a horse and cart for me who is inexperienced and incompetent, it is at my own peril and risk of loss. If we could obtain any redress for the injuries which those free watermen from carelessness or inefficiency do us it would be a different thing, but we cannot.

4123. In the case of boats that ply for hire, wherries, and such like, though it can be easily imagined that a gentleman in your situation can form a judgment upon the fitness of the persons you employ in your trade, yet the general public might not be able to do so. Do you think it would be safe to throw the trade open, and let any body who pleased ply for hire in that way?—I think with respect to those who ply in "pleasure" boats there should be some stringent regulations.

4124. You would have some system of regulation in reference to those boats, but in regard to the trade carried on in barges, and so on, you would leave that entirely open?—Just so.

4125. Just as there is a distinction on land between cabmen and persons who drive waggons, and are used to trade of that description?—Yes; where the lives of the public may be placed in danger it is of course necessary to have efficient persons. Much more danger is experienced in plying in those little pleasure boats than by navigating barges. To show the absurdity of the existing system, I may observe that I have for many years annually had about 15,000 tons of stone brought up to my factory in larger barges than any of those used upon the river about here from Harwich; but no free watermen, even by the present law, are required in these cases.

4126. That is because they load beyond the limits of the City conservancy?—That is the only reason.

Mr. W. B. Billett.

Mr. William Bartholomew Billett, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4127. In what capacity do you appear before this Commission?—I am the senior churchwarden of the parish of St. Pancras, and I have the honour of appearing before the Commission in consequence of a resolution that was passed by the representative vestry, in which they express the opinion that they would like to have a corporation for the parish of St. Pancras alone.

4128. Have you the resolution with you?—I have.

4129. Will you have the goodness to read it?—"At a general meeting of the vestrymen "of the parish of St. Pancras, held at the Vestry Rooms, King's Road, Pancras Road, on "Wednesday the 7th day of December 1853, William Billett, Esquire, churchwarden, in "the chair, and forty-nine other vestrymen present. A report from the committee of "vestrymen appointed to co-operate with the other metropolitan parishes, and give such "evidence as may be advisable before the Royal Commission now sitting to inquire into "the management of the corporation of the City of London, was presented, received, and "entered on the vestry minutes on the 30th ultimo. It was moved and seconded, That "the report be adopted, and that Mr. Churchwarden Billett be requested to present and "support the same before the Royal Commission appointed on the City corporation. "Whereupon an amendment was moved and seconded, That the report be adopted, with "the exception of that portion which asks for a municipality for the parish of St. Pancras

" alone, and the words 'the corporation of the borough in its integrity' be recommended. Mr. W. B. Billett
" The amendment was put from the chair and negatived, the numbers being for the " amendment four, against it thirty-three. The original motion was put and carried una- 9th Dec. 1853
" nimously." I will, with the permission of the Commissioners, read the report which was presented to the vestry. " The committee appointed to co-operate with the other metro-
" politan parishes, and give such evidence as may be advisable before the Royal Commis" sion now sitting to inquire into the management of the corporation of the City of " London, report, That they have met, and directed certain statistical returns to be made
" to them by the clerk as the basis for their examination. They recommend to the vestry
" that the committee should be instructed to support a separate municipality for the " parish of St. Pancras, with a portion of its members to be deputed from each metro" politan corporation to form a central body for the management of the main sewers,
" police, &c.; and also to recommend that the corporation should be created by Act of " Parliament or by Royal Charter, without the expense and trouble of an application as " required by the present law, and that such Act should include the transfer to the " municipal body of the powers now vested under several private Acts in the hands of the " different self-elected paving boards, and with authority for the other boards, if they shall
" so please, to transfer their powers to that body."

4130. Is there any statement which you are desirous of making, in addition to those resolutions?—I should be glad to state the reasons why the parish desires an incorporation. They are fully alive to the advantage they enjoy from their present local privileges; but they conceive, from the peculiar position in which the parish is placed, they would be better off if they had a corporation, that is, if any share were accorded to them in the management of the police. At present we pay more than one fourth of the entire rental from the parish for the maintenance of the police, and as far as we can learn, after inquiry, there are only 194 policemen in the parish. If we had a voice in their management, we conceive we should be enabled to get fifty per cent. more men at twenty-five per cent. less cost. There is a great dissatisfaction felt throughout the entire parish as to the management of the sewers. In our parish there are several open ditches, and in addition to that we find that a number of streets have no sewers at all. In others, where they have sewers, they have been so badly contrived that the sewers are above the drains. There is a sanatory committee sitting at St. Pancras, and it has been given in evidence that where parties have called upon them to remove cesspools they have said, " We have done so,
" and we have made a drain, but that drain is converted into a cesspool, because it is
" below the sewer itself." We find this being the case, that, according to a return presented to the House of Commons in 1850, the cost, under the head of " Work done, from November 1847 to January 1849, amounted to 107,293*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*, and that the cost of managing, surveying, experiments, &c., amounted in the same period to 57,270*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, which was more than half the entire expenditure. The parish conceive if they had a fair voice in the matter they would be able to get a little less science, perhaps, but more common sense, and it could be done at very considerably less than it now costs them. Last year we paid 18,000*l.* upon a 6*d.* rate, and, as far as we can gather, not one sixth of that has been laid out in the entire parish. With respect to the county rate, it costs us upwards of 8,000*l.* annually, and we have been, till recently, badly served with magistrates. If we require the presence of a magistrate to sign orders of removal of lunatics, and so on, we have great difficulty in getting one to attend, and great loss has accrued to the parish in consequence; and when we have had them, we have been charged with their cab-hire. One of them said lately openly in vestry, that complaints had been made of the cab-hire, and he begged to say it was quite optional whether he came or not. We find that is the case, and it is not necessary that the magistrate should reside in the parish. It costs us 4,300*l.* for lunatics, or 8*s.* 2*d.* a head per week at the county asylum, and 11*s.* 9*d.* at the private asylums, while the cost of our adult paupers in our workhouse is 4*s.* 4*d.* a head per week. If we had any voice in that there would be a considerable saving effected to the rate-payers. Then we complain of the paving of the parish. There are between four and five miles, portions of the parish, covered with houses, unpaved and unlighted. Those are in a very distressing state. There is an accumulation of filth, and in many places the roads are quite impassable, except in fine weather.

4131. To what part of the parish do you refer?—To that part of the parish running from the workhouse up to Battle Bridge. Then there is another portion going to the north, called Agar Town. Also Holmes' Estate, and another portion not comprehended in any paving estate, which is nearly opposite Battle Bridge. The whole of that is now covered with houses. An application was made to the commissioners of the Calthorpe estate, that they would take in that portion which lies on the northern side. They consented to take in two streets, namely, Swinton Street and Acton Street, but they refused to take in the rest of this property, because it would not pay them. Therefore it remains at this moment in a state that is very prejudicial to health, and very injurious to the owners of the property. I need hardly tell the Commissioners with regard to Agar Town, as Mr. Cooper gave evidence upon this head last week. In 1840 the commissioners of the Kentish Town estate, then applying for their Act of Parliament, were solicited by the parochial authorities to take in Agar Town, but they refused, because it would not pay them. Then, in the New Road, the most populous thoroughfare leading out of

London, there is a short distance, not half a mile, which has no less than five paving commissions upon it under five different managements.

4132. Your complaint is, of the effect produced upon the parish by the management of those departments being distributed over various properties, and their not being managed as a whole upon a good system?—Yes; it is injurious, not only to the parishioners, but to the owners of property throughout the entire parish, and in many cases has been the means of preventing a better class of houses being erected.

W. Pritchard, Esq.

WILLIAM PRITCHARD, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4133. In what capacity do you appear before the Commission?—As high bailiff of Southwark, commissioned to present to this Commission the resolutions of a public meeting called on the 25th of November last.

4134. Will you have the goodness to read them?—The requisition presented to me was signed by a great many respectable inhabitants, and it had for its object to request me to call an early meeting at the Town Hall, "to take into consideration the very "important question of corporate reform, with a view to laying evidence before the "Royal Commission of Inquiry, and adopting such measures as shall be necessary, not "only to obtain the corporate rights and privileges so long unjustly withheld from this "ancient borough by the City of London, but also to the obtaining for the present parliamentary borough a just and proper share in the advantages of corporate institutions." In pursuance of that requisition I called a meeting, and the result was, that certain resolutions were passed."

4135. Did you preside at the meeting?—Yes; ex officio, as high bailiff of Southwark.

4136. Was the meeting numerously attended?—Yes.

4137. How many persons do you suppose were present?—Perhaps 200 or 300. It is but a small hall, and will not hold a great many.

4138. Was it full?—It was a fair average meeting. It was not crowded.

4139. You think there were as many as 200 or 300 persons present during the chief part of the proceedings?—I should think so. These were the resolutions that were passed:—"At a public meeting of the electors and inhabitants of the borough of South-"wark, duly convened, and held at the Town Hall, Southwark, on Friday the 25th day "of November 1853, pursuant to a requisition presented to the high bailiff, and "numerously signed, describing its object to be to take into consideration the very impor-"tant question of corporate reform, with a view to laying evidence before the Royal Com-"mission of Inquiry, and adopting such measures as shall be necessary, not only to obtain "the corporate rights and privileges so long unjustly withheld from this ancient borough "by the City of London, but also to the obtaining for the present parliamentary borough "a just and proper share in the advantages of corporate institutions. W. Pritchard, Esq., "high bailiff, in the chair. The following resolutions were duly moved, seconded, and "carried as under mentioned: 1st. That the ancient corporate institutions of the country, "tending, as they do, when freed from abuses, to the promotion of the free principle of "self-government on which the liberties of this country are based, and by which those "liberties have hitherto happily been preserved, are in themselves most valuable, "and ought to be sustained, with such improvements and adaptations as are suitable "to the exigencies of the present times and to the advancement of the age. "Carried unanimously. 2d. That inasmuch as five of the eight parishes of the parlia-"mentary borough of Southwark are under the jurisdiction of the City of London, form "one of the wards thereof, under the presidency of a high bailiff, chosen by the City as "the Lord Mayor's deputy, and (being an integral part of the City of London) are "excluded from the advantages of the Municipal Corporation Act, and inasmuch as taxes "and dues are levied by the City on our commerce, from which we derive no benefit, the "present position of the borough of Southwark is most anomalous, though having a just "and undoubted claim to the rights and privileges of the City of London. This meeting "therefore consider the present a favourable opportunity for obtaining a full and equal "participation in all the municipal rights of the City of London; and that as the parlia-"mentary borough now consists of eight parishes, whose political, commercial, and general "interests are identical, it is most desirable that the whole parliamentary borough should "be incorporated with the City of London. Carried by a large majority. 3d. That a "committee be appointed to form themselves into an association, to be called "The "Southwark Municipal Reform Society," to carry into effect the foregoing resolutions; "that such committee do consist of Messrs. Pocock, Challice, Vickers, Thwaites, Collinson, "Evans, Rogers, Newman, and Walker, with power to add to their number; and that "they do also, with the high bailiff, form a deputation to present the resolutions of this "meeting and give evidence in support thereof to the Commissioners of Corporation "Inquiry. Carried unanimously."

4141. Will you proceed to do so?—As an officer of the corporation, I understand the corporation to be most anxious to subject their officers to the fullest examination, and a committee is appointed to meet on Monday next to give them directions so to do; it may be therefore proper for me to have the sanction of the corporation before giving any evidence of a general kind. The deputation requested me to call to the attention of the Commissioners the origin of the connexion between Southwark and London. It appears that about 520 years since, London at that time being situated within its own walls, being the great mart of commerce, and having its civic and judicial institutions entirely under its own management, was considerably impeded in the exercise of its functions by certain felons and other parties making their escape out of the jurisdiction of the City, circumscribed by its walls, and establishing themselves in the small town of Southwark, on the opposite bank of the river, where the City authority could not reach them. In consequence of this, application was made to the Government, and the King, by a charter of Edward III., in the year 1327, granted the town of Southwark, at that time comprehending one of the three manors which was within the jurisdiction of the City, and called the Guildhall Manor, to the mayor and commonalty and citizens for the purpose, being subjected to the same rule and governance as the remainder of the City. This continued, I think, for about 130 years, when it was found that considerable doubts existed from the previous charter being short, and not very comprehensive in its terms. A new charter was therefore granted in the second year of Edward IV., 1462, which has for its object to explain the prior grant, and to carry out, in a series of general and specific grants, the powers conferred on the City in respect of Southwark. Those powers were the most comprehensive which can be imagined. All possible seignories and jurisdictions were given to the City, with the whole of the Guildhall Manor, of which alone the town then consisted, and with all waifs, forfeitures, markets, and every public right of that kind necessary for the government of the borough of Southwark, as part of the City. So matters remained for nearly another century, when, in the fourth of Edward VI., 1550, a grant was made to the City, in consideration of certain money payments, of the other two manors, which at that time had become the property of the Crown, the one the monastery of Bermondsey and the lands forming the Great Liberty manor in consequence of their forfeiture to Henry VIII., and the other the King's manor, which consisted of lands derived by purchase of the Crown from the Duke of Suffolk and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the same powers and authorities were granted with respect to their manors that had previously been confirmed with respect to the Guildable manor. Consequently, the three manors then became incorporated under one authority on the part of the City, forming, as they do at this time, the Guildable manor, the King's manor, and the Great Liberty manor. London, however, began, from its commercial enterprise and its being the seat of the Government, to extend its boundaries very considerably, and in consequence it embraced several very extensive suburban districts, more especially the ward of Portsoken on the eastern side, and the ward of Farringdon without on the western side. Those were incorporated with the City, and they form to this hour two of the wards of the City, Farringdon alone being nearly one fifth of the whole twenty-six wards of which the City is composed. Southwark increased in a similar manner, and the last grant, general and extensive as it was in its terms, was also rather specific, as indicating a mode of self-government similar to that possessed by the City. It requires that the whole of the citizens of the three manors should be within the rule and governance of the City, and that the lord mayor, the recorder, and the aldermen who have passed the chair should be justices of the peace for the borough of Southwark. But it appears that no steps were taken to grant to the inhabitants of Southwark the privileges of a representative government, in the same manner as the wards of the City on the other side, including Portsoken and Farringdon Without, possessed it. The only effort made for that purpose was by the Court of Aldermen passing certain byelaws, by which they directed that there should be an alderman of the ward of Bridge Without (comprehending the whole of the borough of Southwark, and not the mere houses on the bridge, as has been erroneously supposed by some), and that he should be elected by the aldermen and not by the inhabitants of the borough. There was no law carried into effect, though one appears to have been initiated, and to have made some progress, for giving them representation in the common council, but simply this aldermanic appointment, and that was vested, not in the electors but in the aldermen of London. However, the judicial institutions of the borough received an impulse though their civil institutions did not. The aldermen established a sitting alderman in the borough for magisterial purposes, and also four quarter sessions. There is an ancient Court of Record for the trial of civil actions, which was also established,—and that continues to the present time. The quarter sessions, however, have been discontinued, and with them the sitting of the magistrate at the town hall. The consequence is, that at the present moment the borough remains in a state of decay with regard to its institutions generally, of which the deputation request me to make complaint. They say, that though they have a civil jurisdiction established in the Borough Court of Record, and though they have a steward of the manor courts who is also the judge of that civil court, that court is of very little use, because the courts of common law issue their writs and precepts with a non omittas clause, which prevents the high bailiff of the borough of Southwark having the execution of the process, and the Southwark County Court of Surrey has since been established, therefore it has become of little use, and has descended to be an inferior Court. With regard to the jurisprudence of the City within the borough, that has also fallen into a state of great decay. We have no sitting magistrate now, and no quarter sessions, except as a matter of form. I summons the grand and petty juries four times in every year, but there is nothing done in consequence of the state of decay of the borough institutions, and they merely meet to be sworn and charged by the recorder, and then to find that there is no business, and to be dismissed from their attendance. This, they say, does not exempt them from the responsibility of performing the duties of jurors in other parts; they are obliged to do so at the assizes and quarter sessions, and at the Central Criminal Court, and they complain of their obligations to perform duties which do not exempt them from others, but call them together for no practical purpose. The magistrates of the county, and not of the City, hold petty sessions in the borough. The inhabitants also complain that from the want of having a fair share in the representation of the City, they have not the control of the various functions which ought to belong to them as an incorporated body. The paving, sewerage, and lighting of the borough are confided by private Acts of Parliament to certain inhabitants who are commissioners not chosen by them or being an effective representative body, and therefore not at all under their control. The market is in the same state. It is the result of a private Act of Parliament, and though the inhabitants have a high baliff presiding over them upon public occasions they have no means of defraying the expense of such meetings as they deem it necessary to call. A meeting like that which has just taken place must take its origin in the public spirit of a few individuals, and when they attend, for the necessary expenses of printing and otherwise, they are obliged to make a subscription. The deputation think, therefore, that the institutions of the borough are in a state of desuetude of which they have a right to complain, and it is upon that state of things that they ground the resolutions which I have had the honour of placing before you.

4142. How are you appointed?—I am appointed by the Court of Common Council.

4143. For what length of time is the office held?—I am annually elected.

4144. In point of practice is it customary to continue the high bailiff, or is he changed every year?—Unless there is some objection to his conduct, he is continued every year. I have been high bailiff since 1842.

4145. Are you an inhabitant of Southwark?—No; I am a citizen of London, and was a member of the corporation for several years.

4146. Is there any salary attached to your office?—It used to be a very profitable one. Those profits arose principally from the Court of Requests, which was formerly held, but which is now superseded by the appointment of the Southwark County Court of Surrey. There are a few small fees belonging to the high bailiff of Southwark, but subject to certain payments, and there is a grant of 100*l.* a year from the corporation.

4147. Have you any objection to state what is upon the average the value of the office which you hold?—I should think since the grant of 100*l.* a year, but from which there are certain deductions, the average profits from the corporation may be about 80*l.* a year. That includes everything received from the corporation, but then I am ex officio, as high bailiff of Southwark, high bailiff of the Southwark County Court, which has been substituted for the Southwark Court of Requests. The latter was for many years a very profitable office. Before I possessed it the fees were as much as 800*l.* a year.

4148. Including everything, what should you state to be the present value of the office you hold?—The fees I refer to of the Court of Requests were commuted for 500*l.* a year and the amount of those of the Southwark County Court has fluctuated very much since the appointment of that court; but I think the average of my emoluments in the two offices is between 500*l.* and 600*l.* a year, including everything. I render an annual account to the corporation, and declare what my emoluments are every year.

4149. Are you engaged in trade?—No; I am a proctor in Doctors Commons.

4150. The second resolution which you have read states it to be the opinion of the meeting that all the eight parishes, five of which only are within the City jurisdiction, should form a ward of the City?—I understood the feeling expressed at the meeting to be that they would not now be satisfied with the incorporation of the five ancient parishes constituting the three manors, but the borough having expanded so considerably, and now embracing Bermondsey, Christchurch, and Rotherhithe, they would now wish the whole of the eight parishes which form the parliamentary borough to be incorporated with London, if an incorporation should take place at all, and to be incorporated with it with the improvements which they hope to see arise out of the labours of this Commission.

4151. Are you able to state what would have been the feeling of the meeting with respect to any arrangement by which, if an incorporation took place, the incorporation should be confined to the five parishes and not extended over the whole borough?—I believe the feeling would be decidedly adverse to such an incorporation.

4151a. It would be decidedly adverse to separating the municipal jurisdiction which exists over the whole of the borough of Southwark, at present?—Yes; I think the parliamentary borough must be dealt with as a whole.

4151b. Would the people of Southwark object to being formed into a separate incorporation?—I believe the feeling is that they would prefer to be incorporated with the City; but if that were impracticable, they would rather have a separate incorporation of the present parliamentary borough than remain in their present state.

4152. Supposing the eight parishes were incorporated with the City of London, would not that involve the question how far they were to be taken out of the county of Surrey, or relieved from the county burdens in Surrey?—They would think decidedly that in that case they were entitled to an exemption from the burdens of the county of Surrey, in the same manner as Portsoken and Farringdon Without have been relieved from those of the county of Middlesex.

9th Dec. 1853.

Mr. THOMAS POCOCK, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Mr. T. Pocock.

4153. You are one of a deputation from the borough of Southwark?—I am.

4154. Is there anything that you would wish to add to the statement which has already been made by the high bailiff?—I wish to state a few facts within my own knowledge, having been resident within the borough for the last fifty years, and a liveryman of London for forty years. I have been summoned by precept from the Lord Mayor, to serve at the Town Hall on the quarter sessions; many times for three days together I have been there, when business has been performed there. An alderman of the City of London used to sit daily there for the purpose of adjudicating upon robberies, misdemeanors, &c., and committing offenders to the City Prison in Tooley Street, in his capacity as daily sitting magistrate. There was at that time much business done in the ancient parliamentary borough; and living in the parliamentary borough during the last fifty years, I was called upon many times to serve, and also saw many persons who did not serve, fined; but this never exempted me from serving upon the sessions in Newington parish, which I always thought a great hardship. I have also to state that it has always been the received feeling, and believed to be a fact, that we are part and parcel of the City of London as much as Cheapside itself. The Lord Mayor and the corporation, together with the recorder, have always exercised jurisdiction over the borough as belonging to the City; they have invariably kept up their ancient landmarks in the borough, and to this day they have always been renewed at the extremities of the borough, near Bethlehem Hospital, near the Elephant and Castle, and at the extremity going towards the Green Man, where the parish terminates belonging to the City. Those are the reasons why we feel that we belong to the City of London, but we have a complaint to make that we have not been properly represented in the corporation of the City, as a part and parcel of it. We have not the rights and privileges to send members there, which we think we ought to have, and we have been striving for many years, by petitions to the common council, to be reinstated in those rights and privileges. I have myself appeared at the bar of the court, urging our claims, and they have never been deneid or disproved, but our petitions have been handed over to a committee generally, and they have shared the fate of an untimely grave, and we have heard nothing more of them. All our applications which have been going on from year to year have failed up to the present time. I have also to state that in the borough of Southwark there is an immense amount of property called the Bridge House Estate. Forty years ago I remember that consisted of many acres of land, then uncovered by any property whatever; it brought in a mere nominal income to the City, but now it is covered by the most valuable property, bringing in ground rents to the tune of many thousands a year; and must necessarily, when the leases fall in, produce an immense revenue to the City of London. We consider, in the borough of Southwark, that that property ought especially to be applied for the purposes of the bridges, and also a fair share of it to the improvement of the borough, which we have not received. I know of no improvement in the borough which has been effected by it, except that of New London Bridge, the approaches to which are much wider than they were in former times; beyond that I do not know of a single shilling being laid out in the borough of Southwark from these funds, which we think we have a legitimate claim upon. I am sure the Commissioners must be aware, from reading the papers, and also from their own knowledge, that the borough of Southwark needs great improvement in its sanitary condition. There are many streets, such as the Mint and Kent Street, which are all included in the ancient borough, upon which I think the money arising from these immense resources might have been very profitably and properly laid out. I consider that the borough stands in a different position from all other applicants from the metropolis, inasmuch as we really form an integral part of the City, and have done so for many years.

4155. Do you think in any future arrangement it would be proper to draw any distinction between the present part of the borough which is connected with the City, and that which is not, or that the whole ought to be dealt with alike?—I think, as a parliamentary borough, they ought all to be dealt with alike.

4156. You think the alternative is either cementing the whole with the City of London, or separating the whole from it?—I presume so. I have to say, to the honour of a large number of the common council and many aldermen with whom I am acquainted, that they feel most liberally disposed towards us; many have stated to me that they have considered it a hardship done to the borough of Southwark that we should be deprived of our rights and privileges. I believe it is in evidence before the Commissioners that the borough of Southwark used to send four or five common councilmen to represent them in the Court of Common Council; whether that is so I do not know, but I see it in the evidence which has been given before the Commissioners.

9th Dec. 1853.

4157. Does the borough of Southwark now derive any benefit whatever from the expenditure of the corporation of London?—I believe not one farthing.

4158. Are you aware of any benefit which it has at any time derived from that expenditure?—Not any during my lifetime, except as I have mentioned, the opening of the approaches to New London Bridge.

4159. You think the present connexion of Southwark with the City is purely onerous, without any corresponding benefit?—Quite so. I consider that I have myself had to do much of the hard work of the City. I have done suit and service for the City. We are not like the prodigal son, having received our portion of goods and spent it in riotous living, but, on the contrary, our prodigal fathers have called upon us to work hard, and do suit and service without considering what their dutiful sons have suffered.

4160. Then do you think the circumstance of the Bridge House Estates being locally situated within the borough of Southwark, gives you any claim upon the proceeds of those estates?—The title of them is really and truly the Bridge House Estates. I am a large tenant, and I have always been given to understand that that property is exclusively for the purpose of making or repairing bridges, or making approaches thereunto, and new streets, and so on.

4161. Not for the special improvement of the borough of Southwark?—I conceive we ought to come in for a share of that money.

4162. Do you know how that part of the City property is managed?—There is a committee called the Bridge House committee, and two bridge masters.

4163. Do you know whether, as landlords, they manage that part of their property well?—That I cannot say. I believe they are very good landlords, and very liberal ones.

4164. Is there anything in the way in which they exercise the management of their property which is prejudicial to the trade of the borough of Southwark?—Nothing whatever.

4165. The tenants of those houses pay, of course, the county and parish rates like other tenants?—Yes. Every one must feel a great want of the means of transit across the river Thames. There is only one bridge, the present London Bridge, and the immense traffic which is passing from one bank of the river to the other is of that character that we need more easy communication; and I am only surprised, seeing the immense funds which arise from the borough of Southwark, which requires that accommodation, that some portion of those funds is not applied for that purpose.

4166. Do you remember what is the amount derived from the City property situated within the borough of Southwark?—I cannot say exactly; it must be many thousands a year. In thirty years I should say it would increase tenfold.

H. Sturmy, Esq.

HERBERT STURMY, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4167. In the resolutions which the high bailiff of Southwark has produced, there is an allusion to the taxes and dues levied on the commerce of Southwark. Can you explain that?—That is meant to apply to the fact that ships laden with corn and potatoes coming to any wharf on the Surrey side, cannot be unladen except upon paying metage and porterage dues.

4169. Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—It has escaped the high bailiff, with regard to the ward of Farringdon Without, that it was in the county of Middlesex, and so was the ward of Portsoken, but when they were annexed to the corporation of London, they were respectively taken out of the county. Originally, 100 years ago, the county of Surrey had not, as I believe, any jurisdiction in Southwark Proper, that is, the five parishes; but by some means the jurisdiction was allowed to creep in, and it was never resisted till it became absolute. When we say there are three parishes included in the parliamentary borough, but not in the municipal, the borough part of St. Saviour's is within the five parishes; but the clink part, which is the larger part of St. Saviour's, is not within the jurisdiction of the City, and therefore is within the parliamentary borough, in addition to the parishes of Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Christchurch. There is one other point to which I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners, that is, the little which has been done for Southwark in the way of improvement by the corporation. Out of the coal duties to which Southwark must have contributed at least one-third, inasmuch as the consumption of coal was always very great in Southwark, from the immense number of manufactories and other establishments, I see from a return just published by the House of Commons, that there have been only 4,000*l.* applied for local improvements in Southwark, and that was as far back as the year 1778. I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to the immense sums which the City have applied for their own improvements, out of the coal duties, to which the southern side of the river have been large contributors, and therefore it is that we urge a right to have some provision made out of the Bridge House Estates for improvements in the borough of Southwark. I think it will be seen from the return to which I have referred that no less than the sum of 1,190,821*l.* 13*s.* 1½*d.* has been applied to improvements within the City, out of the coal duties; and to improvements of a mixed character, the sum of 1,818,200*l.* 18*s.* 0½*d*; that mixed character being principally London Bridge and its approaches, so that a sum of 3,000,000*l.* has been expended by the City of London for their own purposes, whilst Southwark has received only an expenditure of 4,000*l.* beyond the necessary improvements in the erection of London Bridge. We have ourselves endeavoured to effect local improvements. Ten years ago a bill was brought into the House of Commons and proceeded a considerable way, for the purpose of making a new street from the borough near the Town Hall to Stamford Street, and but for some disagreement between the Bishop of Winchester and his lessees, it would have been carried. The expense attending this, although large, was borne by the promoters of the measure. A few months since also we had a new line laid down by the surveyor of the Board of Works, but from the want of money we were not able to proceed with it.

4170. Does the borough of Southwark suffer in its sewerage or any other way from the present state of its institutions?—Certainly. We have complained to Lord Palmerston that there are now two or three large sewers debouching at Bankside into the river, one close to St. Saviour's Church which is very injurious indeed; the commissioners of sewers say they have no means of remedying it, as the expense of it would be 100,000*l.* Some ten or twelve years ago there was a very heavy overflow of the tide into our parish; the poor especially suffered very materially, the water came up to the first floor in some cases. The result was that the commissioners of clink pavements, whose jurisdiction extends nearly the whole length of the river in our parish, considered the point, and they made application to the then commissioners of sewers, who they thought had jurisdiction to call upon the different wharfingers to raise their banks, the commissioners themselves raising the public bank. This was done, and the whole of the bank was raised, and except in the case of a very extraordinarily high tide there is not the same suffering now.

4171. It was raised at the expense of the persons who lived along the bank?—Yes; where it was private property, and at the expense of the commissioners where it was public property. If any one having premises abutting on the river in Southwark wishes to erect anything on his premises projecting into the river, he must apply to the corporation of London for their assent. Mr. Alderman Humphery, for instance, has erected some building on his premises on the river adjoining the Southwark side of London Bridge, and for that purpose he had to get a licence from the corporation of London and Woods and Forests, and for which a fine was paid. I would only add that in consequence of the connexion of Southwark with the corporation of London we are excluded from the benefit of the Municipal Act. We cannot apply for any incorporation, and it is very expedient for us that something should be done.

4172. Your connexion with the City is sufficient to exclude you from the operation of the Municipal Act, though it does not exempt you from the burdens of the county of Surrey?—Exactly so.

Mr. J. J. Stevens.

Mr. James John Stevens, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4173. Do you wish to add anything to what has been stated on the subject of the borough of Southwark?—I wish to say a few words in relation to the state of the whole of the borough, in consequence of there not being a board to which they can apply for the redress of their grievances. I am connected with the borough of Southwark as chairman of the board of guardians of one of the large parishes, the parish of St. George. I have also been repeatedly summoned on leet juries of the borough of Southwark, and have made presentments of the state in which several courts and places in the borough are found, one of which I beg to lay before the Commissioners (producing the same), it having been copied by the General Board of Health into their report. From that it will be perceived that the state of the borough is very bad as regards the poor. The courts are not drained, they are badly supplied with water, and the poor are in a very bad condition in respect to their health. This arises from the want of a properly constituted board to whom they could make application, or to whom the landlords of those several tenements could make application, in order that ther wants might be relieved.

4174. What sort of board would you wish to constitute?—The board that should be constituted should be one that would embrace the several paving and lighting boards, which are now distributed throughout the parishes of the borough of Southwark.

4175. What you wish is a board having authority over the whole parliamentary borough of Southwark, which should be empowered to execute public works?—Yes.

4176. You want a joint action in regard to such matters as sewerage and paving?—Yes.

4177. How is the paving in the borough of Southwark now neing executed?—It is executed by five or six boards: two or three in the parish of St. George, and two or three in each of the several other parshes. All those might be consolidated into one paving board.

Mr. J. J. Stevens.

9th Dec. 1853.

4178. Is the ownership of property much divided in the borough of Southwark?—Yes, very much indeed; the properties are small, with the exception of the City property in the Bridge House Estates, which is considerable. That in the parish of St. George comprises, I should imagine, one-third of the parish.

J. C. G. Bennett, Esq.

JAMES CHARLES GRAHAM BENNETT, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4179. You are a solicitor in the City of London?—Yes; and also an election agent. In 1841 I was chairman of the wards of Cheap, Cordwainer, and Dowgate, of the committee for promoting the election of Messrs. Masterman, Lyall, Pirie, and Attwood, in the contest with Sir Matthew Wood, Mr. Pattison, Mr. Grote, and Lord John Russell. In 1843 I was secretary and agent to Mr. Baring in the contest between himself and Mr. Pattison, on the death of Sir Matthew Wood. In 1847 I was agent for Mr. Masterman, Mr. Alderman Johnson, Mr. Bevan, and Mr. Freshfield, in the contest with Lord John Russell, Mr. Pattison, Sir George Larpent, and Baron Rothschild. In the same year I was the City agent for Colonel Thomas Wood, in the contest of the county of Middlesex with Lord Robert Grosvenor and Mr. Osborne. In 1852 (the past year), I was secretary and agent for Mr. Masterman in the contest for the City, and, following that, I was agent also for the Marquis of Blandford in the City division of the county. I make these remarks to show that in election tactics I have had some little experience, and with these preliminaries I will call your attention to what occurs at elections at common hall, held under the Act 11th George I., chapter 18. Previous to the late contest for the chamberlainship between Sir John Key and Mr. Benjamin Scott, application was made personally to Mr. Potter, the secondary of London, by Mr. Brown and myself, as agents for Mr. Scott, and by Mr. Ledger, as agent for Sir John Key, with the view of getting some system or arrangement adopted for taking the poll different to that which had prevailed at previous contests. It was urged upon Mr. Potter, that inasmuch as no complete register of the liverymen of the different companies existed to govern the poll clerks, the booths ought to be arranged in alphabetical order, according to the names and titles of the companies, as on the elections for the City members of Parliament. But to this suggestion, although assented to by the agents on both sides, Mr. Potter stated he could not accede, as the election would be held under the specific provisions of the Act to which I have alluded (I should mention that there is nothing in the Act to prevent such an arrangement), and that the same arrangements would be made as on all former occasions, beginning with twelve clerks on the first day, a similar number on the second, to be reduced on the third and subsequent days of the poll to eight or six, as the pressure of business might diminish, and again to be increased in case of need. In elections at common hall, after a show of hands has been taken and a poll has been demanded, the poll has been immediately commenced. Twelve desks are arranged immediately in front of the hustings at Guildhall, to which twelve persons are appointed as poll clerks, and either of these clerks can take the votes of any persons who present themselves. None of such poll clerks, with the exception of Mr. Harker (the City crier), have the slightest knowledge of who are liverymen and who are not. It was in consequence of that, that we applied to Mr. Potter for some different arrangement, an arrangement in alphabetical order, according to the names of the companies. On all occasions of elections in common hall, barriers are erected immediately in front of the Guildhall, such barriers having separate portals or doorways arranged in the alphabetical order of the companies, at which the beadles of the different companies ought to attend, and through which none but liverymen ought to be admitted to the Guildhall, the beadles being supposed to be personally acquainted with all the members of their respective companies. The barriers are erected, but, beyond showing themselves on the first day, the beadles do not attend, and hence it is that any one can obtain admission to the hall during the contest, and the check which formerly existed in this respect has ceased. In the contests for officers to be elected by the liverymen of London (as in the case of the late election for chamberlain), where a poll is demanded, such poll continues open for seven clear days, exclusive of Sunday, whilst in elections for the City members of Parliament, the poll is limited to one day only. The parliamentary voters among the liverymen are those who reside within seven miles of London, whose names are published annually after the usual revision of the lists, whilst in elections for corporate officers, the whole of the livery of London (with certain exceptions) are entitled to vote, no matter where they reside, and the only clues to the livery (of whom many reside at great distances from London) are the private lists published by each company; 7,215 in number according to the lists for the years 1852 and 1853, were those who were entitled to vote in parliamentary contests until the last revision, but the total number of the livery may be taken at about 10,000; therefore, there are nearly 3,000 persons on the livery who are not to be found in any public register. The complaints which exist against the present system, are (among others) the following, viz.: 1st, the seven days' poll, and the mode of taking it; 2d, the want of a complete register of the liverymen who are entitled to vote, for the guidance of the clerks on taking the poll, and for the guidance of the secondary or sheriff's deputy, on objections being taken to any vote tendered; 3d, the absence of arrangement of the polling booths according to the alphabetical order of the companies; 4th, the absolute impossibility of identifying who are and who are not liverymen, and the consequent absence of all check against the personation of voters, whether living or dead, against voting more than once, and against false and fictitious voters; 5th, the want of a specific enactment against bribery, which the Act of 11th George I., chapter 18, does not contain; and lastly, the total absence of all means of putting an end to or preventing bribery, corruption, the manufacture of false voters, perjury, suborning of perjury, and conspiracy. These are very heavy words to utter, but I am in a situation to prove that all those practices exist at elections in common hall.

4180. Would not bribery be an offence at law without any special enactment pointing to the particular case?—The difficulty is in the proof of such cases at all times, but my observation would go further than that. I say that an opinion unhappily prevails among the liverymen, that inasmuch as the Act is silent on the subject of bribery and treating, it is no wrong, not even a moral wrong to be paid for their votes.

4181. In point of fact, does bribery prevail to a considerable extent in common hall elections?—I speak only from the experience of this one election, and I will say from this one I should judge of others; this was the first common hall election I had the slightest experience of, and it certainly opened my eyes to many disgraceful practices. The elections for members of Parliament for the City and for the county are all tainted with "'longshore" influence, to the disgrace of the voters; but they are pure and immaculate compared with common hall contests, and are not to be named in the same day with the practices which there prevail.

4183. Have you any means of judging what the amount of expenditure was upon the two sides?—On the two sides I have nothing further than report to guide me, but I think it was little short of 10,000*l*. The expenses upon Mr. Scott's side exceeded 3,000*l*., subject to a deduction subscribed by Mr. Scott's friends by way of testimonial. I beg to say, that I do not come here at the instance of Mr. Scott, smarting under recent defeat, but I come solely on public grounds. There is a set of men, about a dozen in number, who always take a most prominent part in all such contests, to the great disgrace of the livery in general, and to the great expense of the candidates in particular, who, although not specifically engaged to attend to the interests of the candidates further than in obtaining the votes of those who are actually qualified, yet they or their subordinates, in order to make a market of, and to plunder the successful candidate under the present system, supply the candidates from day to day with a number of false votes, thus keeping the candidates, at the close of each day, as nearly on an equality as possible in point of numbers, so that their demands may be more extortionate as the poll is actually drawing to a termination. In illustration of this, I have prepared two tables, showing what transpired in such respects at the last election. The first shows the daily poll and which of the candidates was in the majority at the close of each day. On the first day Sir John Key had a majority of 16; the numbers polled being 259 for Sir John Key, and 243 for Mr. Scott. On the second day Sir John Key had polled 1,126, and Mr. Scott 1,204, giving a majority for Mr. Scott of 78. On the third day there were 1,636 polled for Sir John Key, and 1,695 for Mr. Scott; the majority for Mr. Scott being 59. On the fourth day there were 2,060 votes recorded for Sir John Key, and for Mr. Scott 2,085; the majority for Mr. Scott being 25. On the fifth day the numbers were 2,421 for Sir John Key, and 2,407 for Mr. Scott; then the majority changed sides and Sir John Key got an ascendancy of 14. On the sixth day the numbers were 2,729 for Sir John Key, and 2,658 for Mr. Scott; the majority increased for Sir John Key to 71. On the seventh day the numbers were 3,179 for Sir John Key against 2,912 for Mr. Scott; the majority for Sir John Key being 267 at the close of the poll. So much for the numbers as they stood at the close of each day's poll, showing how close the contest was; but unfortunately legitimate voters alone had not been taken and recorded. I hold a table in my hand prepared with great care which gives this result: that on the seven days' poll there were actually recorded by persons who were not qualified to vote, no less than 201 votes for Sir John Key, and 129 on the part of Mr. Scott; while those who voted twice for Sir John Key were 25, and those who voted twice for Mr. Scott were seven. The totals were for Sir John Key 226, and for Mr. Scott 136. The result shows that there were 362 false votes polled during the contest; against which, under the present system, it was and is quite impossible to guard.

4184. How do you believe the ultimate result of the poll was obtained, and that which was at first a majority in favour of Mr. Scott, was converted into a majority in favour of Sir John Key?—By bribery and corruption. Aldermanic influence, and various other modes resorted to on the occasion, which were exceedingly disgraceful. Mr. Scott was the popular candidate. We had no means of ascertaining who were personated, whether living or dead; many came and voted, the real voters themselves telling me they had not voted. Then there was a transposition of some votes for Mr. Scott which were given to Sir John Key, though I dare say not wilfully. Our chairman, Mr. Robert Hanbury, gave his vote on the first day in favour of Mr. Scott; it was recorded in favour of Sir John Key. That might have been an error. If that had been the only instance I should have been disposed to have considered it an error; but that was not the only instance that came within my knowledge. I stood upon the hustings during the whole of the contest, from nine o'clock till the close of the poll each day, and during that time five persons were given into custody for pretending to be voters, they having no qualification; but it was with difficulty we could find any one among the poll and check clerks or any one who stood at the hustings, except Mr. Harker, who could identify any person who came there as a voter.

9th Dec. 1853.

4185. Had Mr. Scott check clerks of his own?—Yes.

4186. Would not his check clerks prevent any vote being improperly recorded?—They ought to have done so, but they had no means of detecting improper votes, for the reason that no alphabetical order of the companies nor of the livery existed. Under the present system, no matter how pure the motives and intentions of the candidates, it is quite impossible to steer entirely clear from the contaminating influence of the men I have before alluded to, who, by making an open trade of their doings, attract to them all those who are to be bought, bribed, or treated,—all those who are unscrupulous enough to represent the living and to personate the dead; and also all those who are willing to take false oaths, whether in recording their votes more than once, or in swearing to qualifications which they do not possess. At the recent contest five persons were given into custody during the poll; one of whom, being evidently misled as to his qualification (not having been a liveryman for twelve months) was discharged by my consent, I being the prosecutor. Another was discharged after a searching investigation, because it appeared pretty evident that he had been entrapped into voting, and then given into custody for the sake of obtaining a reward upon his conviction,—a reward of 10*l.* having been offered by our opponent's committee for every conviction, my prosecutions of two of the offenders having caused the publication of a placard to that effect. The others were all prosecuted to conviction, and after a great fuss made about detecting the instigators of their perjury, they were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment with hard labour. I now propose to offer a few suggestions, if you will permit me, if these elections are to remain in the hands of the livery, by way of remedy for the existing evils. 1st. To limit the poll to one clear day, as in the parliamentary election contests. 2d. To limit the constituency to those of the livery who reside within the parliamentary range of seven miles. 3d. To disfranchise all almsmen, whether resident in the alms-houses or receiving pecuniary or other charitable assistance among the liverymen, as well as all those who have received back all or any part of their livery fines. They are already disfranchised by Act of Parliament, but for want of a register or proper list we cannot detect them. 4th. To compel the master and clerk of each company to revise the lists of their liverymen once a year, excluding those resident beyond the seven miles limit, and all classes of almsmen, and to make printed annual returns to the sheriffs of those only who are found eligible to vote. 5th. To divide the Guildhall into polling booths, arranged in alphabetical order of the companies, or to compel those liverymen whose companies have halls to vote at their halls, the Guildhall being appropriated only to those who have no hall. 6th. Whether the poll be taken at Guildhall or in the halls of the companies, to make it compulsory upon the masters, clerks, and beadles (excepting in case of sickness or from other unavoidable cause) to be present during the entire poll. The last two suggestions would have this effect, they would prevent the personation of voters either living or dead, because no man would be foolish enough, I think, to go into the presence of the master, clerk, and beadle of any company and state that he was a liveryman of that company, not being on the livery. This suggestion is simply supposing the elections are to remain in the hands of the livery, and not to be made more open than they are now. The disfranchisement of all almsmen is no more than what they are at present subject to under the 11th Geo. I., cap. 18, sec. 14; but in the absence of a register they pass undetected at the poll, and give their votes mostly for a pecuniary consideration, which I know by experience. The limitation of the poll to one day would be no great hardship upon the masters, clerks, and beadles, which with the restriction of distance would tend much to decrease the heavy expenses of elections, as well as to prevent the constant turmoil of the seven days' contest under the existing system. The polling at the halls of the companies would effectually check and put an end to personation, which at these contests prevails to a great extent, both of the living and the dead. No less than 6,191 votes were actually recorded at the recent contest, and very many of the liverymen who intended to keep a strict neutrality would be astonished to find that votes were actually recorded in their names from the mere fact that they had declared their intention not to vote at all. When a man declares his intention not to vote at all, he is a fair subject to be represented immediately by some unprincipled person, and so he is. Under the present Act of Parliament to attempt a scrutiny would be an act of sheer folly, for it would be quite impossible to comply with the requisitions of the Act in the first ten days after the poll: such as the inspection of the lists, pointing out the different voters who are objected to, exchanging those lists, and other duties to be performed; and it would be also quite impossible to conduct any scrutiny of the votes to a conclusion, supposing the preliminaries to be accomplished, within the fifteen days limited for that purpose. I would only further say, that I have no objection to the corporation of London as a corporation. I admire it and its institutions though I am neither a freeman nor a liveryman.

4187. Do you think it would be desirable to limit the votes of the liverymen and freemen to those resident within seven miles of the City?—I do not think it would be advisable to admit freemen as well as liverymen to vote, or to alter the franchise in any respect, beyond what I have stated.

J. C. G. Bennett, Esq.

9th Dec. 1853.

4188. Is there not this peculiarity about the City of London, that a large number of persons are connected with it in the way of business, who come from a greater distance than seven miles?—I know it is the case.

4189. Do you think that if the power of giving votes upon paper were adopted, it would have a good effect?—I think it would, under proper arrangements, for scrutiny, and in other respects.

4190. Would not the effect of limiting the franchise to those resident within seven miles, be to retain the votes of many porters and warehousemen, and persons of an inferior class, who might reside in the City, but to disfranchise the masters, who might come in to their business during the day?—Yes; and the same objection applies to the election of members of Parliament.

T. H. Saunders, Esq.

THOMAS HARRY SAUNDERS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4191. You reside at Dartford, do not you?—I do.

4192. What business do you carry on there?—A paper manufacturer.

4193. Are there any points which you are desirous of calling to the attention of the Commissioners?—The only hardship which I consider I myself and other manufacturers in the locality undergo, arises from the operation of the coal tax. The brief statement which I would beg to present to you, is, that Dartford, Crayford, and the vicinity, are a neighbourhood of considerable manufacturing importance now. I have brought with me the Ordnance map. The coals which we purchase are discharged in the river Thames, at Dartford creek, opposite Purfleet, a navigable creek, formed by the junction of the Darenth and the Cray. Through that inlet, nearly the whole of the coals for the supply of the locality are brought up. We just come within the twenty miles. Of course we have no connexion with the City; and from the quantity of coal which we necessarily use in our business, we consider it a great hardship to be so taxed, because it is that very article which places us in a most disparaging position as regards other localities. I use from 80 to 100 tons a week. There are in the neighbourhood some of the largest establishments in the kingdom in the same line; also an extensive engineering establishment. At Crayford we have two large silk printing factories; and all these, and various others, are prejudicially affected by the tax upon this article.

4194. Are there steam engines used at almost all the factories you mention?—Yes, the water power is inconsiderable.

4195. Your complaint is, that yours is a district in which there are considerable manufactures. That you necessarily use coal. That the price of that coal is greater than it would be in the north, in the neigbourhood of the coal fields; and that, in addition to that high price, you have to pay the City tax upon the coal, and you derive no benefit from the expenditure of the proceeds of that tax?—Quite so.

J. T. Norris, Esq

JOHN THOMAS NORRIS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4196. You are a member of the common council?—I am.

4197. How long have you held that situation?—Seventeen years.

4198. Are you engaged in trade in the City of London?—I am a builder, in the ward of Aldersgate.

4199. Have you taken an active part in the business of the common council?—I think I may say I have.

4200. You have been a member of the consolidated committee of the common council, have you not?—I have.

4201. Were you a member of the consolidated committee at the time when an arrangement was made with respect to connexion to be entered into between the corporation and the press?—I was.

4202. Do you remember anything relating to that transaction?—I remember a feeling prevailed in the corporation that the reports of the proceedings were not given so much in extenso as certain members thought desirable, for the sake of informing the public of the nature of the proceedings going on in the court; and, with a view to promote the circulation of more extended reports of our proceedings, the consolidated committee originated a report to the common council, asking to be permitted to take means (I think that was the language) to promote the circulation of more extensive reports of their proceedings. The court agreed with that report, and I think I am right in saying that the motion was, that that report be agreed to, and that the commiteee have authority to expend not exceeding 1,000*l.* a year in the promotion of more extensive reports of the proceedings of the court, by purchasing newspapers or such other means as in their judgment they should think desirable.

4203. Was that in 1849?—It was.

9th Dec. 1853.

4204. What did you understand by that resolution; did you think it a discretionary power to spend 1,000*l.* upon the press in any manner which you might deem desirable?—I should think the committee would feel it an authority to expend the money in any way their direction suggested.

4205. Do you remember in what way that money was expended?—I am somewhat imperfectly informed upon the matter, because, if my memory serves me right, there was a sub-committee, a select committee of three or five, of which I was not one, who had the conduct of the matter, and the other members of the committee, unless they had taken a much more active part than I did, would be unacquainted with the exact mode in which the money was expended.

4206. Do you remember anything about any project for starting a newspaper which was to be friendly to the interests of the corporation?—There were two or three projects afloat for obtaining an organ devoted to the interests of the corporation, but in a multitudinous assembly (a committee composed of forty-five or forty-six members) difficulty beset the path of accomplishing our purpose; and although it was imperfectly done for a short period in a paper called the Citizen, it was never carried into full effect by reason of the difficulty of conducting secret treating, and managing a thing of that sort, with which so many persons would be acquainted.

4207. Should you have felt yourself justified under that resolution in devoting any portion of the money entrusted to you in assisting to establish any such newspaper?—I am sure if you had the resolution of the court itself giving authority to the committee before you, you would see that the power in the hands of the committee was so unlimited that any gentleman would feel he was entitled to vote away the money in any way he pleased in promoting reports and circulating articles in favour of the corporation.

4208. Do you remember whether actually any portion of that money was expended in the attemt to get up a newspaper or to support the newspaper to which you have particularly adverted?—I have a general belief that it was, but it does not amount to such definite information as you could readily obtain from Mr. Scott, the then clerk to the chamberlain.

4209. Was Mr. Scott a member of that sub-committee?—No, he was the officer of the sub-committee, and the organ through whom its operations would be carried out.

4210. Are you well acquainted with the committee system of the common council?—I think I am.

4211. Do you believe that persons well acquainted with the subjects entrusted to the committees are generally placed upon them?—Yes, I think so. There are standing orders and usages amongst us which would go sometimes to secure that. In the markets committee, if a man is supposed to know more of the administration of affairs in a market, he would almost necessarily be placed upon it; so much so, that if it has been charged upon committees that the kind of persons immediately interested in the trade, under the supervision of the committee, had a preponderance, and therefore the public service was in some measure injured.

4212. Have you turned your attention especially to the finance of the corporation?—I have not, to any large extent, and I should infinitely prefer your asking any question of that kind of Mr. Scott, who is much more perfectly informed on the matter than myself.

4213. Do you think the decision of wards by which the common councillors are elected is a fair one?—It is neither fair nor reasonable; it sins against common sense and common arithmetic. There are twenty-five wards, and in those twenty-five wards there is a rateable property of 1,116,000*l.*; the average, if the wards were equally divided, would be 44,000*l.*; instead of that, the ward of Farringdon Without is rated at 193,000*l.*, and the ward of Bassishaw at 12,000*l.*, the ward of Vintry about 13,000*l.*, the ward of Queenhithe about 14,000*l.*; taking the population and making the same calculation, it would be found that there are six or seven times as much property and population in certain of the wards as there are in others; taking the representation of the larger as against the smaller wards, the disproportion at once becomes ridiculous; sixteen persons represent the ward of Farringdon Without, rated at 193,000*l.*, while four represent the 12,000*l.* rating in Bassishaw.

4214. Would you seek to remedy the evil by equalizing the wealth and population of the ward, or by abolishing the wards altogether?—Possibly some charity property or other local interests might render it desirable to retain the distinction of wards, but I would divide the City into twelve somewhat equal electoral districts, and distribute the representation upon the basis of that which now exists in the ward of Farringdon Without. The number of 206 is, in my judgment, far too great to carry on the business of the corporation with propriety; 206 of us are summoned, exclusive of the aldermen; the aldermen added, 232 persons are summoned to the Court of Common Council. We meet on the average 60 or 70 persons, and in the progress of the day's business we frequently dwindle down to between 40 or 50 persons.

4215. What is the number of which you think it desirable the common council should consist?—I should think half the present number; about 100 persons.

4216. The common council is essentially a body with executive functions, is not it?—Extensively so. It has, under the charter of Richard II., the power of making byelaws to a very considerable extent, for the purpose of its own internal regulation, and the power of levying tolls upon the public. I would suggest that for the beneficial working of the corporation hereafter, that the magisterial and municipal functions of the aldermen should be separated. At present the aldermen take little interest in the municipal duties of the body corporate to which they belong; they are as justices appointed for life, but in that responsible position they claim as a separate court the privilege of dealing with the municipal funds, and do so to a large extent.

4217. Do you think it would be desirable that the magisterial functions of the aldermen should cease?—I think some public convenience would arise from their doing so, but it is quite essential to the honest and clean handed working of any municipality that those persons who deal with its funds, should be responsible to those who pay the rates which they administer.

4218. Do you think it desirable that the power which the Court of Aldermen now possess of voting sums of money out of the corporation purse should no longer exist?—Precisely so.

4219. Would you make any other alteration with regard to the Court of Aldermen? would you abolish it altogether as a separate court?—I think it might be desirable that we should have aldermen continuing to perform certain duties which now appertain to them, but I would at once take from them the power of dealing with the funds in the manner in which they now do; and I should, in future, withdraw the condition of a justice of the peace from every alderman who had not passed the office of Lord Mayor.

4220. Why would you make that distinction?—I concede it in some measure to the earnestness with which the aldermen claim the distinction of administering justice. It is the most distinguished and most honourable feature in the position of an alderman, and they cling to it with so much earnestness that, without carrying out my principles to the largest extent and depriving them of it all at once, I have thought that with the smaller member of aldermen (for I have said already that I would divide the City into twelve wards), about half might be supposed to be those who have passed the chair, and those who have not passed the chair I would have subject to periodical election, because at this moment the livery of London have the selection of two persons who are returned to the Court of Aldermen, and the Court of Aldermen take one of those two; they have a vote as to which they will take, and it gives them a power which should be rather in the hands of the electors, and not in the Court of Aldermen.

4221. Do you think it desirable that the aldermen should be elected for life?—I think before they have served the office of Lord Mayor they should not. Before a man had served the office of Lord Mayor, he should be subject to periodical election; that would enable the electors to correct a bad choice or confirm a good one.

4222. Once having passed the office of Lord Mayor, he should be an alderman for life, and then should become a magistrate?—Yes.

4223. With regard to the constituent body of the City of London, do you think any alteration should be made?—I think the corporation of London, if it exists at all, should be sustained by a very extensive constituency; at present, I may say, figuratively speaking, we have no constituency at all. There are about 17,000 persons rated at more than 10*l.* per annum to make up the amount which I have stated (1,116,000*l.*); but of those 17,000 persons so rated, we have only in the constituency about 5,900; there is only about one in three of the persons who are rated in the City at exceeding 10*l.* who has the power of voting at municipal elections.

4224. How do you think the municipal franchise, which is adopted in other boroughs, would work in the City of London?—I think it would answer very well, and I should like to see all the City elections handed over to a constituency appointed under an Act of Parliament.

4225. Do you think there is any advantage in keeping up the distinction of common hall elections and ward elections?—No. I think if the whole were abolished, and perhaps nine tenths of the things which were originally given to the corporation, and are now called rights and privileges, and which possibly at first were given as an equivalent for some service rendered to the public, were taken away, it would be a great advantage. I think the measuring the salt, and corn, and fruit, and the privilege of porters, exacting street tolls, the payment of five guineas a year for brokers rents, and a vast list of things of that kind should be swept away, retaining only such as subserve the public interest, and then I think the corporation would be distinguished for its usefulness rather than for its exercise of power and its love for its prescriptive privileges.

4226. Would not there be a great advantage from the simplification which would be the result of an alteration of that description?—Undoubtedly so. At present it is almost impossible for any trader in London to make himself acquainted with the rights and privileges of the corporation, as they are called, which can be enforced against him, and if any man of sound discretion falls into any difficulty, he yields to the enormous power of the corporation rather than litigate any case in which the mulct, though small to them, is large in amount to him and obnoxious to trade.

4227. What is your opinion of the manner in which the patronage of the corporation has been exercised in the appointment as to the more important offices?—I think it has been exercised with considerable prudence. I have been in the corporation an advocate for paying our officers well. We have invited men of the highest class, in point of honour and integrity by our handsome salaries, and we have had therefore considerable security and the public have had considerable security, for the well-doing of the corporation and the efficient discharge of the duties in which those officers are concerned.

4228. You think the personal and official conduct of the higher officers of the corporation has been, upon the whole, distinguished by integrity and ability?—Yes; there are in existence several offices which might be united together, and much saving of expense might be brought about by such an amalgamation.

4229. Do not you think the officers who are now employed in the various duties connected with the corporation are far more numerous than those duties require?—Vastly so. From the multitudinous assembly and from the change in committees, of which a man is ordinarily a member no longer than four years, and many of them imperfectly acquainted with the business, the time is occupied very needlessly, and we are officered and clerked to a larger extent than we need be by reason of that circumstance.

4230. Are you acquainted with the working of the committee of the common council?—Yes.

4231. Do you think that the allowance which is made to them for dinners is a useful method of remunerating the services of committee men?—I think it is one which it would be very desirable should be discontinued. I have sometimes ineffectually suggested that it should be, but the fact has always stared me in the face that if a committee is appointed for any specific duty, and is not what is called one of the standing committees, and therefore has not its 200*l.* or 300*l.* a year to spend on dinners after the first burst of enthusiasm which has lit up the question and excited men's minds is over, the attendance will average only five or six members, whilst if it were an ordinary monthly meeting of an ordinary committee for its ordinary business there would be twenty-five or twenty-six persons present, affording a safeguard in some respects that things were honestly and properly done.

4232. If an allowance is made to some committees and not to others it is easy to conceive that those to which the allowance is made would have the largest attendance, but if no allowance were made to any committee, do not you think they they would be equally well attended?—I am afraid not. When certain of those committees have met six or seven times in the early part of the year they sometimes do not have a dinner, but in the month of June or July in place of that they make an excursion on the water with a party of ladies, which is an expensive entertainment as compared with their ordinary dinner at a tavern for twenty or thirty persons, and that necessitates them going without a dinner during some future months. It is unfortunately true that during those future months when there is no dinner there is not so large an attendance.

4233. May the Commissioners take it to be the fact that the custom of providing dinners does increase the attendance?—I think it does. I think it ensures the presence of persons who would be seriously inconvenienced, probably, by being away at the time of taking their own dinners.

4235. Do you know anything with regard to the measures that were adopted by the corporation for preventing the change of the site of that market?—I know a good deal that was done. I know that which was before the public, but being antagonistic to the corporation on that question I was not intimately acquainted with the secret movements; but I am sure during the struggle on that question, as on all questions where the corporation has got into conflict with the Government, there was a lavish expenditure; at least as large an expenditure as if there was an inexhaustible source of money to resort to to thwart the passage of any Bill which was obnoxious to them; that prevailed very much on the question of the removal of Smithfield Market. There was a committee in the City called the Central Markets Association, composed of gentlemen highly respectable in their position in life, but chiefly more or less interested in the continuance of the market in the City. They gave subscriptions in aid of the movement to get popular men on their side as to the retention of the market. From what I saw of their list of subscriptions, and from what I know of their sense of propriety as to making subscriptions for such an object, I am sure all the money they subscribed would be spent in a day, while the conflict lasted for some three or four months. During that time I am sure the corporation spent money in a secret way, and which Mr. Benjamin Scott can enlighten you on far better than I can, for the retention of the market. For instance, money was spent in the purchase of pamphlets written by doctors and men of that sort, who had leisure and wanted work, setting forth how healthy and beneficial the presence of cattle in the centre of the metropolis was. Those books were sent out gratuitously. There was a model made, and it was lectured on, and there was nothing left undone that could be done.

4236. Where did the funds come from which were applied in this manner?—The corporation has various sources of income. Out of which of them this money was abstracted it is not for me to say.

4237. Do you mean that money can be spent in that way by the corporation of London, and not appear distinctly in the City accounts afterwards?—This society must have spent at least ten times its amount of subscription, but the most active men in promoting the views of that society were constantly at Guildhall, in the presence of the City solicitor and Mr. Benjamin Scott, and I believe they walked out with money once a week, to a very large extent. Certainly, the corporation paid all expenses of that sort in what, in my humble judgment, may be called a very illegitimate way.

J. T. Norris, Esq.

4238. You say you have never devoted your attention much to examining the accounts of the corporation?—No; it is the usage of the town clerk to deny to one committee the privilege of looking into the doings of another committee. The expenses of the committee of the corporation charged with the opposition to the removal of the market, and the orders given by them, so far as I was concerned, would be secret.

4239. This is a question of accounts. Is not it the duty and the privilege of every member of the Common Council to examine and make himself acquainted with the expenditure of the City of London?—To this extent. If I asume this expenditure went into the bill of the City solicitor, or the bill of the remembrancer, it would be in one line, or even if it were ten lines the supervision of it would be with the committee which had given the order for it, and they could order its payment if it did not exceed 100*l.* If it did, the committee would come to the Court of Common Council with a report, and say that they had found it necessary to ask leave to draw upon the chamberlain for, say a sum not exceeding 2,000*l.* for the necessary expenses relating to the defence of the rights of the corporation as to the Bill pending in Parliament. The court would agree to that.

4240. If you suspected that this large sum of money had been spent in an irregular manner, would not it have been in your power to move for the items of that expenditure?—It would have been quite within the limit of my power to do so, but the prejudice in favour of the retention of the market was so great that a man had need of a good voice and considerable energy to get up and make that motion, and my experience of fighting that question for ten or twelve years tells me that I might have got twelve or twenty persons to hold up their hands with me, while sixty or seventy would be on the other side.

4241. If expenses of the irregular nature which you have stated were incurred, they would have been accounted for under some general head of expenses of opposition to the Bill before Parliament?—Undoubtedly so.

4242. If your statement be correct, does not it imply rather a vague and loose way of rendering accounts on the part of the City?—Very much so.

4243. Is there any other point which you wish to bring before the Commission?—No. I think I mentioned the extreme disproportion of the wards, taking the rating only. Taking the voters to be 5,900 or thereabouts, and dividing them by 206, the number of representatives, it gives an average of 29 for each, but in the smaller wards there is a representative for every thirteen persons.

4244. Do you think it would be objectionable that the Lord Mayor should be eligible from among the whole body of citizens of London, without requiring that he should have been an alderman, or even a common councilman?—I think it would be desirable that he should have been an alderman or a common councilman, so as to have been educated for the presidency of the municipality.

4245. Has not the present system the effect of excluding from the office of chief magistrate of London many persons who have not time to devote to the duties of a common councilman, or an alderman, but who might be willing to accept the office of chief magistrate?—Undoubtedly. If the aldermen of London had not the obligation of attending by rotation at the Central Criminal Court, and being present at the Court of Common Council, and attending to magisterial duties at the Guildhall and the Mansion House, it would not involve so large a sacrifice of time, and you might find men who have a smaller amount of leisure than the office now requires who might under the new system come in and be elected, and do great service to the corporation.

Mr. R. Roberts.

Mr. Robert Roberts, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

4246. You carry on business at 118, Lower Thames Street, do not you?—Yes.

4247. Your business is that of a fish factor?—Yes.

4248. What is the difference between a fish factor and a fishmonger?—One is retail and the other is wholesale; the fishmonger buys of the fish factor.

4249. Do you know what rent was demanded for standings in the market before the year 1823?—I do.

4250. What was the amount?—We used to pay 30*s.* a year.

4251. For each standing?—Yes.

4252. What is a standing?—A sort of form.

4253. Each dealer uses a standing?—Yes.

4254. Since 1823, what has the rent of a standing been?—We pay 9*s.* a weeek for it now.

4255. What was the cause of that change?—That I really cannot tell.

4256. Was the change made by the corporation?—I rather think it was.

4257. You do not know whether they brought up any of the rights of the previous owners do you?—No; I do not.

4258. You have no knowledge on the subject of the cause which led to that change?—I cannot say what caused the change unless it was to put extra gas in the market.

4259. Is the rent now a reasonable rent?—I should say so.

4260. You have no complaint to make with regard to it?—Not at all.

4261. Is there anything to complain of with respect to the regulations of Billingsgate Market, so far as they are established by the corporation?—I should say not the least.

9th Dec. 1353.

4262. Do you think that that is the general opinion of the dealers in the market?—There may be one or two who may be dissatisfied, and that always will be the case; but taking the generality of them they are pretty well satisfied.

4263. Are there any officers of the market?—Yes.

4264. What duties do they perform?—They are up very early in the morning; they see that the market is kept in proper order, cleansed, and so on. They are there by way of protection to us as factors, that we are not insulted in any way; there are some strange people come down there sometimes.

4265. Is it the principal officer who does that, or the deputy of the principal officer?—I rather think he is the principal officer; he is the son of Mr. Goldham.

4266. Have you had any conversation with Mr. Goldham about the regulations of the market?—Yes, I have.

4267. Of what nature?—Our market of late has been newly constructed, and at the present period the forms are not properly arranged. I have asked concerning it, and I am told that they are to be properly and thoroughly arranged for our convenience.

4268. So far as the conduct of the corporation and their officers is concerned, you have nothing to complain of?—I am perfectly satisfied with the way in which they conduct Billingsgate Market.

4269. Is there any other subject on which you wish to say anything to the Commmissioners?—No.

Mr. John Finlay.

Mr. JOHN FINLAY, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4270. Are you a liveryman of the City of London?—I am a liveryman of the Blacksmiths company.

4271. Do you reside in London?—I have had a residence in Fenchurch Street upwards of forty years.

4272. Do you carry on any trade there?—I am a tailor and draper.

4273. Have you ever taken any part in the election of common councilmen?—I have taken an active part, both in the election of aldermen and common councilmen. I have also attended the election of sheriffs, and have attended common hall. I am also a guardian of the City of London Union, and from my experience can give grave reasons why we should not be mixed up with the out-parishes. I have been serving on a committee for some time, in which the City of London school is mixed up with St. Saviour's, and several of the out-parishes, of which we have had great reason to complain. I was the mover of a certain resolution at the Court of Common Hall, whereby there was a committee formed of the livery companies, who successfully opposed the attempt on the privileges of the livery of London.

4274 To what attempt do you refer?—To a bill brought into Parliament one or two sessions ago. In my capacity of an assistant of the company to which I belong I have some observations to make, to show the nature of the connexion between the livery companies and the Irish Society, of which I have some complaints to make.

4275. Do you propose any alteration in the constitution of the Irish Society?—The Irish Society are trustees for the City of London, and they have not fulfilled their trust.

4276. Do you wish to show that the property of the Irish Society belongs to the corporation?—To the livery companies.

4277. Has that ever been disputed?—So far as this, that they absorb all the money. I have in my hands the accounts sent to my company yearly from the Irish Society, in which there is generally a small balance, but the larger amount is absorbed, either in visiting Ireland, or dinners.

4278. Is this your complaint, that although the property managed by the Irish Society belongs to the companies, the management of the corporation is not economical, and that no large rent accrues to the companies?—None whatever.

4279. You think that the management by the corporation is not a good one?—The evil arises in this manner: There are persons upon this trust, who have no interest in it. This Irish Society was formed exclusively of members of the livery companies. At that time it was arranged that they should be taken from the twelve companies. Afterwards it was extended, and it was said that they should be taken from the livery companies, but of late, since the alteration in 1837, many persons are on that committee who are not liverymen, and consequently have no interest in the Irish Society. The deputy chairman upon one occasion was not even a freeman of London. He was free of the chamberlain's office, but not of either of the companies, and therefore he had no interest in the society.

4280. Do you think it would be an advantage to take the management of the Irish property entirely out of the hands of the corporation, and vest it in persons appointed by the companies?—I think if we were to go back to what they were originally intended for, and did away with the abuses which have crept in, we should do all that is necessary.

4281. What was the original state of things according to your view?—The following is a report on the subject from the common council:—"That they have divided all the "lands which they think properly capable of division unto the twelve companies, but

Mr. John Finlay.

" certain parts, namely lands which are adjacent to towns, and which, in all probability, " will be built on, and those lands which are town lands and ferries, and fisheries, cannot " be properly divided, and therefore we recommend that part, namely, the town lands of " Derry and Colerine, and the fisheries and ferries shall not be divided, but shall remain in " the hands of the Irish society. We are of opinion that a division cannot be fitly made of " them; but the rents and profits of them may be divided, and go among the several " companies." Showing that they are trustees for the twelve companies.

4282. Has it ever been disputed that they are trustees of the twelve companies?—Yes, it has. Although they send us a printed paper containing an account, all that we get is that printed paper. The society goes over annually, and makes a pleasure trip at the expense of the twelve companies.

4283. Do you think it would be better that the connexion between the corporation and the management of the Irish estates should be entirely put an end to?—No.

4284. What alterations do you think should be made? Would you exclude from the Irish society all persons who are not members of the companies?—I would.

4285. Would you make any other alteration?—No; I do not think that any other alteration would be necessary.

4286. Have you any objection to the union which is formed between the schools in the City of London Poor Law Union, and certain other unions of parishes?—I am chairman of a committee who have been in communication with the poor law commission for the last six or eight months. We complain of the union which has taken place, but we are not in a position to be relieved at present. We are in fact taxed for the benefit of the out-parishes in that particular. The common charges of the children at Norwood are divided among the whole there are four other unions joined with us whose children out number ours, but we pay six elevenths of the whole.

4287. Is there any other point which you wish to mention?—A committee was formed to oppose a certain bill in Parliament in March 1852. From the minutes I have I find there have been many such committees formed in Common Hall. The next morning my friends called upon me to know how I intended to summon that committee; Sir James Duke among the number. By their recommendation I waited upon the town clerk to inquire of him if he considered it his duty to summon the committee so nominated in Common Hall. He stated that he had no power to do so. I asked if expenses were incurred how they would be met. He said he had no funds to apply to. The result was that I applied to the Mercers Company, and they very liberally took the matter up, but though the corporation are the trustees for the funds for us in this instance we could not participate in them.

Adjourned.

Tuesday, 20th December 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. SAMUEL WEYMOUTH HOPWOOD, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Mr. S. W. Hopwood.

4288. In what capacity do you attend this Commission?—As clerk to the commissioners for paving of St. Andrew's Holborn and St. George the Martyr.

4289. Will you have the goodness to make any statement which you wish to bring before us?—The commissioners have instructed me to attend as their clerk to object to the continuance of the street toll levied upon carts of non-freemen entering the City. The united parishes adjoin the City, and can only be approached by the streets of the City. About two-thirds of the inhabitants of those united parishes, upon a fair calculation, are in trade. They are obliged to keep or hire horses and carts, for the purpose of carrying on their trade, and they are visited with this toll whenever they may either have to fetch goods from warehouses in the City to their own premises, or to deliver them to their customers on the east side of their parish. The commissioners have petitioned the House of Commons, through Mr. Duncombe, and also the common council of the City, through Mr. Bennoch, with a view of obtaining the abolition of this toll; but the petition when presented to the common council, was not in any way considered, but ordered by a large majority, on a resolution, to lie on the table. The manor of Hendon is exempted from this toll by charter. There is one of our inhabitants who carries on a large trade, who has a farm at Hendon, and he gets exemption by putting his name and his address at Hendon upon his cart. He has all the privileges which his other brethren in the trade have not, by the mere circumstance of having a farm at Hendon. The principal thoroughfare from the City traverses the united parishes, and that is Holborn. We have no toll whatever to assist us in maintaining our streets; the whole of the burden is raised by rates upon the parishioners. Holborn itself costs 700*l.* a year to keep in repair. If we were without the

City traffic, we should of course be relieved from very much of that expense. They pay us no toll; but whenever we pass the boundary which divides us from them, we pay toll, unless in the case of freemen, which is quite an exceptional case with our parishioners.

4290. Do you object to this toll principally on account of the vexatiousness of the interruption of the traffic, or on account of its amount?—In many instances the parishioners object to the amount, particularly those who are engaged in the corn trade. They have to go three or four times a day, perhaps, to Thames Street, where the warehouses are, to fetch their grain. I am told that that amounts to a large sum in the course of a week. Even a laundress's cart in coming from the eastward to the City pays a toll of 2*d*. When they hire vans, the toll is always taken into calculation, so much per day or per hour, including toll if we go into the City.

4291. Do they pay every time they go through the City?—Yes.

4292. Is there any mode of compounding for those tolls?—Only by the purchase of your freedom.

4293. No owners of carts ever compound with the City to pay so much a month or a year?—I suppose that might be done with the lessee of the toll. In practice I never heard of an instance.

4294. There is no bar erected, is there?—No; at each of the entrances to the City they have appointed toll collectors, who immediately distinguish the cart of a freeman, either by its bearing the City arms or some other means, from that of a non-freeman.

4295. Does the cart of a freeman bear the City arms?—Usually.

A. Moore, Esq.

Ambrose Moore, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4296. Have you ever had any connexion with the City of London?—I was a silk manufacturer, resident within it for about forty years. About six years ago I retired from business, but am still connected with the City.

4297. Do you mean that you carried on your business within the limits of the City?—The workpeople lived in Spitalfields. The warehouse where the business was transacted was within the City. I am a freeman of the City, and a liveryman, and I am connected with one or two companies there.

4298. Are there any points connected with this inquiry to which you desire to call our attention?—I desire to address a few words to the Commissioners, not so much on points of detail, but rather as to the general outline of the corporation. My feeling is, that it would be wrong to abolish the corporation of London, or to unite it with the metropolitan districts. Whatever you might think it right to do, if you had now to consider whether you would create a corporation, I see no reason why the old City of London should be deprived of any of those privileges which it has had so long, which are applicable to the present time, and are not injurious to the citizens of London.

4299. Do you mean that you would be unwilling that the City of London should be deprived of municipal institutions?—Certainly.

4300. And you would be unwilling to see the City of London merged with the whole of the metropolis in one general system of municipal institutions?—I am of opinion that to have one corporation, or confederation of corporations, in the metropolis, would be inexpedient. This is the seat of government. If the Parliamentary boroughs had corporations, and they were to co-operate, I think it would be inconvenient to the government itself. I have been a long while an inhabitant of my private residence in the borough of Marylebone. I do not know any advantage that that borough could have by being incorporated in the same way that municipal towns in the country are. I think it would be inconvenient to the government. I think, for instance, it would be an inconvenience that the government police should be under the control of local corporations.

4301. It does not necessarily follow, does it, that were municipal institutions given to different portions of London the police should be under their control?—No; but those corporations would be dissatisfied if they had not the same control over their local police that country corporations have.

4302. As the law now stands, it is in the power of the different parliamentary boroughs of which the metropolis is composed to apply for municipal institutions, if they should so think fit?—Yes; but I am giving the opinion that it would be inexpedient that they should have them, nevertheless. As to the City of London, no doubt it has the control of its own police, and as it is an ancient corporation, which has enjoyed immunities for so many ages, it seems to me it would be very unfair to deprive it of them, unless it has abused its power. I apprehend the police of the City is well managed, and there is no reason why it should not be continued. With respect to the City appointing its own magistrates, the appointment of magistrates by the people is an anomaly, I apprehend; but in the case of the City, it is an an ancient privilege, which I believe they have never abused. As a citizen of London, I believe I speak the general impression, that justice has been very well administered in the City. If the City of London has to elect its own magistrates, I would say I think those magistrates should certainly be elected for life.

4303. You think it desirable that the aldermen should hold their offices for life?—I do, for many reasons. If they are to be magistates, it is obvious they should be independent. If I were before an alderman, and were contending a point against another citizen who might be an inhabitant of that ward of which he was the alderman, and he were subject to re-election if he did justice to me, I should probably feel if the decision were against me that he had been influenced by considerations connected with his re-election. I remember well talking to the late Sir Matthew Wood on the subject, who was as fond of popular and liberal institutions as any man, and he deprecated exceedingly the idea of electing the magistrates of London periodically.

4304. Do you conceive that the alternative is, either to have the aldermen for life, and allow them to be magistrates, or, if you do not allow them to be magistrates, to elect them for a period?—In all cases in the City of London I would have the aldermen, whether they are magistrates or not, elected for life. I believe that an independent body like that is very useful in the City of London; they have to perform many duties besides that of the administration of justice, which render it convenient that they should be an independent body.

4305. Do you approve of the present ward elections for aldermen?—If the constituency were changed, and the wards were more equalized.

4306. How would you change the constituency?—Whatever Parliament might think the proper constituency for the election of members of Parliament. I cannot see any reason why the same constituency should not elect municipal officers.

4307. Would there, in your opinion, be any objection to taking the municipal franchise as existing in county boroughs, and applying it to London?—I think whatever is the Parliamentary franchise, for simplicity's sake it would be better to have it in London for both purposes. If it is a good constituency for one, I cannot see why it should not be a good constituency for the other purpose.

4308. Have you considered the privileges which the City now exercises upon trade, such as meteage and other things of that kind, with a view to form an opinion whether they are advantageous or injurious?—I can see no advantage in them. I think they are not adapted to the circumstances of the present time.

4309. You would be disposed to abolish them?—Yes; I would abolish the City tolls. I will not say whether there is any great hardship in them, but they are a needless interference with the traffic of the City. Meteage and everything which interfered with the freedom of trade I would abolish. For instance, I would take away any peculiar privilege which freemen of the City of London have with respect to trading.

4310. You would abolish the freemen altogether, would you?—So far as any advantage of trade is concerned.

4311. Have you yourself ever taken any part in the business of the corporation?—I was never a member of it. I have taken great interest in municipal and parliamentary elections.

4312. Do you think the election of the Lord Mayor, the chamberlain, and some of the other officers in common hall should be continued?—With your permission I will state to the Commission a few suggestions of a very general character. The wards at present are unequal. I would endeavour to make them more equal. Some people are for entirely re-arranging the City into wards. I suggest that it might be more expedient to unite two of the smaller wards in several instances, and divide some of the large wards, so as not to disturb the ward boundaries. If you look at the map of the wards it is not symmetrical; but I am not aware of any inconvenience which arises from that. The local boundaries are very well known. In the case of Bassishaw, it is very small, and it should be united, I think, to the adjoining ward, having one alderman to the two wards. That would leave undisturbed the charities and all the local arrangements.

4313. Would you diminish the number of aldermen?—No; I would retain the present number of aldermen. Taking the ward that Sir James Duke is alderman of, Farringdon Without, I apprehend that there are in it the materials for three wards at least, and there would be no difficulty in naming them after some of the main streets. In Cripplegate there are actually two distinct wards, holding separate wardmotes, and having no connexion with one another, except that they have one alderman. Bishopsgate, in like manner, is a very large ward, and could be divided. As I have already mentioned, Bassishaw might be united to Coleman Street. Cordwainer and Bread Street wards might also be united. And there would be no difficulty if that principle were adopted in making such an arrangement.

4314. Are you aware that by the Municipal Corporations Act, with the exception of London, there is no case in which there are more than sixteen aldermen, nor more than forty-eight common councilmen; would that be at all desirable in the case of London?—I do not see any advantage in reducing the number in London to that amount. I think the business of London is much larger than it is in other places, and it is a different class of business to that which is transacted by any country corporation. If the aldermen are still to be magistrates I think the duties would be too heavy upon them if there were but sixteen or eighteen. I should be an advocate for the aldermen remaining a separate court for some purposes. They are, as the Commissioners well know, now a separate court, and they are also members of the general Court of Common Council. I should be an advocate for their still being a separate court; and if that be so, I think the number of twenty-five is better for the purpose of deliberation than a small number would be. I think there should be one alderman to each ward. I think there should be four common councilmen to each ward, one to be deputy. If it were thought better, and my suggestion were adopted, there would still be an inequality in the size of the wards, and therefore some wards might return three, and some five, the average being four. If that were carried out the number would be reduced to 100. 206 is the present number, and I conceive it is far too large. You must in some degree comply with the customs of London. The corporation of London has been accustomed to perform certain duties which may not apply to a country corporation. The traffic and business of the City of London are infinitely greater than in any town besides. The present number is too large, undoubtedly; they take up too much time in debate and discussion; they have been accustomed to take up political questions, and questions not connected with the municipality, more than they ought to do. I apprehend if the number were reduced a superior class of men would be likely to accept office. Many of the present number are not the class of men in point of station whom it would be desirable to have to represent the City of London, though doubtless there are many talented and respectable men amongst them. I think, as I have said, the aldermen should be chosen for life, and that they should be magistrates, but removable. I believe there is now a power of removing them, on proper cause for their removal being shown. The Lord Mayor should be chosen by the common hall, from the aldermen who have served the office of sheriff. I am against the principle that prevails in municipal corporations, that any citizen should be eligible for the office of Lord Mayor. I apprehend, if you wish to have respectable men to fill the office of alderman, you ought to confine the choice of Lord Mayor to that body. There is no interference with popular rights in so doing. If you allow the parliamentary constituency to choose the aldermen, you must suppose they will choose men fit for the office of Lord Mayor, and it would be much more convenient for the business of the City of London. I believe that the Lord Mayor, before he takes office as such, should be well acquainted with the duties of the municipality. If he be an alderman, and a member of the Court, he gets acquainted with all the interests and the business of the City of London; but if you were to take Mr. Thomas Baring, and persuade him to be Lord Mayor, he having never been a member of the corporation, and knowing nothing of its business, he would be a very ornamental chief magistrate, but not the efficient man of business that a person would who had been a member of the corporation, and understands its affairs. I would retain the right of the approval of the Crown to the selection. I know it has been given up in Dublin; but considering London as the metropolis, and the seat of Government, I think it would be right that the approval of the Crown should be obtained. I would deprive the citizens of London of the appointment of the sheriff of Middlesex; it is an anomaly which has no reason in it at all; the right should be restored to the Crown, to appoint sheriffs, as in other counties. The sheriffs of London should be chosen by the common hall, as at present. A question arises as to the unfair way in which men have been chosen sheriffs, and the unfair fines which have been put upon them. I confess I do not see how you can make sure of having persons to accept the office of sheriff unless they are liable to a fine for refusal. When it is an office of ambition there are many candidates. Some times it has been so, but at other times persons are very reluctant to accept the office.

4315. It has been stated to the Commission that cases have occurred in which a person known to be reluctant has been elected as sheriff, in order that his fine might be obtained, when it was well known that there was a person in the back ground ready to come forward and accept the office. Do you believe that such cases have occurred?—I do not doubt it. Men have been chosen who it was known would not serve. I am not prepared to prove it, but from the observation I have made I do not doubt it.

4316. Supposing that state of facts to have existed, do you consider that to be a fair way of using the power of fining a man who refused to be sheriff?—No; a very unfair way. But the question is, whether a regulation cannot be made which shall keep up a fine for refusal, excluding that unfairness. I suggest that the aldermen might annually put in nomination six or any other number of suitable persons three months at least before the day of election. I apprehend the Court of Aldermen would not select those who might not fairly be called on; they might even confer with them to know whether it would be agreeable to them to serve. The Lord Mayor has, from usage, the power of nomination at present. I think, however, the nomination should be made the act of the Court of Aldermen itself, who would, doubtless, as men of independent character, not make any improper nomination. It, however, would not be proper to confine the electors in common hall to choose none but those so put in nomination before them. It ought, therefore, to be in the power of other parties to propose to the common hall fit persons for the office; and then would come the opening for their proposing such as were unwilling to serve, for the purpose of getting them fined. But why should there be a motive for fining them, if you had a corporation who would not accept of money improperly obtained? If the corporation were well constituted they would not accept of money from a gentleman who was an unsuitable candidate. But, more than that, you might deprive the corporation of the money when it was levied, thereby taking away the motive for fining parties at all. There has been a vast amount of jobbing in the election of sheriffs. I believe that the right of election has been more abused in the case of the sheriffs than of any other officers in the City of London. There has been very much done by men desirous of filling the office of under-sheriff. It has not been who should be sheriff, but who should be under-sheriff. Members of the corporation have looked out for men to fill the office of sheriff who would appoint them under-sheriffs, and there have been all sorts of manœuvring and jobbing to accomplish that object. Common hall should be composed of all persons in the City who have the parliamentary franchise.

4317. Would you propose that there should be more than one constituent body for municipal purposes in the City of London?—Only one; the franchise being the same as in the case of an election of members of Parliament. The elections of Lord Mayor and sheriffs should be conducted like those of members of Parliament. The wardmotes likewise should consist of all persons who in their respective wards have the parliamentary franchise. The ward elections should be confined to one day. I would suggest that the election of chamberlain and bridge masters should be in the Court of Common Council in future. The chamberlain is, in short, treasurer to the corporation, and I see no reason why the whole of the City should be set to elect a man to a highly paid office. There has been a great deal of corruption connected with the election of chamberlain, because it is a very valuable office. A man will spend two or three years of his income in getting elected. If the election were in the common council, he being the servant of the corporation, all that evil would be avoided.

4318. The common council being elected by those who had the parliamentary franchise, the whole body would elect the chamberlain?—Virtually so.

4319. Might not the same principle be applied to the election of the sheriffs?—It might. In the country the corporation elects its mayor and all its officers; but in the City of London I think some deference should be paid to custom. I have shown, I think, a disposition to cut down all practices that are not useful; but I think the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs should be elected in common hall; the people would approve of it generally, I think, and I see no objection to it. I would abolish such officers as ale conners and flesh lasters, and those antiquated officers which are not applicable to the present times. I would permit the Court of Aldermen to form a separate court. I do not think we have any reason to complain of the Court of Aldermen in the City of London. There have been some exceptions as to respectability, but generally speaking they are a respectable body, not taken, perhaps, from the highest class, but still they are very independent and respectable people generally, and they are very useful, in my opinion, as a separate court. They have now the right to appoint the recorder, and I think that right should be continued. The two last elections of recorder have given universal satisfaction in the City of London. In the elections of the late recorder, Mr. Law, and the present most excellent recorder, I believe the Court of Aldermen acted from the highest motives, and have satisfied everybody; but I would suggest, as that is a very important appointment, it should be always subject to the approval of Crown. In that case I think it would be a perfect mode of appointment. Although I am an advocate for retaining the magistracy in the aldermen of the City of London, I am also an advocate for giving them the power of appointing one or two, either of their own body, or persons professionally well qualified, to be police magistrates within the City, if the court should think fit, and the Secretary of State should approve. I think there might be a much greater inducement to the higher class of citizens to accept the office of alderman, were it not for the onerous duties of the police courts.

4320. Do you mean that you would leave it optional with the aldermen whether they would or would not actively exercise magisterial duties?—I would put in the power of the Court of Aldermen, if they should judge right, to appoint one or two police magistrates.

4321. Are we to understand that your reason for that suggestion is, that it might not be a matter of necessity for the aldermen to attend the police courts as magistrates?—It would depend upon whether the Court of Aldermen themselves came to that decision.

4322. Suppose that decision were come to, would the effect be that it would not be necessary for an alderman to act as a magistrate in the City of London unless he so thought fit?—Certainly.

9323. He would be in the same position as a municipal magistrate in a borough, where there was a stipendiary magistrate appointed under the powers of the Municipal Corporations Act?—Yes. I think some of the higher class of merchants would then accept the office, who would not now accept it.

4324. Is every alderman now obliged to attend the courts of justice?—They attend according to rota among themselves; no doubt consulting the convenience of each other.

4325. Supposing an alderman becomes a very old man, does he cease to attend the court?—Practically, I believe he does not attend if he is infirm; they make an arrangement among themselves for the purpose. I would retain the Lord Mayor and aldermen in the commission at the Old Bailey. I see no reason why, that being an ancient honour to the City of London, that honour should be taken away, the public interest not being injured by it.

4326. At the Old Bailey, at present, they do not take any active part, do they?—No. I have understood that the recorder or common serjeant, when presiding, will sometimes ask the opinion of the aldermen sitting by as to punishment. I apprehend that the chief officer will sometimes consult them upon that subject; but that is the whole part which they take. I believe they are qualified in point of law to do so; but they never do interfere further than I have just mentioned. If the Court of Aldermen had the power of appointing one or two police magistrates at salaries, the salaries to be fixed by the common council, and the appointment being subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, that might be a useful arrangement. There are quarter sessions held, of which the aldermen are members. That of course would be the case whether they were a a separate court or not.

4327. We hear every now and then that the court at the Old Bailey cannot be formed because the required number of aldermen is not there. Is it fair to infer from that that they do not like to come?—I have nothing to say in praise of that; but I think the custom of the Lord Mayor and aldermen being named in the commission should be continued to the City, not for any use I see in it, but as a matter of honour to the City which there appears to be no reason for their being deprived of. The aldermen have charge of the prisons in the City of London, which is an important duty.

4328. Do you believe that duty is regularly performed by the aldermen, and the inspection is carefully carried out?—I think it is fairly done, as far as I have the means of judging. I believe there is a great desire on the part of the Court of Aldermen to do its duties well. I apprehend that the Court of Aldermen would be useful in regulating the traffic in the streets. I apprehend they have not sufficient authority for that purpose at present. The traffic in the public streets in the City of London is very different from what it is in any other part of the metropolis, or any other town in the kingdom.

4329. Have not the ordinary police of London sufficient power at present in respect to the traffic in the streets?—I do not think they have sufficient power. I am told that the aldermen are deficient in the necessary power for the general regulation of the traffic.

4330. Do you know whether the Act for the City police contains the same provisions as the Act for the metropolitan police?—I do not know. If there is to be any authority in the City of London, exercising a control over brokers, I do not know of any better authority than the Court of Aldermen. I am not saying that the regulations respecting brokers are as good as they might be; but if there is to be any authority exercising a control, I think the Court of Aldermen would be the best body for the purpose.

4338. Do you think it necessary that there should be any authority to control stock-brokers, for example, except the committee of the Stock Exchange? What object can it answer, except to produce a revenue to the City?—I am not speaking of it as a matter of revenue. I think there is an important safeguard to the citizens derived from the control which is exercised by the corporation.

4332. Have there been any cases of prosecutions by the Court of Aldermen in cases of fraudulent brokers?—From what I have observed of those men, they have generally absconded, and the prosecutions may have ended in that way; but there is every disposition to prosecute in such cases. The City take sureties, and come upon them when they can.

4333. Do you believe that the bond which the City takes of each sworn broker affords any security to persons who have been defrauded?—I know of no reason why their bond for good behaviour should not be as available as in the case of a bank clerk.

4334. Do the corporation enforce the provisions of the bond so as to afford security to the public?—I have no doubt they do. I am not prepared with instances of the kind.

4335. It is your belief that the system does afford a protection to the public?—I think so. At all events, if it is considered necessary that there should be any control, the Court of Aldermen is the best body in whom it can be vested; and that is another reason why the aldermen should be elected for life, that they may be a perfectly independent body. It is well known that the more respectable and wealthly classes in the City of London will not be members of the corporation. I apprehend that is chiefly because the body is too numerous. It is too antiquated in its forms; it is too political in its conduct; and a very inferior class of men at present become connected with it. If you wish to induce the higher classes to take part in it, I believe it may be done by reducing the number. My opinion of the higher class of the citizens of London is, that they will be directors of banks, directors of dock companies, and other companies, and they will attend fairly to the business of those associations; but they do so as men of business; they do not attend for the purpose of talking. If you reduce the numbers, and simplify the forms of the corporation, I believe you will find that more respectable men will join it just as they have done in Liverpool and other large towns.

4936. Do you think the species of pageantry which now surrounds the office of Lord Mayor is generally liked by the City of London, and is any motive for men of intelligence to accept that office?—I do not know that a man of intelligence would wish to see men in armour riding before him. But I am not for abolishing the Lord Mayor's show, nor the ceremonies of the City of London. I am for putting into office men of better taste, and they will modify them, and reduce them to good taste, of their own accord.

4337. You think that the Lord Mayor's show would be better got up?—Yes; it is a tawdry affair at present. The ceremony might consist of the Lord Mayor going in state on the proper day to receive the approbation of the Crown, or do what was necessary to be done. I think a ceremony of that kind is far from being useless.

4338. As at present conducted, it has not the merit of antiquity to recommend it, has it?—I believe it is more modern than antique; it is in bad taste. I do not think, however, it is wise to say that all these things shall be abolished. I believe a reasonable amount of ceremony conduces to public order and to public good. If you put first-rate men into office they will soon arrange those matters, and bring them to a better rule or standard of taste. I would not abolish the dinner on Lord Mayor's day. I would have Lord Mayor's day in the City of London continued as a day of ceremony and of rejoicing, always in moderation and in good taste.

4339. You think that decent splendour and hospitality ought to be maintained?—Yes. we see what entertainments can be given in the municipality of Paris. I never heard any one complain of them; they are done in much better taste than in the City of London. But I see no reason why the entertainments in London, because not done in good taste, should be totally abolished.

4340. It has been stated to us that a system of dinners in the common council is necessary, in order to induce the attendance of the members. Do you believe that to be the case?—Yes, I do; that is because of the character of the men who are in office. If you have a low class of men, as many of them are at present, you cannot wonder at that circumstance.

4341. If the number of the common council were reduced, and the constituency altered as you propose, do you think that system of dinners need be continued?—No. I was not alluding to dinners of that kind when I recommended their continuance.

4342. You were speaking of dinners given on public occasions, when the public occasion was the principal object?—Yes. If the corporation were composed of the right sort of men, I apprehend the dinners would not be so numerous. They would attend to their business in the daytime, and attend to it as men of business. With respect to the conservancy of the Thames, I see no advantage in continuing that in the corporation; that might be transferred to the Crown, or to a body of commissioners.

4343. Does it appear to you that the corporation is well fitted to exercise the functions of the conservancy of the Thames?—It appears to me that there are not men among them qualified to do so. I believe there is a degree of public spirit among the members of the corporation, and a desire to do right between themselves and the public, but they are not fit men for the purpose, in my opinion.

4344. You stated that you were of opinion that it would not be desirable to place Marylebone and the other parliamentary boroughs under municipal institutions. You did not see that they would derive any benefit from those institutions; but you thought it would be desirable to continue the present corporate constitution of the City. Do you conceive that the City derives any great benefit from its present municipal institutions?—Yes, I think it does; but I have already stated that I think they require great reform, and in that case we should derive still greater advantages from them.

4345. What are the advantages which the City derives from its municipal institutions which you think Marylebone and the parliamentary boroughs would not derive from such institutions?—I put it chiefly upon a matter of habit. In the City of London those institutions have been engrafted into the very habits of the citizens, and their business is conducted according to certain forms. There would be a violation of all the feelings of the inhabitants, and a great revulsion in the mode of conducting business, if they were abolished. I am for improving, but not for revolutionizing.

4346. Do you think there is no value in the principle of self government, and the management of local concerns by the persons interested in them?—Yes; in the City I think there is.

4347. You think the danger of having such municipal institutions in so vast a metropolis as London, in immediate contact with the Government, ought to counterbalance whatever there be of advantage in giving to the people the local management of their own concerns?—I think the Government is at hand, and can do, and does, for the metropolis many things it cannot do for a country town; for instance, the police and the sewers are managed by the Government.

4348. Putting aside the question of police, do you think the mode in which the general Government now deals with the local concerns of the metropolis in other matters is quite satisfactory?—I know of no advantage that would be derived from a change.

4349. Do you think there is no evil in the clashing authority of so many local boards in the metropolis?—That clashing may be avoided by remodelling the boards themselves. I think it would be an inconvenience to the Government to have two and a half millions of people incorporated in the way which I have sometimes seen recommended.

4350. If I understand your opinion, it is, that in a metropolitan City municipal institutions are out of place, because it is the seat of Government, therefore you think it is not desirable to establish municipal institutions in the parts of the metropolis where they do not exist; but you would maintain them in the City, because they do exist?—Yes; and because the feelings and habits of the inhabitants are connected with them.

4351. You would retain them, rather because they exist than because you think they are beneficial?—I think as to the administration of justice it is positively beneficial to the citizens of London that they should have justice administered there by magistrate chosen by themselves, who are men of business. There are many cases which have happened and and may happen again, in which a stipendary magistrate has not been as useful as the aldermen are, sitting there now as men of business. There have been many cases known in which the interference of a man clothed with magisterial authority, one of themselves, has been very useful.

4352. You propose that the two police courts in the City, in which aldermen now sit, should be filled by stipendiary magistrates?—Not to the exclusion of aldermen; those magistrates might be members of the Court of Aldermen themselves.

4353. Is that the only advantage which you think the City of London derives from municipal institutions, independently of ancient custom and habit?—They derive benefit, I apprehend, in many ways from such institutions. I am not prepared to state, as a matter of principle, what the advantages of municipal government must be. When you take away the administration of justice and the police, there is not much else to do, except in a place like the City of London, where there are many old customs to be kept up.

4354. Do you think it desirable that the City police should be distinct from the rest of the police for the metropolis?—No; except from regard to the privilege which the corporation of London always has had. I think to deprive them of it would be a species of punishment which is not deserved.

4355. You would preserve it rather because it is an existing institution than because it is a good institution?—Yes; but I do not think it is a bad institution. Perfect uniformity of police over the whole metropolis would be the natural state of things; but I think the City of London does not deserve to have its ancient privileges taken away, so long as they are consistent with the public good.

4356. It is not a very ancient privilege, is it? It is not above fifteen years old?—There was a species of police under a different name, before.

4357. A parochial police, but not a municipal police?—Neither was there in the country generally.

4358. The existence of a municipal police in the City of London is not one of the ancient privileges of the City?—As being a substitute for the old constables, it is.

4359. Were the ancient constables appointed by the corporation or by the parishes?—By the wards.

4360. Were they corporation officers?—They were under the authority of the corporation, in some way; I am not prepared to say how far.

4361. How was the head of the police appointed?—There were some police officers appointed by the corporation. I recollect their uniform well, though I do not know what they were called. They have now two marshalmen.

4362. Do you think it desirable that there should be a separate commission of sewers for the City?—I do not see any particular reason why there should be, except the reason I have given already, that the City should be suffered to govern itself in matters in which it has been accustomed to do so. I think they have exercised their functions very advantageously.

4363. According to your recommendation, the City, with its ancient boundaries, would be the only municipal body in the metropolis. Under those circumstances would not the chief magistrate and the corporation of the City continue to be, as at present, the presumed representatives of the entire metropolis for municipal purposes?—At Paris or St. Petersburg they would. We know in England they do not.

4364. Is not it at present the case that the Lord Mayor is considered the representative of the whole metropolis?—On a public occasion you would have a meeting at the Mansion House, with the Lord Mayor in the chair, and he would appear to be at the head of the metropolis. In some cases that may be very useful.

4365. In fact does the corporation represent the interests of the metropolis?—Not in any practical sense.

4366. On any practical question, where the interests of the entire metropolis were at stake, you would not consider the present corporation as properly representing them?—It has nothing to do beyond the City boundaries, undoubtedly.

4367. Do you think the present corporation can be considered as representing the general commercial interests of London?—They do not at present, because the body is not composed of such men as it might be under the system I have spoken of.

4368. Do you think the effect of the system you propose would be that persons connected with different branches of trade in the metropolis would become members of the corporation?—I think it is probable that they would. They will not associate themselves with members of the corporation at present, because many of them are not their equals; but if a right course were taken I think many of them would be induced to do so.

4369. Would it be desirable, in your opinion, that Southwark should be connected with the corporation?—No; I would sever it. There is an anomalous kind of connexion now which I would sever. I do not see any use in the connexion between Southwark and the City of London.

4370. You propose that the sheriffs of London should cease to be sheriff of Middlesex. If that change were made would not the office of sheriff in the City lose a large part of its importance?—Not at all. The present state of things does not induce more respectable men to take the office than would otherwise be found to do so.

4371. Does not it affect the business of the under-sheriffs materially?—There are separate under-sheriffs for the county; but if it were otherwise the office might easily be severed. They call themselves sheriff of Middlesex and sheriffs for the City of London.

4372. Have you ever turned your attention to the effect of the 4*d.* duty on coals, which is part of the City estate?—I know it as one of the public. I am not much in favour of it. I do not see why the City of London should have the administration of large funds for general purposes, nor do I see why the inhabitants of a large district should be taxed for strictly local purposes.

4373. Would it be advantageous that the coal duties should be commuted into some other charge?—I do not think mine would be a very good opinion upon the subject. I see no reason, generally speaking, why the corporation of London should have the administration of affairs beyond its own boundaries.

4374. At present there are certain charges for public purposes laid upon the coal duty. The corporation levy the duty, and pay over a portion of the proceeds to the Government?—I have no reason to doubt that they do that part of their business very properly. I am speaking of it as an unsuitable thing. In conclusion, I would say that I think generally if the number of the corporation were reduced, and the forms simplified, more respectable men would aspire to a connexion with it.

Mr. E. Wilson.

Mr. Edward Wilson, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4375. Are you in any manner connected with the City of London?—I was a silk manufacturer in the City of London, and a member of the common council for the ward of Cripplegate, during the years 1832, 1833, 1834, 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839.

4376. Did you take an active part in the business of the corporation during that time —A very active part.

4377. Are there any points to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners?—I went into the common council as a very strong reformer and as a free trader which I have always been. I was upon several of the committees of the common council among others, I was upon one which Mr. Williams, the present member for Lambeth, moved for, for the purpose of inquiring into the salaries and emoluments of the Lord Mayor and the corporate officers. With regard to the office of Lord Mayor, a report was made which bore my signature among others, and which undoubtedly stated that the total expenses of the mayoralty was 35,000*l.* per annum. I felt bound to come here to correct what would otherwise certainly be a false inference, for clearly there was a fallacy upon which that calculation was based, and which the Commissioners I am sure will have explained to them better than I can do it. I will only shortly say, that the explanation will be found in the resolutions of the common council moved on the 23d of March 1836, which took up those various items one by one. The principal mistake in the report I refer to arose from reckoning the cost of the original building of the Mansion House, and the original cost of the ground upon which it was built, and calculating seven per cent. upon that, and then debiting that as expenses of the mayoralty during the year of office.

4378. How came you to adopt that principle at that time in making the calculation, when it appears to you to be an erroneous one?—I was oneof the young members. I had just come into office, and there were persons on the committee who I thought better understood the matter than myself.

4379. Are there any other points to which you wish to refer?—I will mention some of the duties which members of the common council have to perform in their office. The aldermen and the common councilmen have to hear any complaint of undue assessment in their wards, and to correct them, for the purpose of rating the inhabitants.

4380. What do you mean by rating?—It is for the purpose of carrying out the rating. If a person comes before the deputy and common councilmen, to say that he considers his house is unfairly rated in the rate book, they consider it, and they have the power of altering it so as to make it more uniform with others in the ward. With respect to jury lists, in the same way they have before them the names of the different parties liable to serve on juries in their wards, and they place them as their standing warrants upon the grand jury, or the petit jury, or otherwise. They have also the publicans before them; and no publican is licensed except he has been, if I may so term it, approved by the common councillors of the ward. The deputy being a commissioner of sewers, if I may so call him, may always be approached by the inhabitants of his ward; and any nuisance or want of repair of the pavements is always communicated to him, and he, as a commissioner of sewers, naturally reports it to the commission, and I attribute in some respect the cleanliness and good paving of the City of London to the fact that each ward is represented in that commission by these deputies.

4381. Is the deputy a paid officer?—No; he is appointed by the aldermen from out of the body of the common council, and usually continues for life, or till he ceases to be a member of the Court of Common Council.

4382. He receives no remuneration for his services?—None whatever. With the permission of the Commissioners I will now hand in a memorandum of what I think to be important alterations in the constitution of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the City of London. Having taken a very active part in the endeavour to reform the corporation through its own body, I would suggest that the corporation should consist of a Lord Mayor, twenty or twenty-five aldermen, and not less than 100 councillors. That the wards should be equalized as to size, regard being had to the population, &c. That there should be as many wards as there are aldermen. That the Lord Mayor should be elected by the whole constituency of the City from the aldermen, and that there should be no return of two, with choice of one by the Lord Mayor and aldermen, as at present practised. That one alderman and an equal division of the councillors should be elected for each ward by the constituency of the ward. The present assumed veto of the Lord Mayor and aldermen on the choice of an alderman to be abolished. The Lord Mayor to be elected annually, and the aldermen for life. The councillors and all officers of the corporation to be subject to annual election. That there should be no money qualification for Lord Mayor, aldermen, or councillors, but a penalty for any one who should have been insolvent, bankrupt, or convicted of fraud, voting or acting in either capacity, the office to be vacated in event of either occurring. The chamberlain to be as at present treasurer of the City cash, and appointed by the electors. Auditors, not being members of the corporation, to be annually appointed by the corporate body. The electors to be the parliamentary constituency; and the aldermen and councillors in each ward to make and publish annually a list of voters for each ward, in the same manner as for the parliamentary franchise; the poll to be taken in one day. Power to corporate body to arrange lists and voting places for election of Lord Mayor, and chamberlain, &c., &c., the poll to be taken in one day. The Lord Mayor and aldermen to have the management of the administration of justice in the City, and of the prisons, and to draw on the City's cash for an agreed sum of money annually for that purpose. Nothing beyond that amount to be expended without sanction of the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors. All other acts and entire control of the City's cash to be in the corporate body. The necessity of being free of the City, or of any municipal company or companies, for purposes of trade, to be abolished. The City tolls to be abolished. A commissioner to be appointed by the Crown, to whom parties may appeal against any decision of the navigation committee. The question of the navigation of the river by the free watermen, the corn and other metage fellowship porters, town carmen, and the various dues paid to the City, to be a separate subsequent inquiry. I would suggest that those more general alterations which I have spoken of should be carried into effect as soon as possible; but with respect to questions like those which are connected with the watermen's company, the fellowship porters, and various other bodies having certain exclusive privileges in the City, I think it would be impossible for Parliament to deal with them without appointing committees and hearing evidence on the subject, which could not be got through in one session of Parliament.

4383. Have not privileges analagous to those in other cities and boroughs in the country been dealt with by Parliament?—It is possible that they may; but I think in the City of London there are so many matters of this kind, those, for instance, connected with the watermen's company and the various municipal companies, that any inquiry with respect to them must be protracted to so great a length in a committee of the House of Commons, that the object to be attained by the passing of a more general measure would be defeated by waiting for the result of such an inquiry.

4314. Do you think it would be impossible to deal with them on some general principle?—I think it would. I will take up, for instance, the one single point of the watermen on the River Thames. They are managed by the watermen's company, which company would assert privileges and charters which it would require a long time to inquire into, and I know the difficulty of dealing with these questions in a hurried manner. I believe it would be necessary to have some restriction upon the navigation of the River Thames. I believe the number of accidents and the damage that would ensue to the bridges render it impossible to say that any man might be picked up in the streets and allowed to navigate a barge.

4385. Are there not two things perfectly distinct; one, the system under which watermen are allowed to ply on the River Thames, which is a mere matter of police, and the other the control of the navigation of the Thames in the wider sense of the word?—I propose that the question of whether the navigation of the Thames shall be dealt with by the navigation committee, or some other body, should be subsequently taken up; but my impression is that you ought to deal with the general principle of the corporation first, and then with the details. Whether the meterage of corn is an important thing, as between buyer and seller; whether the present fellowship porters are a restriction upon trade,—are matters of detail which would occupy so much time that it would be desirable that they should be looked at in a separate form.

4386. When you said you thought there should be a commissioner appointed by the Crown to hear appeals from the navigation committee, did you mean merely with regard to the watermen?—From the experience I acquired during the short time I was in the navigation committee, I found there were applications made for things so utterly impossible that they were compelled to be refused, and every one who was so refused thought the corporation were acting hardly by him. If there were any matter of importance connected with the docks, or with the banks of the river, refused by the navigation committee, and the parties felt themselves aggrieved, I consider there might be very judiciously some power, to which they could appeal, for the purpose of stating their grievance.

4387. Would you give that power to which you propose there should be an appeal, a peremptory authority to decide the question upon such appeal?—If the authority consisted of some of the elder brethren of the Trinity, or some practical men appointed by the Crown. I see no objection to allow them a peremptory decision in case of appeal.

4388. Would not that, in substance, be merely transfering the power now exercised by the corporation generally to this body to which the appeal lay?—I do not believe that in one case out of a thousand there would be an appeal. Sometimes there has been a complaint of certain barges being moored in a particular spot. It has been reported that they were the means of keeping the channel of the river clear, and preventing the accumulation of a shoal. Parties complaining of those barges would naturally appeal, if it appeared to be a matter of importance to the commissioners, who would hear the opinion of the navigation committee, and also hear the opposite side. I believe, from what I know, that the public generally would have more confidence, and the facilities of trade would be much greater if the management were in the hands of the navigation committee as at present, an appeal being given as I have mentioned.

4389. Have you no apprehensions that such a double machinery would produce delay and expense?—I think it would not. That which commends itself so much to my mind in the present system of the navigation committee is, that the committee are so easily approachable; that it is, in fact, what may be called a popular body.

4390. Do you think that the members of that body possess the knowledge and experience necessary for them to deal judiciously with questions of this description?—I think perfectly so, along with their officers.

4391. You think their officers do, though they do not?—Many of them bring some degree of knowledge to the subject. I believe they perfectly understand the business and carry it out as well as it could be carried out.

4392. The larger questions relating to the conservancy of the river are generally decided practically by the harbour master, are not they?—No; generally speaking, upon the larger question there is what is called a view. A sub-committee goes down to see the spot in question. That sub-committee then reports to the grand committee. They have their officer with them to point out what would be detrimental or useful, and the committee decides upon their report.

4393. The harbour master is a very efficient public officer, is not he?—Yes, he is.

4394. Do you believe that the gentlemen of this committee who have no professional knowledge, are able, from merely going down the river in a boat and looking at the spot, to form a satisfactory opinion themselves upon the subject?—I believe no one can point out an instance where they have come to a wrong conclusion.

4395. Do you think that is to be attributed to their power of judging of those things with their own eyes, or to their trust in the harbour master, who is an efficient public servant?—Both. They are all of them practical men of business, though not acquainted with matters connected with navigation. They are the same people who would be trusted to judge of a man in a case of life and death; and you might as well say that, if it were a question about a coat every body on the committee must be a tailor, as to say that upon a question of driving a pile, or things of that kind, they must be professionally or practically acquainted with them.

4396. Do you think that any gentleman who has not turned his attention to such subjects could judge very well of the effect of an embankment on the river Thames?—I would take the gentlemen here present. I should have every confidence in their decision on going down with the officers of the corporation, viewing for themselves, and coming and reporting the result of that investigation.

4397. Is there any other observation which you wish to make?—With regard to bankruptcy, or insolvency, or fraud, vacating the office of an alderman, I believe there has been an Act of Parliament passed, by which aldermen do lose their seats upon any occurrence of the kind. In the Court of Common Council one of the byelaws of the court is that no one who is insolvent or who has been convicted of fraud shall sit upon committees. There is a great deal of difficulty, however, in knowing whether that has been so or not, and there is a great deal of delicacy in a gentleman getting up and saying, such and such a person has been convicted of fraud, and I move that he be not placed upon the committee. With respect to the auditors not being members of the corporation there is in what is called the Gas Consumers Company a case in point which works very well; the corporation appoint two auditors to inspect the accounts, and they appoint a party to inspect the quality of the gas. The corporation have appointed highly efficient men for that purpose, and it appears to work very well, and I think something of that kind would give confidence to the public generally.

4398. Is it the practice to exact any fees from applicants to the navigation committee for the redress of grievances?—Whenever any applications are made for driving piles or building out, or anything of that sort, the payment of an extremely small sum, merely nominal, is required for the purpose of ascertaining the freehold right, in the event of the necessity arising for removing those things. The money all goes into the funds for the navigation, and is not a revenue to the corporation.

4399. What are those funds?—The amount is reported from time to time.

4400. Are they strictly accounted for?—Strictly. I never in my life saw a better statement of the affairs of a corporation than that which is annually laid before the corporation of the City of London. Some parties say, I should keep it in such a way, and others in such another way. But I think it is as clearly presented as possible in what is called the abstract. It is a great mistake to suppose that the City funds are large and extensive. Properly speaking they are very small. I should say at the outside they are not above 150,000*l.*; so much of that is apportioned to particular purposes as to leave but very little to be dealt with by the City. When you take out the cost of the administration of justice in the City, which otherwise must be paid for by a county rate, when you take out the cost of the police, when you take out certain sums paid annually for bringing up old officers of the corporation, and a vast number of other things, it leaves a very small amount of corporate funds to be actually dealt with. One reason why it is thought that there is such a large sum in the possession of the City is, that they have undoubtedly under the Bridge House estates, the navigation of the river, and various improvement trusts, large funds to deal with; but they are all obliged to be kept as strictly separate, the one from the other, as one merchant's money would be kept from another merchant's money.

4401. Do you think the present form of accounts satisfactory and clear?—I do. I have before me the account for 1832. In the page which gives what I call the City's cash proper, it refers by marginal numbers to pages in the same account, where will be seen more elaborately what those particular items are. I think the corporation of the City are extremely good landlords. While I was in the corporation it was referred to a committee to see whether there was any justice in the complaints of the restrictions in the leases—whether any alteration in the leases should be made by the City law officers. We found the clause on that subject a most important clause. It is the desire of the corporation not to let houses which shall be immediately relet at very large sums in order to put money into the pockets of the intermediate party. It is also their desire to give every fair advantage to the then tenant whenever a lease runs out. This clause enables the corporation to know into whose hands the various leases go, and to know how they are subdivided, and it is a check upon a practice which certainly the corporation do not wish to encourage, that is to say, that they should let a house at a fair and moderate rental, and the party taking it from them should exact the utmost farthing from the under tenants.

4402. The 4*d.* duty on coal is considered part of the City estate, is it not?—I believe that originally, in the reign of Queen Anne, there was a duty on coals connected with the orphan fund; when the alteration in the duty on coals was made in 1823 the corporation had to pension off the whole of their coal meters. They did so by allowing them annuities, and I believe they calculated that while they were paying very large sums for those annuities they would be ultimately recompensed by the 4*d.* upon coals.

4403. Do you believe that a full remuneration for that sacrifice has now been effected?—To some extent, but I believe the money has not yet been wholly recompensed.

4404. Do you believe, if the case could be made out that it had been recompensed, it would be then expedient to abolish that duty?—That would quite depend upon the purpose to which that duty is applied.

4405. Do you think that the duty taken by itself, seeing that it is levied by the City for city purposes upon a very great area of country surrounding the City, is not objectionable?—I consider that for the purposes of improvement on a large scale nothing can be fairer than that the fund should be taken from the coal duties. I consider we have evidence of that fact in the manner in which it has been scrutinised over and over again in Parliament, and yet it has always resulted in the same thing. I believe there is no city in which improvements do not come from that fund. In Brighton, for instance, the duty upon coal is 2*s.* 6*d.*, if not 3*s.* 6*d.*, a ton, for the purpose of improvements, and I consider it quite fair that the duty in London should be spread over a large area. It would be very unjust either that the citizens of London, or of Southwark, or of the metropolitan boroughs even, should be by an improvement rate compelled to rebuild London Bridge, because that bridge is for the use and for the traffic of persons coming from a very long distance from London. I certainly would not advocate the rounding of a corner of a street out of such a fund. The corporation have done that frequently by the authority which they have in their Sewers Act out of the corporate funds. But those very gigantic improvements which are not only improvements for the citizens of London alone, but for the traffic of all the outlying districts, ought not to be made by mulcting the citizens of the locality with an improvement rate.

4406. You do not think that the opinion expressed to us by parties from various parts of the metropolis is a correct one, that an improvement rate would be more just in principle than the present coal tax?—Certainly not for gigantic improvements.

20th Dec. 1853.

Mr. MICHAEL SAWARD having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4407. Do you reside in the City of London?—Yes.

4408. What are the points to which you desire to call the attention of the Commission?—I have an opportunity of laying before you a very important instance of the disadvantages arising from there being a double jurisdiction for the management of the police. I have had correspondence with both of the commissions upon the subject, and I can point out that there is a district running through the centre of London which both commissioners refuse to watch.

4409. Will you inform the commissioners where you reside?—I reside at No. 9, Chatham Place.

4410. Do you carry on any trade or profession?—I am secretary to a life office. Having had our house broken into in the latter part of the year 1849, I was induced to have this correspondence first of all with the City commissioners, and then afterwards with the metropolitan commissioners. I should first explain, in order to make myself fully understood, the position of our house. It is situated on the west side of Chatham Place; and at the back it abuts upon a coal yard, into which we have no right to go. That coal yard is open to the Thames at all times, and in the night it is closed by high gates. The result is, that the police are shut out at night, and any one can come into the yard from the water side. The result is, that thieves come in, and are enabled to carry on their depredations without any let or hindrance; and they are enabled to do that in consequence of the tide receding from the banks at low water about one hundred yards. That leaves a causeway or hardway, extending from London Bridge up to the Temple, upon which parties at all times can roam about. They do roam about; and I believe there is scarcely a house or a counting-house on the banks of the Thames which has not been broken into and robbed. Of course, in the City, in which I reside, the land police is under the jurisdiction of the City commissioner; the Thames is watched by the Thames police, and is under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan commissioners. The Thames police, I should say, is always kept afloat. The consequence is that when the tide recedes from the banks, which it does at low water about one hundred yards, there is no one at all to watch that part which is left dry by the ebb of the tide. I pointed this out to the City commissioners, and begged they would watch it. I have the correspondence here, in which they refuse to do so.

4411. What ground do they state for their refusal?—Here is a letter which I will read. I called their attention to the yard behind as being entirely unwatched at night, the police being shut out by the gate being closed; and I also drew their attention to the fact of thieves coming in from this hardway. This is their answer: "Guildhall, November "3d, 1851. Sir, In reply to your letter of September last I am directed by the police "committee to inform you, that they have made inquiry with respect to the watching by "the police of the premises at the back of Chatham Place, and have been informed that it "was intimated to the parties who made application to the police commissioner upon the "subject, that as the entrance to such premises was private, and locked, the proper mode "would be to employ a private watchman to protect the same, if necessary, in which "suggestion I am directed to state the committee concur, and to communicate to you "accordingly. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, (signed) H. A. MEREWETHER." They avoid the question about watching that particular ground, and they tell us (we paying of course our fair proportion of the police rates) that in addition to paying the police rates we are to employ a private watchman to watch a yard which does not belong to us. In answer to that letter, I wrote by way of a remonstrance against that decision. I reminded them that they did not meet the particular point, with regard to watching this causeway, and also that it was a very hard thing to us to say we were only to have one side of our house watched, we having no right in that yard. In addition to that, I got our alderman, Sir James Duke, also to interest himself about it, giving him a full account of our position. The answer which I received to my letter and also to Sir James Duke's interference was this: it is from the town clerk: "Guildhall, 28th November 1851. Sir; I am "directed by the police committee to acknowledge your letter of the 14th instant, and to "inform you that there is no reason to alter their opinion of the matter in question." In fact, they refused either to watch the premises behind us, or to watch this ground left by the receding of the tide. I then went and saw Captain Hay, at the metropolitan police office. He seemed to be very much surprised at the circumstance; but begged that I would make a statement in writing of what I had told him. I did so, and I concluded by asking the metropolitan commissioners whether they would undertake to watch that spot, and this is the answer which I received in reply: "Metropolitan Police Office, Whitehall Place, December 26th, 1851. Sir, I have to acknowledge the receipt of your "letter of the 30th instant, and to acquaint you in reply that it is impossible for the "Thames police to protect the space adjoining Mr. Capel's wharf, left exposed at low "water," which means in fact the whole space. There the matter rests; the consequence being, that that space, which runs one hundred yards deep, and is a dry causeway, upon which any one can walk from London Bridge up to the Temple, is left at night without any protection by the police, and thieves do roam about there, and they have committed robberies in almost every house on the Thames, as I understand. My house has been broken into; the house next but one has. Mr. Capel's counting-house and Sir Charles Price's have been broken into more than once.

4412. Did any of your neighbours join with you in those representations?—Yes, they did. We presented a joint memorial, but we received no satisfactory reply.

4413. Do you understand that the City consider the portion of the shore left dry by the receding of the tide is not to be watched by the land police?—That is their impression.

4414. They consider that the jurisdiction of the police stops at high tide?—Yes.

20th Dec. 1853.

4415. Do you know what is the practice upon the portion of the shore which is within the district of the metropolitan police? Do they watch the portion which is between high and low water mark?—I understood Captain Hay to say that they did.

4416. Do you know what is the case on the Southwark side?—I do not. The Thames police is always kept afloat; of course they row up and down the river, and they cannot approach the side; they are a boat police, and have nothing to do with the land.

4417. Do you know whether any communication ever took place between the City police and the metropolitan police on this subject?—No, I do not. I should state that first of all I drew Mr. Harvey's attention to it, but he made me no reply. I then wrote to the police committee, and this is the answer which I received from that committee, through the town clerk, Mr. Merewether.

4418. Did Mr. Harvey make any statement to you of his reason for not interfering?—Not at all; he never answered my letter. This circumstance to which I have called your attention shows that in consequence of the clashing of the two jurisdictions of police there is an important part running through the centre of the City which is entirely unwatched. From what I have heard there are innumerable robberies committed in consequence.

4419. Do you believe it would be desirable to abolish the separation between the metropolitan and the City police, and place the whole of the police of the metropolis under one government?—I have no doubt of it. I believe the metropolitan commissioners would have watched this ground if it had been under their jurisdiction. At all events they told me they would have watched the yard behind the houses, instead of requiring us to subscribe for the purpose.

4420. You say that the yard was not your property; therefore if you had employed a watchman to you must have employed him to watch the property of another person to secure your own?—Certainly. I pointed that circumstance out to the commissioners. We had no more right in that yard than the police had. The gentleman who is the owner of the yard says he is quite willing to permit the police to enter the yard, and would give them a key for the purpose of their doing so.

Mr. Henry Roy.

Mr. Henry Roy, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

4421. I believe you are desirious of making some statement to the Commission with regard to the system pursued in the City of London upon the Stock Exchange?—I am.

4422. What means have you had of becoming acquainted with the system?—I once intended to enter into the Stock Exchange, but I found difficulty in so doing. The opprobrium was so great in attempting to act without being admitted by the Stock Exchange that I declined to do so.

4423. Are you now speaking of the control exercised by the corporation over the Stock Exchange, or the control exercised by the private committee of the Stock Exchange itself?—Of the control exercised by the private committee. I complain that the corporation neglect their privileges, and do not exercise their full rights, to the disadvantage of the public.

4424. Will you state the nature of any complaint you have to make upon that subject?—The Stock Exchange is entirely a private association. It has been stated to the Commission, as I understand, that the regulations of the Stock Exchange are incompatible with the City privileges. I conceive that there is no point on which they are incompatible, except with respect to passing names on contracts in the case of sworn brokers.

4425. Is your complaint directed against the private committee of the Stock Exchange, or against the control which the corporation exercises?—Against the control which the corporation exercises.

4426. Will you have the kindness to state what are the evils which you think are attendant upon the management of the Stock Exchange by the corporation of the City of London?—I think the corporation neglect their privileges.

4427. In what respect?—I think their privileges, in the first place, is a great source of safety to the public, and a more full exercise of it would be beneficial.

4428. You mean that they are not sufficiently stringent in the exercise of their privileges?—They are not. I think that the corporation, having the privilege of electing sworn brokers for the City, ought also to have the right to enforce the entrance of their brokers into any market.

4429. Do you mean that it ought not to be permitted that there should be a private committee of stockbrokers to exclude any stockbroker from the Stock Exchange after the City of London had given him a licence?—Yes. The business of all the public bodies, the Bank of England and the Government, and nearly every other body, is now done in close market. But a question may be raised how far bargains done within a market which cannot be entered by the public are legal. The corporation, I think, should have directed their attention to this point, and as a part of the exercise of their full privileges should enforce a legal market.

Adjourned.

11th Jan. 1854.

Wednesday, 11th January, 1854.

The Right Honourable HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

(Chairman.) We now propose to take the evidence of the officers of the corporation. We thought it advisable to begin our inquiry by taking the evidence of parties who had paid attention to City affairs, and who were disposed to recommend important alterations in the present constitution of the corporation. We thought that the most convenient course of proceeding; and we found that the authorities connected with the corporation acquiesced in it. We are now desirous of hearing the evidence of the corporation officers. At the same time it must be understood that we do not preclude ourselves, if we should think it necessary, after that evidence shall have been received, from reverting to points which we may not have sufficiently considered, and taking the evidence of other parties upon them. We thought it was for the public convenience that there should be a sort of primâ facie case made out upon those points which there has been an opinion among some parties that there ought to be an alteration in the present management of the corporation affairs.

(Mr. Town Clerk.) Will the Commission allow me to say, that it certainly has been the apprehension of the corporation that their case and their witnesses would be heard last. I am sure the Commissioners will thoroughly understand me, in making that observation, that it is not at all on their part expected that there should not be an opportunity, if necessity should require it, to examine or re-examine witnesses; they by no means feel themselves justified in suggesting that such an exclusion should à priori be made. I should not, however, be discharging my duty towards you if I did not state that it is the undoubted expectation of the corporation that, unless anything occurs to make another course necessary, their evidence will close the case.

(Chairman.) I think, from the beginning, in all our communications with the City officers, we distinctly stated that, while we were desirous of adopting the course of first of all hearing the parties who had, as it were, charges to make against the management of the corporation, and then hearing the officers of the corporation, we must reserve in our own hands the most unfettered discretion as to calling witnesses afterwards upon any points which might either appear to us not sufficiently cleared up, or which might suggest themselves to our minds in the course of the inquiry. There is, for instance, one point upon which we have received no evidence at all, which is the management of the Irish property. It will be obvious that we must, upon that point, receive some evidence; and there may be other matters of the same kind. I state this in order that there may be no misapprehension at a future time.

(Mr. Town Clerk.) I trust the Commissioners will have the goodness to excuse me in having made the remark which I have; and as at present no question of the kind arises, I need say nothing more.

(Chairman.) I need hardly add that if, in the evidence which may be taken after the officers of the corporation have been before us, any new point should arise which they would require to answer, it would be but reasonable that they should have an opportunity of doing so.

(Mr. Recorder.) I appear before the Commissioners as the chief officer of the corporation, not in any proper sense as an advocate, but in my official capacity, and as their mouthpiece, to ask their permission to read a written statement which has been drawn up by way of a general refutation of the main charges which have been made against the corporation, and a vindication of their general administration. It has been thought convenient to take this course, in order to concentrate, in this form, what might otherwise be dispersed at greater length in the evidence of the various witnesses who will be called before the Commission. If this statement be read, and placed upon your records, the witnesses will only have to refer to the facts which they can prove in support of the allegations which are there made. If this course I propose is thought desirable, I am authorized by the committee, who have had the management of the production of evidence upon behalf of the corporation, to read the statement for them, not at all shrinking from any share in the responsibility of its preparation, but not as my address, but one put forward by the whole corporation.

The Recorder read the following statement:—

To Her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the Corporation of London.

We, the consolidated committee, appear before you as representatives of the corporation, in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, on the 30th of June last, after reading Her Most Gracious Majesty's Commission under the Great Seal, which resolution is in the following words:—

"Resolved and ordered, that it be referred to the consolidated committee to assist the inquiry before the Royal Commission on behalf of the corporation of London, and afford the fullest information on every subject connected therewith; and that all the officers, clerks, and servants of the corporation be authorized to attend before the Commissioners, and to give them the fullest information in their power, both oral and documentary."

Since the receipt, on the 5th instant, of the official copy of the evidence taken before the Commission against the corporation (up to the 14th day of the inquiry), we have considered the same as fully and carefully as the short interval would permit.

If all the persons examined before you had (as some of them have done) confined their observations to a fair and temperate review of the past history and present position of this ancient corporation, and if they had accompanied their statements by suggestions of such alterations and amendments as they might consider necessary or expedient, we should, without making any preliminary observations, have tendered the members and officers of the corporation to the Commission as witnesses, to furnish the most ample information in their power, both oral and documentary; and we should have felt it our duty to seek instructions from the various branches of the corporation to enable us to submit to your impartial consideration the various projects for improving our corporate institutions which at different periods have been proposed in the corporation, many of which would have been long since effected if the governing body had had within itself the clear legal power to carry them into execution.

We observe, with satisfaction, that many of the witnesses who have been examined bear testimony to the integrity and honourable character and conduct, both official and personal, of the several members of the corporation. We, however, perceive that there are exceptions to this rule, and that some of the persons who appear to be conducting the case against the corporation have constituted themselves at once accusers, witnesses, and projectors, and have in their evidence on oath so intermingled offensive misrepresentations and exaggerations of assumed facts with groundless opinions and speculative projects, that it is difficult to deal with the multifarious questions they have thus raised, in any of the forms by which truth is usually investigated.

Being anxious, in a question of so much importance, to avoid this inconvenient intermixture of opinions, facts, and proposals for alteration, we desire, with the permission of the Commissioners, to keep them distinct. We propose, first, to furnish a written answer to the accusations made against the corporation in as definite and concise a form as their vague and irregular character will admit. We then propose to tender the officers of the corporation, and other witnesses as well, to substantiate on oath the facts stated in the answer, as to submit themselves to a general examination upon all matters into which the Commissioners may think it right to inquire, asking leave to reserve the expression of either corporate or individual opinions upon any proposed alterations, either in the constitution or administration of the corporation, until we shall have concluded what we intend to be a full and perfect refutation, either written or oral, of the various charges that have been preferred against the constitution of the corporation, or against the conduct of the members who compose it.

In the belief that this course of proceeding will be acceptable to the Commissioners, we have prepared the following statement, in which we have collected and arranged the several charges against the corporation under distinct heads, and we propose to answer them seriatim in that order.

Firstly. It is charged that the income of the corporation is excessive in amount.

Secondly. It is said to be derived from objectionable sources, viz.:—

1*st.* From rentals of property, including encroachments on the Thames.

2*d.* From tolls, offices, and dues, including charges on freedoms, coal dues, and metage of corn.

Thirdly. It is charged against the corporation that their expenditure is excessive in amount, and useless in its objects, namely:—

1*st.* As respects the costs of the Mayoralty, including the costs of the banquet and pageant on the inauguration day.

2*d.* As regards the expenses of the committees.

3*d.* The salaries of the corporate officers.

Fourthly. It is said that the police and sewerage of the City, instead of being under the management of the corporation, should be amalgamated with the establishments for the rest of the metropolis.

Fifthly. It is charged that the accounts of the corporation are in an unintelligible form, and that they are intentionally so kept.

Sixthly. That the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, during the present century, have been, and are greatly inferior, to the corporators of former times, both in rank, respectability, intelligence, and public spirit; that they are unfit for the stations they occupy, and have been regarded with disrespect by the citizens.

To these charges we submit the following answers:—

Firstly. In answer to the charge that the revenue of the corporation is excessive, we say that, considering the special circumstances which affect the City, this is not the case. The proper income of the corporation averages about 200,000*l.* per annum, of which a little less than one half is derived from freehold and leasehold rents, and a little more than the other half is derived from tolls, offices, and casual sources of revenue. This sum represents the gross receipts of the corporation in respect of its corporate property. It is of course subject to very large deductions for collection and management, as well as charges for rebuilding and repairing the property, all of which necessarily become augmented as the properties increase in number and extent. The aggregate amount is likewise liable to large fixed charges, which cannot be diminished; thus leaving the sum upon which economical retrenchment can operate very much less than the magnitude of the entire sum would to a superficial observer appear to imply. Besides the proper revenue of the corporation, the police committee of the common council, and the commissioners of sewers, consisting of members of that body, have the raising and expenditure of an average amount of about 111,000*l.* per annum, by rates upon property in the City; namely, 84,000*l.* for paving, lighting, and sewers, and about 27,000*l.* for police.

It should be remarked that inasmuch as the foregoing particulars of receipt and expenditure are annually published, it was impossible for the witnesses to misrepresent their actual amount; but they obtained for their exaggerated statements given to the Commissioners, and through the Commissioners to the world, by means of the public press, all the effect of misrepresentation, by mixing up these sums which are avowedly received and accounted for by the corporation with tithes, poor rates, charity funds, and other sums with which they have no connexion. Having thus mixed up these sums together, the annual revenue of the City is by one witness said to be 350,000*l.*; by another, 450,000*l.*; and a third represents the amount to be 1,160,000*l.*

Secondly. It is said that the sources of the corporate income are objectionable. We will examine them separately. The rental, amounting to nearly 100,000*l.* per annum, is chiefly derived from houses in the City, from the perpetuity leases, and occasional fines of the Conduit Mead estate, and from the rents of the Finsbury property, which is held upon lease.

A very large portion of this property is built upon the site of the old walls, gates, and fortifications of the City, which existed when London was a flourishing free City under the Romans; and on their departure from the island, the property devolved upon the citizens, and has been possessed by them during the twelve centuries that have elapsed since that event. For although one of the witnesses has deposed that this site was part of the common soil of the City, and although King Henry the Sixth did by charter profess to grant to the citizens of London the common soils within the City, such charter could only be considered as an acknowledgment of the free pre-existing rights of the citizens, which had been secured to them with their other rights by the charter of William the Conqueror, which had been recognized by similar instruments in subsequent reigns; and which, though abrogated by King Charles the Second, were restored and confirmed by Act of Parliament, as soon as the Revolution of 1688 had restored law and order within this realm.

Having regard to the principles by which property is acquired and protected in this country, we apprehend that the possession of twelve hundred years would confer an adequate title, even if we could produce neither charters nor Acts of Parliament to vouch our rights. The title of the corporation to the Conduit Mead estate, though of much later origin, is secured by the possession of centuries; and the property which has for ages been held by the corporation from the prebend of Finsbury, is vested in them by an Act of Parliament until the year 1867.

A great portion of the rental of the corporation is said by some of the witnesses to be derived from embankments of the Thames; and the pending suit with the Crown is referred to as if that suit had been intended to put an end to such encroachments.

This statement is founded on a total misapprehension of the facts. The entire amount of rental derived from embankments, made, not for the sake of revenue, but for the improvement of the river, and the convenience of commerce, does not exceed 1,100*l.* per annum. It is not mixed with the corporation rental, and forms no part of it. It is and has been kept for many years as a separate fund, and is applied to the purposes of conservancy and improving the river only. This sum of 1,100*l.* forms only a portion of the amounts expended by the corporation under this head, the remainder being paid out of the corporate funds.

The history of the pending suit with the Crown may be very shortly stated.

From time immemorial, probably from the period when the Thames was first embanked in very ancient times, the corporation of London have possessed the conservancy and soil and bed of the river. They have claimed and exercised the right from time to time of granting licences to embank, in cases where it has been considered beneficial to the river, applying the proceeds to the removal of shoals and other purposes of improvement on the river.

In 1842 the corporation contemplated a large expenditure of money for the purpose of carrying into execution an improvement of the river upon a more extended scale than had before been attempted; but in order that they might receive the best advice before they commenced the undertaking they applied to the Admiralty for the assistance of Captain Bullock, who had been engaged in surveys for that board for many years, and Mr. Walker, the engineer. Captain Bullock and the officers of the corporation in harbour and conservancy service made a survey of the Thames within the limits of the City jurisdiction, and presented a most able and elaborate report, recommending a definite system for the future management of the river and its branches, for the purpose of removing shoals, securing the banks, and erecting steam boat piers where requisite.

As this project contemplated the expenditure of a very large sum of money, the opinion of the most eminent counsel was taken as to the legal power of the corporation to carry it into execution, and to apply the fines or rents which might be received from the owners of wharf property wishing to embank in defraying the great charges of the improvement.

Counsel were unanimously of opinion that the corporation were fully justified in taking this course. The report was printed and extensively circulated, and the removal of the shoals was about to be commenced, when the solicitor of the Woods and Forests filed an information against the corporation, which had the effect of restraining them from executing their design. The ground alleged for this step was that by the prerogative right of the Crown the soil and bed of all rivers within the flux and reflux of the tide forms a part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, and that when the state of the river justified its embankment the ground reclaimed from the river should be let or sold for the benefit of the sovereign, as part of the Crown estates.

The corporation, under the advice of most distinguished counsel unconnected with them, controverted this position, and they have taken such proceedings in resisting the claim of the Crown as counsel have from time to time advised, always professing their readiness to be bound by Act of Parliament to apply the revenue which might be derived from this source as they had previously done, not to corporate uses, but for the benefit of the river. The corporation have been in negotiation with the Government during almost the whole time the suit has been pending, for a settlement of all differences connected with the river in a manner that would be just to the Crown and the corporation, and at the same time beneficial to the public. These negotiations are still pending, and as ancillary to this object the corporation have each year placed themselves in a position before Parliament to enable them, in case the proposed arrangement with the Crown could be accomplished, to carry it into effect by means of a Bill.

Complaint has been made that the corporation, in conducting this case, have resisted, by all the means in their power, the proceedings of the Crown; to which we reply that we were advised by counsel (unconnected with the corporation) that the proceedings themselves were unusual, and ought to be resisted at every step. When any of the subjects of the Crown are in actual possession of property, they can be ousted only by some one who in a court of law can show a better right.

In ancient times the Crown claimed by its prerogative to be exempt from this rule of law, and asserted a right to the possession of a disputed property, unless the person in actual possession could prove his own title. To redress this grievance a remedial Act of Parliament was passed in the reign of James I.; and the Crown, by a writ of intrusion, ought now to seek to enforce its claims to property by the strength of its own title, and by means similar to those which a subject must adopt. The present suit is said to be an unconstitutional evasion of this Statute, by which the Crown seeks to oust the corporation of the soil of the river, of which they are in actual possession, by questioning their title instead of asserting its own. The corporation have repeatedly offered to the ministers and officers of the Crown that if they would proceed by writ of intrusion or otherwise in the common law courts, they would afford every facility for a cheap and speedy trial of the case. 2d. The corporation contend that their title to the tolls, offices, and dues which constitute the remaining portion of their income is alike unobjectionable; they are held by prescription; a recognised legal title of the highest order; but the Common Council, as representing the citizens, have expressed their willingness to concede such modifications and reductions of some of these dues as the interests of trade and commerce may require. The corporation, however, confidently believe that no violence will be done to the rights of property by interfering with any of these revenues, except with the full and free consent of the representatives of those to whom they lawfully belong.

The first of these revenues to which objection has been made is the charge upon the admissions of freedom.

This charge, which, until within the last twenty years, was 27*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and produced some thousands a year, is now reduced to the ancient fee of 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and yields now very little more than one tenth of its previous amount, and is obviously too small to deserve a single comment, except from the misrepresentations which have been made as to the proceedings taken within the last few years to compel persons to become free, not for the purpose of increasing the amount of the funds of the corporation, but to increase the number of the municipal constituency.

One of the witnesses stated that in 1845 he was elected a common councilman to enable him to correct abuses, and that an attempt was then being made by that body to compel wholesale dealers who acted as retailers to become free. If this had been the case it would have been a measure perfectly unobjectionable, provided the means were as fair as the object was just. But the witness further stated that the corporation had employed spies to lodge information against wholesale dealers who, not in the regular course of trade, but to oblige customers, might cut off a few yards from a single piece, or divide a dozen of stockings to accommodate a particular customer, and stated that the object of this proceeding was to get money. The facts connected with the freedom question are as follow:—In the year 1729, when, as will be hereafter explained, the corporation was under a different management from that which now prevails, a redemption fine of 25*l.*, in addition to the ancient payment of 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, was imposed upon freedoms, some of which were sold to pay the debts of the corporation, and others were distributed amongst certain members and officers, who sold them for their own benefit. The practice of exacting this fine continued until within the last twenty years. Complaints having at length been made that the weight of the redemption fine and the charges of the livery companies upon admission to the freedom pressed heavily upon trade, and tended to reduce the municipal constituency, the common council before the appointment of the former Royal Commission, referred it to a committee, to consider whether it was expedient gradually and to what extent to reduce and ultimately to remit the fine upon the admission of all householders paying their scot and bearing their lot to the freedom of the City. 11th Jan. 1854.

The common council had it also in contemplation at the same time to admit non-freemen without the intervention of the livery companies.

The former Royal Commissioners were apprised of these contemplated alterations in the mode of admitting non freemen; and having investigated the subject themselves, they reported, "That the then existing method by which persons became free appeared "to them highly objectionable, and that the livery companies possessed no one feature "from which they could discover any advantage in compelling freemen to belong to them, "and that that part of the system was, in fact, no more than a troublesome and a capricious "method of taxing the inhabitants of London for the emolument of the companies." The Commissioners also objected to the acquisition of freedom by purchase, as being practically a tax upon the retail traders of the City, who were compelled to take up their freedom. The Commissioners, at the same time, stated, that if redemptioners were to be admitted to the freedom of the City without the livery of the company, they could not, without the alteration of the 11th George 1, be enabled to vote for corporate officers in the common hall elections.

Being thus justified in these contemplated changes by the opinion of the Royal Commissioners, the common council, in 1835, under the advice of their law officers, passed resolutions to admit householders, and persons carrying on business in the City, to the freedom, without the intervention of the livery companies, and then commenced a reduction of the redemption fine, by remitting ten pounds out of the twenty-five pounds imposed in 1729; and they have since proceeded in further reductions until that payment is extinct, and there remains now only a nominal fine of 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, together with official fees not yet abolished, amounting to 15*s.* 8*d.*, and the Government duty of 3*l.*, the principal portion of the fees with which the admission was formerly encumbered having been abolished, from time to time, as vested interests ceased.

While these reductions in the cost of freedom were being effected, the common council directed their serious attention to other alterations in their constitution, which had received the approval of the Commissioners; and in 1843 a committee had matured a proposal for repealing the City Election Act of the 11th George 1, and for extending the right of voting, both in wardmote and common hall elections, to the ratepayers within the City. It was also proposed to render the wards more equal in size and population. One of the main arguments for extending the franchise, was that, notwithstanding the reduction that had been made in the cost of freedoms, the number of freemen was still diminishing, and the merchants, bankers, and wholesale dealers still refused to become free, whereby colour was given to the popular complaint, that the corporators, both representatives and electors, were principally confined to the retail class; a body which, although large, respectable, and well qualified independently to exercise their various functions, were much less numerous than householders, who were governed by the same authority, and contributed to the same rate.

When the report of the committee was brought before the common council, recommending an application to Parliament to effect these objects, it was violently opposed by the livery companies. This opposition, might, however, have proved fruitless, had it not been for an opinion then expressed, that under the customs and byelaws of the City merchants, bankers, and all other persons occupying premises within the City were liable to the penalty of 5*l.*, imposed by the byelaw, as occupiers, without reference to any trade they might or might not carry on therein. From a mixed motive, partly from an apprehension of opposition in Parliament from the livery companies, and from a desire to effect their object by their own powers, the common council referred it to a committee, to endeavour to enforce the law against merchants and wholesale dealers, in the manner that had been suggested.

For this purpose, actions were threatened or commenced against twenty persons, including in the list Foreign and English merchants and wholesale dealers, not as wholesale dealers occasionally retailing goods (in the manner suggested by the witness before referred to), but as merchants and wholesale dealers acting in that capacity alone. The defendants contributed funds for a joint defence, and for the purpose of trying the case in an amicable manner, as an abstract question of law. The twenty actions were consolidated in one, and by the directions of the committee that action was tried upon admissions agreed upon by the counsel on both sides, so that the possibility of raising the fact of retail dealing might be excluded; and it was arranged that, whatever might be the ruling of the judge, either party should be at liberty to put the matter at issue on the record, to be tried before a superior court.

The cause was tried upon the admissions in the Lord Mayor's Court, before the then Recorder, who was of opinion that the action could not be sustained. A bill of exceptions to his ruling was prepared, but the committee and the common council determined not to carry the case further. It is to be regretted that a witness in a matter with which he represents he was personally connected should have permitted himself to charge his colleagues with having employed spies to entrap the unwary, with the object of obtaining money, when he might have known the contrary. The action was against Mr. Sturt (not against Messrs. Ward and Company). It was commenced and carried on in a spirit of frankness and fairness on all sides, without the slightest reference to pecuniary objects, solely to determine the question, whether the franchise of the City was to be confined to retail dealers, or whether the obligation of citizenship could be enforced upon the merchant and wholesale dealer.

After the decision in the Sturt's action had been pronounced, the common council determined to apply to Parliament to accomplish some of the objects recommended by the Commissioners; but being unwilling to provoke the opposition of the livery companies, they obtained, in 1849, a partial measure, which was impaired in its efficiency by alterations forced upon the promoters in its progress through Parliament; and in 1852 they introduced a Bill to extend the elective franchise to the rate-payers, and to admit them to the right of voting in common halls. This measure met with a strenuous opposition from the livery companies, and it was finally rejected at their instance. If it had not been for the City Election Act (the 11th Geo. 1.), an ancient prescriptive power (confirmed by Charter and Act of Parliament) to amend any of the old usages that from the change of times and circumstances might need amendment would have enabled the corporation themselves to have made the requisite alteration in the election law; but Parliament having refused to amend the law, and being unable themselves to legislate against the express provisions of an Act of Parliament, the common council determined to make another effect to induce or compel retail dealers to become free. For this purpose they referred it to a committee, to cause all persons returned by the ward inquests, except merchants, bankers, or wholesale dealers, to be summoned before the Chamberlain, and against thirty of them actions were brought for the penalties.

In these cases, with few exceptions, the parties took up their freedom. It has been represented by some of the witnesses that these proceedings were enforced with unnecessary harshness and severity. If this were done, it was without the sanction of the common council or the committee. The officers who conducted the proceedings will be tendered for examination. They have reported that the fact was the reverse; for that when the parties consented to obey the law, the costs (trifling as they were) were remitted in all cases except one, where a wealthy firm carried on a very large wholesale trade; but being in the constant habit of supplying customers by retail, it was not thought right to remit the costs in that case.

There is no pretext for saying that the corporation instituted those proceedings either for the purposes of oppression or extortion. By relinquishing the redemption fine of 25*l.*, which their predecessors have received for upwards of a century, it must be obvious that the present corporation cannot have been influenced by any such motives as those which have been imputed to them. The common council have suspended all further proceedings, but in doing so they feel that the constituency, already too limited, will be further reduced, unless Parliament will assist the corporation in applying a sufficient remedy for this acknowledged evil.

The next source of revenue enjoyed by the corporation, is a toll upon coals, yielding about 70,000*l.* per annum.

The coal duties consist of an ancient duty, subsequently confirmed by Parliament, at 4*d.* per ton, to the corporation of London, 8*d.* per ton applied to metropolitan improvements not within the City of London, and 1*d* per ton granted for the establishment of the coal market, but now applied to metropolitan improvements not within the City of London; making, together, the sum of 1*s.* 1*d.* per ton.

The duty of 4*d.* per ton has been for some years past, and is now, applied by the corporation of London to improvements within the City of London. The new Cannon Street has lately been made out of that duty, at an expense of upwards of 500,000*l.*

The duty of 8*d.* per ton is applied in payment of the principal and interest of sums raised by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, &c. for public improvements in the metropolis, not within the City of London. The New Oxford Street and other important improvements have been executed out of that duty and in aid of the same object; the corporation of London pay 11,500*l.* per annum and other sums towards this fund, for improvements out of the City of London.

The duty of 1*d.* per ton was granted to establish a coal market, with a provision that when a sufficient sum was accumulated to defray the expenses of the Coal Market the duty was to cease. In the year 1845 the corporation of London relinquished this duty, in order that the public might have the benefit; but the Government of that day immediately appropriated the duty to metropolitan improvements, under the direction of Her Majesty's Commissiomers of Woods, &c.

If public improvements are to be effected, it appears difficult to devise means by which the amount required can be raised in a manner so little injurious to the public, and falling so equally upon the persons for whose use the improvements are required.

The avenues of the City of London are sufficient for the inhabitants of the City of London, and the necessity for their improvement and enlargement arises from the immense concourse of people who daily frequent the City from miles around it. What, therefore, can be more equitable than that the persons residing within twenty miles round the metropolis should contribute to the improvements required for their comfort and convenience? 11th Jan. 1854.

With respect to the alleged extension of the area of taxation by the Act 14th and 15th Vict. chap. 146., the opinion of the law officers of the Crown is conclusive, that the area of taxation was not extended by that Act.

The next source of revenue is derived from the metage of corn, which amounts to about 10,000*l.* a year, subject to the cost of collection and management.

The corporation are entitled by prescription to the metage of all measureable articles brought into the port of London. This right has been constantly exercised, and was confirmed by Charter, in the reign of James the First. For the convenience of trade, in very ancient times, the measuring and delivery of corn was effected by the corporation meters and the ancient fellowship of porters acting together. In the year 1835 complaint was made to the corporation, by the fellowship of porters, that Messrs. Combe and Co. were in the habit of bringing malt into the port of London, and delivering it at the Savoy Wharf, without employing the meters or porters. At the request of the porters, the corporation allowed the fellowship to use their name, as joint plaintiffs in the suit, to enforce the claim for porterage. In the progress of this suit the City's claim for metage became involved, and the proceeding has since been carried on for the purpose of enforcing the claim to both metage and porterage. The corporation have for several years been impressed with the opinion that the time was approaching when the interests of the com merce of the port would require a considerable modification of the ancient customs of London, as far as both metage and porterage were concerned. With a view to the accomplishment of these objects, with as little detriment as possible to the interests of individuals, an Act of Common Council was passed regulating the admission of porters, which would have the effect, in the course of years, of enabling the common council to accomplish the proposed modifications of the existing customs, which would, it was hoped, lead to an amicable arrangement of the suit with Messrs. Combe and Co.

During the last eighteen months an investigation has been proceeding which has had for its object the removal of all disputed questions as regards both porters and meters; and there is good reason for believing that it will result in an arrangement satisfactory to the merchants, the corporation, and the fellowship. So soon as the proposed arrangement shall be placed in a more definite form, it will be submitted to the common council, in order that, if approved, it may be placed before Parliament in the shape of a Bill, as the law officers of the Crown have expressed an opinion that, however desirable such arrangements may be, they cannot be legally effected without the authority of an Act.

Thirdly. We proceed to answer the third charge, that the expenditure of the corporation is excessive in amount, and useless in its object.

1st. To support this statement it is said that the costs of the mayoralty are excessive, and that the inauguration banquet, and its attendant pageantry, are expensive, useless, and absurd.

To this we reply, that the allowance to the Lord Mayor to maintain the state and hospitality of his office (including the proportion of the banquet and pageantry) does not exceed a sum between 8,000*l.* and 9,000*l.* per annum. The casual sources of income, such as the fines for the admission of Jew brokers, grants of freedoms, &c.,—referred to by some of the witnesses,—which were formerly perquisites of office, have been for some years abolished, or commuted for money payments included in this sum.

We contend that the inauguration banquet is not profuse either in its character or cost; and that it is conducted as becomes a State banquet given to the Ministers of the Crown, the representatives of Foreign Powers, the elite of the learned professions, and the great commercial and monetary establishments of the City, by the corporation of the first City of the first country in the world. There are about 1,100 guests entertained; the expense, defrayed by the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs in equal moieties, amounts together to about 2,200*l.*, out of which sum the cost of the pageant and procession by land and by water does not on an average exceed 200*l.* Besides this sum, the corporation defray the costs of lighting and fitting up the hall.

We likewise contend that the pageant, being in continuation of an ancient custom, ought not to be abolished, without stronger reasons than have been yet assigned for its abolition. Previous to the last 9th of November, the Lord Mayor took the opinion of the bankers in Lombard Street, of the brokers in Mincing Lane, and of the market traders in Thames Street. They did not feel that it would occasion any such inconvenience to their pursuits as would render it improper for the procession to pass along those streets on its progress through his Lordship's ward. A difference of opinion upon this subject, however, exists; by many it is contended that, in this age of competition, the humbler classes of the people have but little respite from their labours; some hundreds of thousands of both sexes and all ages amuse the passing hour by gazing on this spectacle as a memorial of ancient times, which costs them nothing, and adds so trifling a charge to the other expenses of the day. A further justification of the corporation in incurring the charges of the banquet may be found in the fact that various sums have in past ages been given by citizens to the general fund to perpetuate festivities on state days. In the time of our Saxon ancestors, out of the funds raised by the guilds of the City, a portion was to be applied to festive purposes.

In answer, also, to the assertion of two or three of the witnesses, that the cost of the mayoralty is 25,000*l.* per annum, it should be stated that this is founded upon a report made by a committee in 1834. On this subject the attention of the Commissioners is invited to the proceedings of the common council, in which court, 1836, this report was examined and disallowed.

2d. As further evidence of the extravagant expenditure of the corporation, it is said that the allowances to committees are excessive in amount and mischievous in their application. The costs and efficiency of this department of corporation business, which is conducted by the committees, were inquired into by the former Royal Commissioners; and they have thus reported of the common council and its committees:—"Whatever "opinions may be entertained respecting the constitution of this body, the manner in "which its duties have been exercised seems to have given satisfaction, with very few "exceptions, to its constituents, and, as it appears to us, justly so. The system of commit-"tees, in particular, seems to operate very successfully, and to combine in a remarkable "degree the requisites of power and liability to control."

At the date of that former inquiry, the four standing committees received certain allowances in cash, called line money, which was distributable rateably, at the close of the year, among the members who had been present at the time their names were called over. Besides these sums, they had certain stipulated allowances to be expended in dinners, or other refreshments, for members. We present, in a tabular form, the allowances to the committees at the date of that inquiry, as well as those of the present time. We have likewise set out the average amount of the allowances at the commencement of the present century, when the influence of the merchants and bankers was felt in the administration of the affairs of the corporation. We have also set forth the amount of the revenue, under the management of the committees, as nearly as we have been able to ascertain it, and the average number of meetings of the committees in the course of the year:—

It will be observed that at the present time the line money, formerly allowed to the principal committees, is no longer paid to them; that allowances were abolished, and the other payments were regulated by an order of the Court of Common Council in the year 1836. The Commissioners in their report questioned the propriety of such a payment (amounting as they say to only 3*s.* 9¾*d.* for each attendance), as it might be said to place common councilmen in the invidious position of managers of business paid out of funds under their own control. A great difference of opinion prevails on this subject. Some persons think that, like the directors of the Bank of England, joint stock banks, dock companies, insurance offices, and other public establishments, it would be better to pay the committee men for their attendances in money, leaving it to be expended in refreshments or in any other mode that might suit their own convenience; but, in accordance with the judgment of the majority of the members, the line money was discontinued, and the allowances for tavern expenses were moderated, but retained.

Although the vast augmentation in the revenue and expenditure of the corporation has rendered the creation of additional committees necessary for the convenient division of labour, and although the number of meetings has been proportionately increased, yet the aggregate amount of the allowances to all the committees in the present day is less than it was at either of the former periods embraced in these returns.

3d. The salaries of the officers of the corporation are stated by some of the witnesses to be excessive.

The remarks we have just made as to the committees may be likewise applied to the officers. The Commissioners thus express themselves with respect to them:—"It is a common practice with the common council when, offices of any importance become vacant, to refer to a committee the business of examining into the duties of the office, and reporting whether they should be charged,—whether the office itself should be abolished, or consolidated with any other,—whether the salary should be altered,—and questions of a similar kind. The reports which have resulted from these inquiries furnish most valuable accounts of all relating to the office, and many most important reforms have been effected from time to time, with a very scrupulous regard to existing interests. We believe that the history of no other corporation furnishes such honourable testimonials of the vigilance, good sense, and justice of its legislative body.

In the time of our predecessors in the last century, the corporate offices have been bartered and sold, some with and some without the power of alienation, and with the right of remuneration from fees and emoluments which were undefined; it is impossible therefore to state with any precision what the amount of their emoluments may have been; but the Commissioners thus report of the offices as they existed in 1832:—

"With respect to the salaries in general, we have to observe that they are undoubtedly "framed on a very liberal scale; but we are of opinion that the question of their amount "is one which may safely be left to a civic legislature fairly chosen."

The practice of the corporation described above has, since the date of the report, been constantly observed. They state to us that their labours, cares, and responsibilities have been augmented as the amount of the revenue and expenditure of the corporation have increased; notwithstanding which, we believe that their net income is less than it was at the date of the Commissioners' report. We have no desire to screen those gentlemen, any more than ourselves, from the fullest inquiry upon this point, and we have directed them to submit themselves for examination upon this and every other matter upon which the Commissioners may think it right to inquire. Returns of the particulars and amounts of their salaries, made out by the officers, will be delivered to the Commissioners, from which they will be able to compare the amounts payable to them at the two periods.

Fourthly. Amongst the items of revenue and expenditure under the management of the common council to which exception has been taken, the City Police and the Sewers Commission are named, not on account of the manner in which their services are conducted, but principally because it was assumed that if amalgamated with corresponding establishments of the metropolis those functions would be more economically and more efficiently discharged. We will make a few observations upon each of these subjects.

Police.—It is well known that in ancient times the watch and ward in London and other ancient cities and towns were performed by the male inhabitants bearing their lot in return; their duties extending to the night only. Instead of rectifying the inconvenience of this system by an act of the governing body of the corporation, which might have been amended from time to time as experience called for alteration, an Act of Parliament was obtained (11th George II.) by which a nightly watch was established. Watchmen were to be appointed; their authority to act was limited to their respective wards, and their duties were confined to the nocturnal hours. The want of a day police, for which this Act made no provision, having been pressed upon the Court of Aldermen, they established, about twenty-five years ago, an effective day police, consisting, first, of sixty-eight, and afterwards of one hundred men, properly clothed and accoutred, to act over the entire City during the day only, under the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen. The cost of this corps of police amounted annually to about 7,000*l.*, and was maintained at the corporate charge. Some time afterwards another advance was made in the improvement of the system. Government had provided an adequate police force under commissioners, to act both by night and by day over the remainder of the metropolis, which up to that time had been entirely without any day police. A parliamentary committee investigated fully the whole matter, and a bill was brought in by the corporation, and passed, with the approbation of Parliament, to repeal the old Act establishing the nightly watch, and enabling the common council to form an efficient force for the protection of the City both by day and by night. Under this Act it is efficiently protected, having every portion covered. By subsequent Acts and additional regulations, the metropolitan police and the City police, the Aldermen of London, and the stipendiary magistrates of the home counties, have interchangeably the power of acting and executing warrants within the several jurisdictions as often as the public service may require. There are peculiarities in respect to the City force that distinguish it from the metropolitan police. The men are picked men, both as to age and height; and they are all required to reside within the City, so as to ensure prompt and vigorous united action in cases of emergency, in consequence of which both officers and men are allowed a higher rate of wages. The force is likewise required to be more numerous in proportion to the area and population of the City than in any other part of the metropolis; it is necessary that the ground should be more closely covered, both by night and by day; the vast number of vehicles that pass and repass through the streets of the City daily,—the multitudes of persons who continually have to resort to the Bank, where 24,000,000*l.* of dividends are annually paid, the Post Office, the Custom House, the Royal Exchange, the Stock Exchange, the insurance offices, banking houses, and other commercial and monetary establishments, many of them with property of great value about their persons,—require the daily service of a greater number of able, active, vigilant, and trustworthy men than any other part of the metropolis, where these circumstances do not concur; and by night a much larger force than under ordinary circumstances is required, because, although there are in the banks, counting-houses, warehouses, and shops in the City cash securities and goods of immense value, these establishments are almost deserted during the hours of night, leaving the property to the protection of the police. To secure this additional number of men of a superior order, under the control of their own officers, the corporation contribute out of their funds one fourth of the annual cost of the entire body. The Government likewise pay one fourth of the cost of the metropolitan police, in return for which they have a right to employ the men for special Governmental purposes, not only within the metropolis, but also to send them, as they have often done, to any part of the country where their services are required. We respectfully urge, in answer to the charges that have been made against us on this head, that the general interests of the metropolis cannot in any degree suffer from the independent exertion of two co-operative forces, acting as they do in harmony with each other for all purposes where co-operation is required, and acting separately only in the instances where special circumstances require a special treatment.

Sewers.—The objection to an independent commission for the lighting, paving, and sewerage of the City is founded upon the same arguments, and is to be met by the same reply. The affair of both the sewers and the police are superintended by members of the common council, selected by the inhabitants of each locality, whose wants and wishes are known and attended to by their representatives, with a diligence and intelligence that it would be impossible to impart to a central body acting for the entire metropolis, covering eighty square miles of territory, and representing two millions of inhabitants. Upon the score of united action with the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers in all matters where union is required, there can be no pretext for destroying this ancient and useful commission in the City, or for merging it in the larger and already over-burdened body which has charge of the rest of the metropolis, for under the Act of Parliament the common council appoint four representatives to act as members of the metropolitan board in all cases where combined action is required; and it has been proved by the experience of several years that the members of the united body can act in harmony with each other for the benefit of the whole community, while both sections have special regard for the interests they respectively represent.

It should not be forgotten that both before and since the formation of the Metropolitan Board and the Central Board of Health, the City commissioners and their officers have been diligently engaged in carrying into execution extensive measures for the organic improvement of the sewers, and for the sanatory improvement of the City. During the last few years the Commissioners have constructed many miles of sewers, necessarily at a very great expense, having to form them under the crowded thoroughfares within their jurisdiction. These sewers, having been substantially constructed, will last for many years, and the rates on the citizens will be reduced. If the change proposed by some of the witnesses were to be carried out, the citizens may be assessed to defray in other localities the cost of works which they have already provided in their own. The attention of the Commissioners is respectfully invited to the report of Mr. Walker, Sir William Cubit, and Mr. Brunel, which was made in 1848, and will be laid before them.

Since the period of that report, further and extensive works have been executed on the principle approved by those eminent engineers, till at last the sewerage of the City is all but completed, and the reduction of the rates has already commenced.

Fifthly. It is said that the accounts of the Corporation are intentionally kept in an unintelligible form.

We deny both the asserted fact and the motive imputed. The Chamberlain keeps the requisite set of books for the conduct of the business of his office, in which the general transactions of all the various funds in his department are daily posted and balanced. He keeps, in addition, a separate set of books for each of the distinct accounts or trusts in respect of which he is treasurer, the entries of which are regularly balanced with the general cash books. This separation of funds (without which inextricable confusion would result) is provided for, at the same time that an efficient check is furnished by the re-duplication of entries. These accounts are again arranged, for audit, according to the system known as "charge and discharge," which has been in operation more than a century. This system affords proof of accuracy, and has called forth expressions of satisfaction from all who have made themselves acquainted with its working. That it is quite misunderstood by those who have given evidence upon it before this Commission will be made apparent.

Abstracts of all the accounts of funds arising from public monies under the control of the corporation are laid annually before Parliament.

Upon this head it will probably be sufficient to add, that, apart from all theory, the efficiency of the system, as now established, will be best proved by its practical working, which has afforded perfect security for the various funds committed by the corporation to the charge of the Chamberlain.

The statements made to the effect that the audit is conducted apart from the check afforded by the comptroller's charge,—that vouchers are not produced,—and that the audit is performed by the officers, and not by the auditors, are quite contrary to fact. Without asserting that the corporation arrangements in these respects are perfect, and admitting, that from time to time all well-considered improvements should be introduced, we yet feel confident that this branch of the corporate administration will not be found unworthy of comparison with that of other public departments, municipal or even imperial, and is undeserving of the censure bestowed upon it by the parties alike unacquainted with the system and its details. 11th Jan. 1854.

Sixthly. It is said that the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and common council, during the present century, have been and are shopkeepers; that they are greatly inferior to the corporators of former times, in rank, respectability, intelligence, and public spirit; that they are unfit for their positions, and have been regarded with disrespect by the citizens.

Statements to this effect have been made by many of those who had been examined. One witness condescends to refer to vulgar caricatures; and others indulge in coarse and disparaging language, and in terms more or less offensive. One witness alleges that a slur is cast upon us by the higher classes of the commercial community, and insinuations abound throughout the evidence that the corporation have fallen into disrepute because the aldermen and common councilmen, unlike the great corporators of former times, are now taken from the retail shopkeepers of an inferior grade. As far as the Commissioners are concerned, it would seem almost unnecessary to notice such aspersions, for the witness making them can hardly have hoped to bias the judicial mind of the Commissioners by such statements; but as they have been circulated through the public press, as assertions made upon oath, some of them by men of character and station, it becomes our duty to reply to them, lest they should be considered unanswerable, if left without refutation or comment.

One of this class of witnesses says, that the corporation impede all public improvements, and are guilty of jobbing and mismanagement; and he attempts to support this statement by adducing the following instances:—

1st. He says that the corporation jobbed away the control of the New River, in consequence of which the citizens are surcharged for water to ten times the amount they ought to pay. The corporation relinquished all concern with the New River two centuries ago.

2d. That the corporation, by collusion with the Government, jobbed away the Gresham House and grounds, on lease in perpetuity, for 500*l.* a year, by which the public lost 108,000*l.* a year, the sum for which the lease has recently sold. This transaction, be its character what it may, took place in 1769.

3d. He says, that the corporation refused to make docks from London Bridge to Blackwall, in consequence of which the merchants abandoned the corporation, and established the London Docks. This however was in 1799.

Another witness, though he employs less offensive language speaks with equal disrespect of the corporation, as being now composed of persons of an inferior class. He fixes the same period as the former witness as the date of the downfall of the body in commercial respectability. Although this gentleman professes to speak as from his own personal knowledge and observation, he totally mistakes facts, which, if correctly stated, would entirely negative the inference he draws from them.

The witness represents that his friend, the late Mr. Robert Williams the banker, of Birchin Lane, threw up his gown, and that a partner in Glyn's house did the same, and from that time there seemed to be a sort of slur cast upon the position of alderman.

How far Mr. Robert Williams, the gentleman referred to, meant to cast any such slur upon the position, or the colleagues he left behind him, may be judged of by the following letter addressed to them on his retirement.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen.

My Lord and Gentlemen,

As I find myself quite unable, through the multiplicity of business in which I am engaged, to give that time and attention to the duties of a magistrate which I think such an office requires, and knowing how important it is that they should not be neglected, I think it both for the interest and credit of your respectable Court and my fellow-citizens in general, that by retiring from my present situation I should give an opportunity to so respectable a part of the City to elect some person better qualified to represent it in the magistracy. On these grounds, I will request your Lordship and the Court to accept the resignation of my gown.

In thus retiring from a situation which I shall ever consider as the most honourable a citizen of London can be placed in, I beg to add that I do so with sentiments of the deepest gratitude and respect for the Court of Aldermen collectively, and to almost every individual of it, for such marks of cordiality and friendship as I have received, and which I never can forget.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord and Gentlemen,
Your most obedient and faithful servant,
Bedford Square, 25th May 1801. ROBERT WILLIAMS junior.

When the late Mr. Robert Williams retired from the corporation, he left behind him Sir William Curtis, Sir John Perring, and Sir Charles Price, all of them baronets, and bankers of London, who remained members of the Courts till the day of their respective deaths, and also Sir Richard Carr Glyn, the head of his eminent house, who remained for more than a quarter of a century till he retired full of honours and of years.

We deny that there is any foundation for the assertion so often made, in terms more or less disrespectful, that the Corporators as a body are inferior to the corporators of former times, in the qualities essential to fill with honour and usefulness the position they occupy.

Several witnesses, who in their evidence appeared anxious to separate themselves from their fellow-citizens, by fanciful distinctions of classes, speak of themselves as merchants and gentlemen commercially connected with the city, while they describe the corporators by the title of "retail dealers of an inferior class." We deny the existence of such class distinctions in the various walks of commerce and trade as has been assumed. It is true you may define the characteristics which in the earlier history of commerce, distinguished the merchant, the manufacturer, the wholesale and retail trader, from each other; but we say that commercial operations are now so intermixed that it would be difficult to distinguish the various classes referred to, and there are probably few of the members of either Court who are engaged exclusively in retail trade.

Of the existing Court of Aldermen, eleven have graduated to their present position through the common council.

The personal honour and respectability of the aldermen, and the perfect honesty and independence with which they have discharged the duties of their office, have not been impugned by any witness; on the contrary, they have been made the subjects of praise by some of the witnesses who upon principle would prefer stipendiaries.

We believe that there exists amongst the citizens of London a very strong prepossession in favour of the retention of aldermen as magistrates, instead of having justice administered in the City by stipendiaries; and, in our opinion, there exist well-founded reasons for this prepossession. Almost all the aldermen are or have been engaged in the pursuit of commerce and trade within the City, and have been accustomed to judicial inquiries, by occupying the post successively of petty, special, and grand jurymen for many years. In the great majority of cases that come before the aldermen the matters to be investigated are questions of fact, on which their commerce with the world, and their knowledge acquired as jurymen, prove of the greatest value; and the relative proportions of acquittals and convictions, which their commitments to the Central Criminal Court manifest, prove that the judgment exercised by them is, at least, as frequently justified by the result of the trial as in cases of other commitments to the same tribunal. No witness has questioned the high character and professional ability of the clerks in attendance upon the Lord Mayor and the aldermen in the justice rooms. To them is committed the exclusive duty of adjusting the forms of the proceedings, to meet the cases brought before the aldermen; and they are men of legal education and attainment, which qualify them to assist the aldermen with their judgment and advice in cases where questions of a purely technical character arise, upon which it may be supposed that aldermen, like all other magistrates, not of the legal profession, are not so familiar.

We consider that all questions as to the manner in which justice is practically administered by the Lord Mayor and aldermen are more fitly the subjects of evidence than statement. We therefore propose to place before the Commissioners, for examination, the clerks and other witnesses who can furnish facts upon which the Commissioner's judgment may be more safely formed. The objection raised in the evidence against the aldermen is, that they are not of the same rank and standing in the commercial world as some of the aldermen in former times. We assert that it would be difficult to find in the House of Commons, or in any other large body in the kingdom, the same number of men, who could be taken alphabetically or by lot from the entire mass, who could produce so many evidences as these gentlemen do that they enjoy a large share of public confidence, expressed in so many different ways. Besides being all elected by the inhabitants of their wards, out of the twenty-six, eight of them are or have been members of the House of Commons, five of them for large metropolitan constituencies; fifteen of the aldermen, as well as several members of the common council, are county magistrates, some of them for two or three counties; one of the aldermen is, and has been for many years, a bank director, and chairman of the society of merchants trading to the continent; one of them is the chairman of the committee of joint stock banks of London. Two of them are directors of the London and Westminster Bank, two of them are directors of the London Joint Stock Bank, and two of them of the Union Bank, and most of them, who have leisure and inclination, like many of the common council, are directors of insurance companies, gas companies, canal and water companies connected with the metropolis. It is hardly necessary to observe, that men are chosen for these offices of trust by their brother shareholders, who have the strongest motives to select persons of character and station, of respectability and probity, of business aptitude and business habits, to be the most faithful guardians of their money and their vital interests.

There are occasions when men are compelled to assert their true position. In the present case, therefore, we deem it a duty, not only to ourselves, but to the citizens who have elected us, and to the important interests they have committed to our charge, to pursue this part of the subject still further than we have hitherto done. The witnesses against the corporation have not only failed to establish, but they have almost abstained from making, any tangible charge against our conduct as corporators, as if they hoped, by casting imputations upon our respectability, and by instituting invidious comparisons with former times, to justify their attacks upon the corporation itself. We, who are not conscious of any corruption in our administration, are not surprised at this course having been taken. It will be remembered that amongst the parties examined there are some witnesses who have had the means and opportunity of knowing all that we know, and have, in their evidence, shown no disposition to screen or withhold anything that could injure the character of the corporation or its individual members. We therefore feel ourselves justified in concluding that it is principally by a fallacious comparison of the present and past generation of corporators that it is hoped by them to succeed in this object.

It is almost as difficult to find a dividing line to separate two generations as it is to make the separation of commercial classes. But as two of the principal witnesses to this part of the case have fixed upon the end of the last and the commencement of the present century as the point on which the respectability of the corporation was said to turn, we will adopt that as the bounding line between the two periods, and we will examine the condition of the corporation in the 18th and 19th centuries.

In the 18th century, the aldermen obtained an Act of Parliament (the 11th Geo. I.,) by which they contracted the municipal constituency, and, giving out of their own hands the power to regulate their own proceedings, they encumbered their elections with a mass of expenses and dilatory forms which are and have been the admitted obstruction to the many beneficial alterations which might otherwise have been made in our corporate constitution. In the 19th century the aldermen have joined with the common councilmen in seeking to repeal this Act, and to place the constituency and the forms of election upon an extended and solid foundation. In the 18th century, four years after the passing of the Act, the corporation raised the redemption fine for freedoms to 25*l.*, besides the charge of the livery companies, and numerous fees to officers, thus imposing an additional pecuniary impediment to the exercise of elective rights. In the 19th century the corporation remitted the 25*l.*, abolished most of the fees, and passed a resolution admitting householders and persons carrying on trade in the City without the intervention of the livery companies. In the 18th century, non-freemen were constantly harassed and sued by common informers, who put the old Acts of common council in force for their own private gain. In the 19th century the common council put an end to the trade of the common informers by passing an Act of common council interdicting such proceedings. In the 18th century almost all the officers of the corporation were remunerated by fees, and the offices were sold or disposed of, both in possession and reversion. Offices judicial and administrative were disposed of in this manner, although the produce of the sale rarely found its way into the corporation chest. In the 19th century, as offices have become vacant, the fees have been diminished or abolished; not only has the sale of offices been discontinued, but the corporation has, as occasion served, bought up the right of alienation wherever it existed. In the 18th century the corporation likewise sold and leased, or authorized the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs to sell or lease, at fines and at nominal rents, the profits of the markets of the City, as well as the profits of certain coal, corn, and other meters' places. In the 19th century no such sale can take place. By payment of large sums of money, and by granting equivalent annuities, and post obit compensations, which have now been almost all discharged, the corporation have bought up the revenues thus wasted in former times.

In the 18th century, in consequence of the system of administration then prevailing, the corporation became in a very embarrassed state.

During the 19th century, by increased attention to the business of the corporation, and by an improved management of its affairs, all its old debts have been paid off, the revenue has been lifted above its expenditure, and its credit has been so completely re-established, that when, for the purpose of effecting great public improvements, the corporation has had occasion to go into the market to borrow very large sums of money, its seal has commanded the required loans on the lowest and most advantageous terms.

During the 18th century members of both courts were eligible to corporate offices and employments in the gift of the corporation, and such offices and employments were held by them to a large amount.

In the 19th century none of these offices can be held by a member of either court; by standing orders of the common council every office is closed against every member, and every employment and every contract is closed against, not only every member, but his partners also. The self-denying regulations of the Court of Common Council in this respect have perhaps extended beyond those of any other popular assembly, for they render all its members ineligible for office, unless they have for three months before the election ceased to be members of the court. The sons of members of the court are likewise rendered ineligible for office by a recent resolution.

During the 18th century bankrupts and insolvents might remain corporators; the Court of Aldermen thence became a very mixed body; bankers and bankrupts remained seated together; the vicissitudes of commerce that swept the merchant from his place left the magistrate in his seat, and many men continued to retain office long after the power to discharge its duties has ceased.

In the 19th century this anomalous state of circumstances no longer exists; the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons obtained an Act of Parliament, by which not only were the seats of corporators vacated by bankruptcy and insolvency, but absence from duty for six months worked a forfeiture of office.

In the 18th century, and even at the commencement of the 19th century, the corporation, with an income of 80,000*l.* a year, remunerated their four standing committees with cash allowances to the annual amount of 1,100*l.*, and tavern expenses ad libitum, amounting, upon an average of seven years, to upwards of 4,000*l.* per annum. But in the 19th century (by a series of resolutions) the same four committees, administering a revenue of 210,000*l.* a year, discharge their duties without any money allowance, and with tavern bills restricted to 1,200*l.* a year among them all. In the 18th century the 25*l.* redemption fine for the admission of freemen was imposed and exacted; but two donations of 100*l.* each were all that was returned out of the corporate funds to their indigent widows.

In the 19th century the fine has been remitted; but for the last twenty years 500*l.* has been annually applied to this just and beneficent purpose. In the 18th century no assistance was rendered to public education in the City, and the corporation, resting satisfied with performing the liberal trusts of John Carpenter's will, gave a superior education, with board and clothing, to four youths, out of the revenues of an estate left for that purpose.

In the 19th century the corporation have interpreted the same will in a liberal as well as a literal sense; they still give board and education to four youths, and they have likewise expended 20,000*l.* in the erection of the City of London schools, and contribute out of their own funds 900*l.* a year to aid the education of the scholars.

In the 18th century the corporation made no provision for the education and maintenance of the orphans of freemen who had contributed to their fund.

In the 19th century the corporation has erected and endowed an orphan school, in which provision is made for boarding and educating orphans of freemen at the expense of the corporation.

The fines paid paid by persons for not serving the office of sheriff, and the ancient fine of 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for freemen's admission, are applied to this fund.

In the 18th century the corporation provided no almshouses for decayed freemen.

In the 19th century the corporation have contributed upwards of 4,000*l.* towards the erection of almshouses, and have endowed them for the benefit of poor decayed citizens.

If blame is due to the alienation of the house and ground left by Sir Thomas Gresham for the purpose of education, as stated by one of the witnesses, this took place in 1769, and that reproach lies on the 18th and not on the 19th century.

In the 19th century the present corporation have notwithstanding obtained favour with distinguished persons who have desired to find faithful guardians of funds destined to the purpose of education. Mr. Beaufoy generously invested 6,000*l.* for four exhibitions to the University for scholars at the City school, and constituted the corporation guardians of his bounty. Alderman Salomans, a member of the existing corporation, has followed this example; and when the proprietors of the Times determined that a large sum of money presented to them for a great service rendered to the commercial community should be applied in the endowment of a scholarship, they selected the City of London School, and appointed the Lord Mayor and Chamberlain of London trustees.

In the 18th century it appears to have been the policy of the corporation to avoid publicity in the conduct of its affairs; the Common Council frequently, and the Court of Aldermen and Commissioners of Sewers constantly, deliberated with closed doors; they did not publish accounts or minutes, and gave no facilities for the reporters of the public press.

In the 19th century a totally opposite policy prevails. The corporation publish their annual accounts, the minutes of their proceedings, and the reports of their committees. To insure a full attendance and a knowledge of the voting of each member, lists of the members present at the courts, and the names on divisions, are printed in the minutes. The Court of Aldermen, the Commissioners of Sewers, as well as the common council, hold their meetings in public; they give every encouragement in their power to promote the publication of their proceedings, and afford the most ample and convenient accommodation to the reporters of the public press.

We desire emphatically to say that by thus setting forth in comparison the acts of the corporation in former days, and the acts of the corporation at the present time, we are but conducting to its legitimate conclusion an argument forced upon us by those who have impugned not alone the acts of the corporation, but the character and position of its members in the present day, as compared or rather contrasted with the corporators of former times. We confess that it had never entered into our minds to institute such a comparison, until it was presented to us by the observations of the witnesses who have been examined.

We have no desire to cast censure upon the members of the corporation who lived in evil times. In those times officers of every grade, judges, ministers of state, the Church, and the Crown itself, were wont to sell their patronage, and to dispose of places in their gift, as well in possession as reversion.

Reviewing, however, all that has been alleged before this Commission against the corporation, and the absence of all imputation of moral turpitude or personal corruption against any of its present members, and impressed with the contrast above drawn between the administration of its affairs in the last and the present centuries, we hope and believe that much of the obloquy to which our body has been exposed is attributable to the tradition of ancient abuses for which the present generation are not responsible, and to the errors of our predecessors, which it has been our constant endeavour to correct. 11th Jan. 1854.

Under this belief, and strong in conscious rectitude of purpose in the performance of our duties, the corporation has courted inquiries, and relies with confidence on the result. They believe it will relieve them from a load of undeserved and unjust reproach. Having nothing to conceal, and acknowledging the weighty trust reposed in them, the corporation and all its members appeal, from prejudice and uninformed abuse, to the impartiality and judicial wisdom of you the Commissioners of Her Most Gracious Majesty, and while they seek the means of improved and more effective action in extending the basis of popular confidence, on which alone their institutions can safely stand, they challenge the severest scrutiny, and contending for the maintenance of their just rights, they trust to truth for their vindication.

By order of the committee,

HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, Town Clerk.

Guildhall, 10th January 1854.

BENJAMIN SCOTT, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows: B. Scott, Esq.

4430. What has been the nature of your connexion with the corporation of the City of London?—I have been connected with the chamberlain's office for rather more than twenty-four years. I have been for twelve years past the chief clerk in the chamberlain's office.

4431. In that situation have you necessarily become well acquainted with the finances of the City of London?—Yes; I have had good opportunities of making myself acquainted with their finances.

4432. When there was a vacancy in the office of City chamberlain recently, you were one of the candidates, were not you?—I was.

4433. What are the duties of the chief clerk in the chamberlain's office?—The duties of the chief clerk are principally to attend committees of the corporation, and afford them information upon the state of their accounts, and generally to superintend the accounts in the chamber.

4434. He is a sort of deputy to the chamberlain, is he not?—He has not been considered in the light of a deputy to the chamberlain. I think the title of chief clerk expresses what the duties of the office have been; he is in commission with the chamberlain, as it were, to sign cheques and to hold keys, in order that there may be an efficient check upon the funds in the chamber.

4435. By whom is the chief clerk appointed?—By the chamberlain.

4436. What is his salary?—£850 a year.

4437. Is he removable by the chamberlain?—He is; but since the year 1842 the corporation have had the right of approval of the appointment; that is, the chamberlain could not appoint any one to the office without the previous sanction of the corporation.

4438. Is the sum of 850*l.* a year the entire emolument of the office?—That is the whole of the amount of the emolument paid by the chamberlain out of the proceeds of his office. The clerks in the office receive from various committees, from time to time, what are called gratuities for any extra diligence shown, and upon the audit of their accounts.

4439. When you say committees, do you mean committees of the common council?—Committees of the common council.

4440. Have committees of the common council the discretion of ordering payments to officers of the corporation for extra service?—Yes; I speak of small sums of that kind.

4441. What is about the average amount received by the chief clerk in the chamberlain's office, in addition to his regular salary?—The gratuities probably amount to 50*l.* a year.

4442. Is that the whole of his additional receipts?—That is the whole of the profit connected with the chief clerk's department.

4443. The office may be said to be paid by about 900*l.* a year?—Yes. I should explain that. I have held an appointment under the corporation independently of the chief clerkship of the chamberlain, which office is termed, "Clerk to prepare accounts for the auditors," for which I have received 100*l.* a year from the corporation.

4444. Is that office connected with the chamberlain's department?—It is in some respects connected with the chamberlain's department. The duties consist in arranging the chamberlain's accounts in the form of charge and discharge previously to the accounts being submitted to the auditors.

4445. That appears to be a business closely connected with the duties of the chamberlain's office?—It has been considered the chamberlain's duty to keep all the books which a treasurer would of necessity keep; that is, cash books, and ledgers, and journals, which are usually kept by book-keepers; but it was not considered by the corporation as part of the duty of the chamberlain to arrange their accounts in that particular form over again, after he had already made his entries according to the usual practice in the office.

B. Scott, Esq.

Therefore a party was appointed about the middle of the last century to arrange the accounts in that particular fashion.

4446. Do you mean in the form in which they are submitted to the auditors?—In the form in which they are submitted to the auditors. That was very convenient to the auditors, and afforded a proof of the correctness of the accounts, which could not so well be obtained from the ordinary mode of book-keeping. An independent officer in the corporation exists, who is called the comptroller. The comptroller's account was abstracted from his books into this account, which the clerk to the auditors makes out, so that it could be compared item by item with the chamberlain's accounts.

4447. What are the functions of the comptroller?—The comptroller is the conveyancing officer to the corporation, and has the custody of all their leases; therefore he is possessed of information as to the revenue which ought to be charged against the chamberlain, for him to account for. It is the duty of the comptroller to furnish this charge annually to the chamberlain; and it is the duty of the clerk for preparing the accounts for the auditors to bring the two accounts into juxtaposition, and so to arrange them that the one account may form a check upon the other account.

4448. It has been represented to the Commissioners that the City accounts are kept in a cumbrous and confused manner. Do you conceive that statement to be well founded?—I do not think there is any foundation whatever for the statement. It has been made by persons who have never made themselves acquainted with the accounts, and have taken no pains whatever to acquaint themselves with the accounts. Some of the witnesses who have so spoken could have had the amplest opportunities of access to every account in Guildhall, so as to have acquainted themselves with them, if they had thought fit. The corporation have taken great pains, at various periods, by referring the matter to committees, to arrange the accounts in a way most intelligible to themselves and to those who are interested in them. The last occasion of that kind it will be my duty to bring before the Commissioners. A committee was appointed in the year 1839, and they brought up a report on the 26th of September 1839, upon that subject. I refer to this case because it is under those orders to which I am now about to refer that the accounts are kept in their present form. That committee was appointed upon the motion of Mr. Anderton, an active and intelligent member of the Court of Common Council, and they sat from the middle of 1839 till 1841 before the matter was finally decided upon. On the 26th of September 1839 they presented their report to the Court of Common Council, recommending that a net account should be made out; that is, that there should be, first, an account in which the gross proceeds of the revenue of the corporation should be set forth, and that then the expenses should be deducted, showing only the net account. That system is adopted in Liverpool. This is the report which I will put in, recommending the net system of keeping the accounts. (The report was delivered in.) The accounts were printed in a form which was much objected to by the members of the corporation. The system of deducting the expenses on the receipt side of the account caused great confusion, and was strongly objected to when it was printed and placed in the hands of the members. That system was abandoned. The matter was referred back again to the committee; and on the 27th of February 1840 they brought up a second report, which I would also desire to put in, for the information of the Commissioners. (The same was delivered in.) That report was sent back again to the committee, that they might avail themselves of the advice of all those members of the corporation who had acted in the capacity of auditors of the accounts, either as auditors appointed by the livery, or as auditors appointed by the City lands committee. The next report brought up, as will be seen (report, 17th December 1840, put in), recommends the continuance of the system of charge and discharge, which had been introduced about a century before as the system of arranging the accounts, and which system I had always understood from my predecessor was recommended to the corporation by a committee consisting of twelve merchants of London, who were appointed, at the request of the corporation, to advise with them on the subject.

4,449. Do you mean twelve merchants, independent of the corporation?—Yes; twelve merchants, independent of the corporation, were requested to meet as a committee, to advise them as to the best system for the public accounts of the corporation.

4,450. Do you remember the date of that investigation?—I have understood from my father, who preceded me in the service of the corporation, that it was about the middle of the eighteenth century that the system was introduced upon such recommendation. On the 17th of December 1840 a further report was brought from this committee, which ultimately fixed the arrangement of the accounts as they now stand and are now printed. I put in this report because it contains the balance sheet, which agrees with the balance sheet in the printed accounts which are before the Commission. It is under that report that the accounts are arranged in the form in which they are now brought before you. On the 28th of January 1841 that report was agreed to by the Court of Common Council. Perhaps the Commissioners will now permit me to offer a few words in explanation of the evidence which has been given, alleging that the comptroller's charge and the chamberlain's discharge do not agree? I refer particularly to Mr. Acland's evidence, at page 62, No. 564, and also to the statement of figures put in by that witness at page 65 of the evidence. This is a point of some importance to have cleared up, because if there are discrepancies between the accounts of the two officers, as alleged to the extent of 9,000*l.*, it throws discredit upon the whole accounts of the corporation. Perhaps I may be permitted to read part of the evidence given by Mr. Acland?

B. Scott, Esq.

"There is another officer of the corporation called the comptroller, and at the close of "the account of the chamberlain you will find the account of the comptroller, in which he "debits the chamberlain for the receipts under the head of 'City income.' Now it occurred "to me that the comptroller's account debiting the chamberlain should be a check on the "chamberlain's account debiting himself. Of the thirteen items of which it is composed, I "find but one item that agrees in amount. The first item at page 1 is 'By general rents "within the City of London and liberties thereof.' The chamberlain debits himself with "43,415*l.* 7*s.* 5½*d.* At page 69 the comptroller debits the chamberlain for the same "item 44,455*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, being a difference which should leave the chamberlain debtor to "the corporation beyond his account stated 1,040*l.* 3*s.* 7½*d.*" Passing through other items, the answer concludes, "The office of the comptroller I need scarcely state is to check "the accounts between the chamberlain and the corporation of London, and there is only "one item in the account in which they agree. The total difference between the two "accounts is upwards of 9,000*l.*"

If the Commissioners will refer to page 65 they will see the figures put in by the witness, in which this statement is in substance repeated. Now to that I would reply, that the comptroller's charge and the chamberlain's statement of cash received, being two different things, it is not at all likely, in the nature of things, that they ever should agree; indeed if they should agree on any head it would afford an assumption rather that there had been collusion, and that the accounts were incorrect. The comptroller's charge is a statement made out, independently of the chamberlain, of the revenue which ought to be received in the chamber during the year.

4,451. It is an estimate, is not it?—I do not so regard it. I consider an estimate to convey the idea of an account loosely made out. The chamberlain's account is a statement of what he does actually receive in the course of the year, the difference between the two accounts being the arrear at the commencement of the former year and the arrears at the close, which are carried to the next year's account. Here are the books, which I would beg to lay before the Commissioners (producing the same). By reference to those books (producing the comptroller's charge) you will see the entry, "Henry Warburton, two houses, east side of James Street, let to William Matthews, commencement of lease, Christmas 1824, term 42 years, which expires in 1866, annual rent 89*l.*, and period charged for one year to Christmas 1852, 19*l.*" The same process is gone through with about 4,000 rents, and all the other revenue of the corporation. The chamberlain is charged with 19*l.* on that one item. If he receives that 19*l.* in the year, the charge and discharge would be the same. If Mr. Warburton pays anything in advance, the chamberlain's account would be in excess; if he fell into arrear it would be, say, a quarter in arrear; therefore it is impossible that the two accounts should agree. I would just notice, in addition, on this subject, that the chamberlain has thought it right to place among the accounts returned a sheet showing the charge and discharge upon every head of account for the year 1852; so that upon comparing the accounts you will see that every item which the witnesses have referred to is perfectly correct. It is now my duty to place before you the chamberlain's account for 1852. This account is made out similar to the comptroller's charge under each head, each tenant being posted separately. The account is kept in four columns. He, the chamberlain, brings forward against every tenant from the former audited account the arrears of the former year; he charges himself from the comptroller's books with the money to be received; he then acknowledges the receipt in the third column, and carries forward the arrears in the fourth column. Upon that system the first two columns must agree in every case with the last two columns; so that the whole revenue of the corporation is brought into charge and discharge in that way, and worked through, as far as the revenue is concerned. Then, as to expenditure, the sum which the chamberlain admits to have received is disbursed, and vouchers in every case are produced to justify the disbursement.

4,452. What is your warrant for a payment out of the City funds?—The different courts and committees have different powers accorded to them of drawing. The usual mode of drawing is by the signatures of seven members. All committees of the corporation draw their warrants upon the chamberlain, signed by seven members of the corporation. The Courts of Aldermen and Common Council draw by the town clerk, who signs, and is their officer.

4,453. At present, the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council have both separately a power of drawing upon the City funds?—They have; but virtually the Court of Aldermen only draw under certain heads; that has been the practice for many years past. They are understood to have each of them unlimited powers of drawing upon the City's cash; but, in practice, the Court of Aldermen have limited themselves to drawing for the purposes of prisons and conservancy, and matters specially connected with their own court for the administration of justice in the City.

4,454. For pensions, for example; do not the Court of Aldermen possess, and have not they exercised, the power of drawing upon the City cash?—Pensions connected with their own court.

4,455. Is there any limit, either by law or practice, to the amount to which those pensions are granted by the Court of Aldermen?—No; there has been no limit, beyond what they have themselves imposed in making the drafts.

4,456. What, upon the average, is the ordinary annual amount of money drawn by the

B. Scott, Esq.

11th Jan 1854.

Court of Aldermen in that way?—It appears in the printed accounts which have been laid before you in full detail.

4,457. Is there an account of the pensions granted each year?—Yes; they are stated in full detail, with a star against the item if it is paid drawn by the Court of Aldermen. With respect to the audit, the witnesses have stated that the auditors do not perform the duty themselves, but it is devolved upon the officers. It is my duty to contradict that statement. The officers take no part whatever in the audit, except laying the books before the auditors, and furnishing them with the vouchers and books necessary for the verification of the accounts. The audit is performed by the auditors themselves, and they have for every payment a legal order laid before them.

4,458. How are the auditors chosen?—The auditors of the City and bridge-house accounts are chosen by the livery in common hall.

4,459. Do you think there would be any advantage in having a system of audit entirely unconnected with the corporation?—The system of appointing auditors in common hall has not always worked well. There have been very often differences of opinion between the common hall and the corporation as to what amount of power each body possessed. That is the question referred to by Mr. Williams in his evidence. In the year 1829 he was an auditor, in common with Mr. Henry Hunt, of political celebrity. They then claimed the power of controlling the expenditure of the corporation, as well as auditing the chamberlain's account. They had legal vouchers placed before them for every thing; but in some cases they demanded to exercise a control over the expenditure, and to constitute themselves judges of the price of the articles supplied. I recollect a circumstance, I being at that time in office, that a Mr. Barrett was one of the auditors, who had been a wholesale grocer, and seeing that the prisons were supplied with the article of pepper at a price higher than he thought he could supply it at wholesale, he raised the question, and demanded of the chamberlain that he should not pay any item of that kind without inspecting the bill. In point of fact he endeavoured to make the chamberlain answerable for the price of pepper contracted for by the Court of Aldermen.

4,460. Are you acquainted with the system of audit pursued in the Audit Office at Somerset House of the Government accounts?—The "Orphans' Fund," which was one of the largest accounts we have had in our office, was audited in that department till about the year 1834. I am of course acquainted with the system, so far as the Orphans' Fund is concerned.

4,461. They examine into the appropriation very strictly, do not they, and guard against any possible misapplication of the fund?—I believe a very strict audit took place under those commissioners. We had never, in my recollection, any serious question with them; but they were very particular.

4,462. Do you believe the system of auditing the City accounts as it now exists sufficiently guards against misappropriation?—I think it is just possible, if the officers of the chamber were not what I believe they have been for very many years past, persons of the highest integrity, that occasionally the livery do not send auditors who would be an efficient check.

4,463. Is not it right, in establishing a proper system of audit, without making any imputation upon any individuals, to guard as far as possible against all misappropriation of any kind on the part of the officers whose accounts are audited?—I think nothing can be more desirable. I do not think there is any thing the corporation would desire more than to have an efficient check upon all their accounts. They have taken the greatest pains themselves, as auditors, to investigate and test the accounts which come before them; and where the Acts of Parliament have left it optional with them either to have additional auditors or not, they have invariably availed themselves of the option. For instance, the Commissioners of Sewers under the Act of Parliament are at liberty to audit their own accounts, and to pass them. They have a clause which gives to the common council the option of appointing additional auditors. The Act says they may do so if they think fit. The corporation have invariably appointed those auditors, showing that they have every desire to submit everything to the proper test.

4,464. You have stated that in your opinion the present system of audit of the City accounts is not altogether satisfactory; you said you thought that more efficient persons might sometimes be appointed as auditors; do you think, independently of that, there is anything in the present system of audit which might be improved?—I think the principal objection is, that the auditors are appointed by a very numerous body. The office is so inconsiderable in point of value that it is not likely to be sought after, and therefore the power to return auditors is in the hands of persons who may not be interested in sending in all cases the best men.

4,465. Do you think one of the best professional accountants who could be found in London would be the proper auditor?—In some respects a professional accountant would form a good auditor; in some other respects a professional accountant would not form a good auditor. My experience of public accountants has been, that they have each of them some particular crochet as to the form of the account; they do not look, in my opinion, sufficiently into the question of whether an account is just and right, but whether it is in the particular shape in which they from their education has been accustomed to. That has been my experience.

4,466. Do you think a public accountant a bad judge of what is the clearest and most intelligible form in which an account can be rendered?—I have always ound that a professional accountant has had his particular hobby, if I may so call it, as to the form of the account; and the effect of placing it in the hands of a public accountant, unless the office were made permanent, would be, that the whole system of keeping the books would be thrown out of shape every two or three years, to meet the views of the parties elected. It would be a great evil, in a large office, where public accounts are kept, that the order should be disturbed; it prevents the rendering of accounts, and causes great hindrance to business. I am not placed forward by the corporation with a view of suggesting alterations, or I should be able, perhaps, to speak more freely upon this as upon other subjects. The corporation will be prepared, doubtless, to make suggestions, at some future period of the proceedings of the Commission; but if I might express my own opinion upon the subject, I conceive that if the corporation were under such a board as the Commissioners for auditing Public Accounts it would remove from them a weight of suspicion which now attaches to them most unjustly. I have always found, with respect to the Orphans' Fund, all public bodies, committees of the House of Commons and others, were perfectly satisfied with the accounts as rendered to that board, and that a fair and just audit was obtained by that method. I merely give it as my own opinion, that if it were my own case I would rather submit myself to a public audit of that kind than be under the imputation that the accounts are not what they ought to be.

4,467. You think it would be a satisfaction to any body holding the office of chamberlain that his accounts should be examined by auditors perfectly independent of the corporation, and who were obviously competent to discharge those duties?—I think it would be very satisfactory to the chamberlain, and very satisfactory and beneficial to the corporation.

4,468. Is there any suggestion which you can make to us as to the manner in which you think it would be, upon the whole, most expedient to provide for the audit of the City accounts?—I think I have already given my own private opinion upon the subject, that some such public board as the Commissioners for auditing the Public Accounts should be fixed on, who would not be actuated by motives which might sway individuals, and would not be likely to change the system when it was once adopted. With respect to the accounts, it is my duty, as representing that department, to state, that on very many occasions they have been very highly spoken of by those who have taken great pains to look into them, and in proportion as they have been looked into so far has the testimony been favourable to the corporation and the management department. I might say, since I have held the office of clerk for preparing the accounts for the auditors, some of the most respectable men in the City of London in point of character and standing have been appointed auditors. The class of auditors has varied, as it would be likely to do, the appointment being made in common hall by a large body of men. I am informed that some of those gentlemen have transmitted to the Commissioners a statement of their satisfaction with the accounts; among them the accountant to the skinners' company, and to one of the fire and life offices. I am told that several other parties in the City of great respectability, observing that evidence had been given to the effect that the accounts had not been audited by the auditors as they should be, have transmitted to this Commission a statement of their satisfaction with the accounts. I may state that during the last twelve years the reports rendered by the auditors have contained a statement to the effect that they were highly satisfied with the system, as well as with the mode in which the accounts were laid before them. The whole of this subject was investigated at very great length by the Government and a committee of the House of Lords, in the year 1829. The corporation at that time were soliciting a bill which gave them a milllion of money to expend upon public improvements. The Duke of Wellington required that before so large a trust was imposed upon them they should produce their accounts, and submit them to examination. During several weeks the accounts of the corporation were produced and examined in a committee of the House of Lords. At the close of that period the Duke of Wellington, not only in the committee but in the House of Lords, expressed his high satisfaction at the mode in which they had been kept. I may perhaps be permitted to state, that immediately after that examination the Duke of Wellington, on two or three occasions, made an offer to my father, who was then in the position which I have lately held, to place him in any position in the Treasury he might wish to assume under the Government, being desirous that he should accept some appointment under the Government with reference to their accounts. I mention that fact because it is gratifying to myself, as his son, to mention the circumstance, and it shows that the accounts were not unworthy the notice of a most distinguished individual, who was quite competent to form an opinion upon these subjects.

4,469. You have recently relinquished your situation connected with the corporation, have not you?—I have. I also desire to read and put in an extract from the report of the select committee of the House of Commons on the Orphans' Fund on the 11th of June 1812, as bearing upon this subject. "The committee were nevertheless satisfied, from the "documents laid before them, that every judicious attention and every principle of economy "had been applied by the corporation of London that was consistent with the attainment "of the great public objects with the execution of which they were intrusted. They also "think it incumbent upon them to declare, that having had occasion to inspect the various "and complicated accounts which the management of so extensive a concern indispensibly

"requires, and which were produced with a laudable readiness, it appears, after full investi-"gation, that all the details, both of the receipt and of the expenditure, are kept with an "accuracy and checked with a vigilance which reflects honour upon all who have any part "in the superintendence of this fund." If the Commissioners think proper, I will put in the reports which were made to the corporation by the committees who inquired into the statement which Mr. Williams referred to in 1829, that vouchers were refused, the fact being, that items of particulars were declined to be laid before the auditors in some instances, and the reasons are stated in the reports from the committees to the Court of Common Council in the years 1830 and 1834. Those reports, with the passages marked which bear upon the question, I wish to put in, the reason assigned being that the auditors were auditors of the accuracy of the chamberlain's accounts, and that, as elected by the livery, it would not be reasonable that they should be comptrollers of the corporation expenditure. The corporation being elected by the body of citizens, and the livery being only a portion of that body, it was not reasonable that four members elected by a portion of the body should be comptrollers of the accounts of 260 members elected by the citizens at large.

4,470. You considered that they were not judges of the propriety of the expenditure, but of the accuracy of the account?—Precisely so.

4,471. There is a certain sum of money put at the disposal of the consolidated committee. It has been stated to us that you are cognizant of the expenditure of that money, and can give us any information with regard to it which we may desire?—There is no specific sum placed at the disposal of the consolidated committee for any such purpose as has been mentioned. The circumstances are briefly these:—The corporation, some few years back, were dissatisfied with the reports of their proceedings which appeared in the public papers. The reason why their proceedings were not so fully reported as might be was twofold. In the first place, there is no local press in London, as there is in country towns, where there are corporations, and therefore local matters are not very fully reported in the London papers, which are published, as we all know, for the general information of the world. In the next place, such reports as were given were occasionally inaccurate. As one illustration of that I will mention to the Commissioners that at the time that great sanitary powers were intrusted to the corporation, about four years back, they had the appointment of an officer of health. They appointed Mr. Simon to that position, and they appropriated a salary of 500*l.* or 600*l.* a year for the execution of the duties of the office. From some accident, one of the noughts was dropped in the report by the newspaper press, and the next morning it appeared in the paper that 50*l.* or 60*l.* was set aside by the corporation for an officer of health whose duties were most important. Very great objection was taken to this; in fact articles appeared in the papers animadverting upon the act of the corporation in affording so small a sum to an office of such importance. This drew their attention more particularly to the deficiency of the reports. The subject was taken up by the consolidated committee, and there were several plans before them as to how some more ample and correct report of their proceedings might be obtained. There were three remedies proposed at the time; one of them was having official reporters at the table, employing a short-hand writer, such as Messrs. Gurney, to take full and ample reports of the proceedings; and I was myself engaged in making inquiries of Messrs. Gurney upon that subject, as to the terms upon which they would make a full report of the debates which took place in the courts of the corporation. I have not been able to lay my hand upon the correspondence; but the amount of expense which that plan would involve was very considerable indeed. It is not the practice of such short-hand writers, as the Commissioners may be aware, to condense accounts, but rather to give a transcript in full of what passes. That was not precisely what the corporation wanted; it would have been too voluminous. Another plan suggested was, encouraging the attendance of the reporters more generally at the table of the court, by circulating a certain number of papers if a good report was inserted. And the third plan suggested was, that a weekly organ, containing a full report of the proceedings of the corporation, should be encouraged, and the paper circulated, so that all the members of the corporation and the constituency might have an opportunity of reading at greater length the debates which took place in the corporation. It was considered that such a publication of their proceedings would prevent the misrepresentation and misapprehension which very frequently interfered with the discharge of the duties of the corporation. It was in consequence of these matters being before the consolidated committee that the expenditure took place which has been referred to by the witnesses. In the first place, it was considered desirable that some weekly organ should be encouraged, which organ would contain ample reports of the proceedings of the corporation. A paper of that class was commenced to be published in the month of January 1849, called the Citizen, which has been referred to in evidence. The undertaking commenced quite irrespective of the corporation or their officers; it was commenced by a stranger by the name of Peet. Very shortly after that commencement, some difficulties arose in the management of the paper, and Mr. Toulmin Smith became the sole proprietor and editor of that paper. I should not have felt myself justified in giving evidence upon that subject had it not been that Mr. Toulmin Smith's solicitor has been before you, and has given you evidence as to his proprietorship of that paper. The evidence upon that point is not strictly correct, that I was joint proprietor with Mr. Toulmin Smith. I advanced a sum of money to assist Mr. Smith in the object.

4472. Do you mean out of your own private funds?—Yes; out of my own pocket. My views and those of Mr. Toulmin Smith coincided very much upon these subjects, and it was matter of arrangement between ourselves as mutual friends. The paper became the sole property and was conducted under the sole editorship of Mr. Toulmin Smith. After some little time, the matter was brought under the consideration of the consolidated committee of the corporation. It was suggested by myself and others as a convenient organ for reporting their proceedings, if it could be so arranged.

4473. You were not, you say, a joint proprietor of the paper at this time?—No. I had advanced a sum of money, which gave me privity to the proceedings of the paper, but I carefully abstained, as an officer of the corporation, from being a proprietor in that paper.

4474. You advanced a sum of money out of friendship to Mr. Toulmin Smith?—Yes; and from my interest in the object which he had in view, connected with local self-government.

4475. Did not that make you a joint proprietor of the paper?—I had a claim for a part of the sum which was advanced upon the paper, but I did not think I was in any way a proprietor. I have the agreement here, and it was certainly never my intention to be a proprietor; and I believe, in fact, I was not one. The paper was sold, without my concurrence and without my knowledge. The consolidated committee had this matter brought under their attention, and received full power from the corporation to deal with any such project at the time. While the matter was in suspense, certain officers of the corporation advanced sums of money to keep it afloat till a determination could be come to by the corporation.

4476. Out of their private funds?—Yes. At the same time I should mention, that the members of the consolidated committee did express what the officers considered to be a justification of their keeping the paper afloat till some determination should be come to upon the subject. I am not aware whether they placed such an expression on the minutes; but myself and other officers of the corporation, from time to time, for four weeks, kept the paper afloat in order that it might be in existence to carry out the object of the corporation, if it should be found desirable to do so, at a future period.

4477. Do you mean that you were under the expectation that ultimately the paper would be taken up by the consolidated committee, and the officers of the corporation would be repaid those advances so made out of their private funds?—It was my impression that if the corporation approved of it we should be repaid out of the corporate funds the advances we had made for the purpose of keeping the paper in suspense till the opinion of the corporation had been obtained.

4478. Was any portion of the expenses of that newspaper defrayed out of the corporate funds?—I will proceed to make a statement upon that subject. For four weeks the officers sustained the paper, while the matter was under discussion. A difference of opinion arose between certain officers and Mr. Toulmin Smith, and difficulties of various kinds interposed, and the paper was sold by him for a nominal consideration, pending those discussions. The corporation ultimately repaid the officers the amount which they had advanced. Mr. Toulmin Smith raised a claim against the corporation for the amount which he had advanced in the matter. His petition was brought before the Court of Common Council. It was referred to the consolidated committee to inquire into the circumstances; but when that committee met upon that subject, Mr. Toulmin Smith did not attend before them; therefore the matter dropped. The sums advanced by the officers were repaid by the corporation; and at the end of more than twelve months after the transaction had taken place the consolidated committee, feeling that I had made the advance from a desire to promote the interests of the corporation and the objects which they had at heart, volunteered to pay me the amount. I made no claim, but it was paid as an act of grace to me, and as a recognition that I had put my money in jeopardy with a view to serving them.

4479. Out of what funds was all this done?—The money was paid out of the corporation funds. The matter having been referred, in the interim, to the consolidated committee, they drew upon the chamber for such sums as were necessary for making those payments.

4480. Do you remember what was the total sum paid under this head?—Yes; I have the full particulars before me. The total sum—including a bill of costs to Mr. Toulmin Smith's solicitor, Mr. Richardson, who has been examined before you, who raised a claim, first against the officers, and then against the corporation, which bill was paid without prejudice, under the advice of the law officers—was 280*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* 250*l.* was subsequently repaid to myself, as I have stated.

4481. Was this transaction avowed and open? Did it appear upon the face of any accounts which were afterwards published?—It was considered certainly as a confidential matter by the consolidated committee, as all matters of that kind must be. It appears upon the accounts.

4482. In what form does it appear upon the accounts?—It appears upon the accounts as "Disbursements of the consolidated committee." The 280*l.* was paid by various officers for keeping the paper afloat, and the expenses of the paper. The 250*l.* which I had advanced was repaid to me, in addition; and that appears in the accounts.

4483. Will you refer to the item in which it appears?—In the accounts of 1850, at page 55, there is a payment of 250*l.* to myself under the head of miscellaneous expenditure.

B. Scott. Esq.

4484. Was this particular sum of money given to the consolidated committee for this especial purpose, or is there a fund generally intrusted to them of the same description, to be disposed of, at their discretion, for objects which they think useful?—There was in this instance a reference to them, arising out of the deficiency of reports, to make temporary arrangements, and they have drawn upon the funds from time to time for such purposes, as they have thought fit. A witness has already stated that newspapers were circulated containing the reports of the proceedings of the corporation. In 1849, at page 52 of the account, there is a sum of 44*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* charged under the name of Gravatt, who is the corporation news agent. In 1850, at page 55, there is the sum of 195*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* charged. In 1851, page 57, there is 346*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* charged. In 1852, at page 56, there is 156*l.* 15*s.* charged. Those sums show an average expenditure per annum of 185*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* for circulating reports of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council and other courts. This statement I make in abatement of the statement which was made by another witness, that 1,000*l.* a year had been expended. No such sum as 1,000*l.* a year has been set apart; but I think I can explain the origin of the impression. I think the statement was made by both witnesses probably from honest motives, and with the real belief that there was such a sum set apart. At the time these matters were under discussion it was in contemplation to abolish the payment of 800*l.* a year for the Old Bailey reports, which were not considered very useful, and to add the sum of 200*l.* a year to that 800*l.* a year; it being thought that 20*l.* a week would be an ample sum to report, and to set up a sufficient account of the proceedings of the corporation. 20*l.* a week would be about 1,000*l.* a year; and I have reason to know that both the witnesses who spoke of this 1,000*l.* a year were anxious to open negotiation at various times with the corporation, with a view of obtaining the 20*l.* a week for reporting their proceedings in a paper to be conducted in connexion with themselves. That I have no doubt is the reason why 1,000*l.* a year is mentioned as expended by the corporation. The sum has been on the average 185*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* per annum.

4485. How has that sum been expended?—In circulating the papers which contained the best reports of the proceedings of the corporation, both of the Court of Aldermen and of the Court of Common Council, and occasionally the Commissioners of Sewers.

4486. Is there any fund at all in the nature of a secret service fund which is used by the corporation of the City of London?—There is no fund under that name.

4487. Is there any fund at all of the same description?—There is no fund which approximates to the secret service fund which is voted annually by Parliament. There are matters of this kind which are occasionally considered confidential, in which the object would be defeated if the public were made aware of all the circumstances, and they are intrusted to a select committee.

4488. What is the class of subjects which a municipal corporation can have occasion to spend money on which may not be avowed, and ought not to be published?—It was considered at the time that matters connected with the establishment of a newspaper should be treated as confidential.

4489. Is there any subject or class of subjects which can be supposed upon which a corporation dealing with public money ought to spend that money which they ought not to inform their constituents of in all possible detail?—I am not aware of any fund of the kind, except with respect to matters which have been considered confidential.

4490. What case can you mention in which a confidential expenditure of this sort has taken place?—I am aware of none, except the expenditure occasionally made by the legal officers where matters are in their legal confidence, and it has been thought right so to consider them.

4491. Has there been any such expenditure connected with Parliamentary proceedings?—Parliamentary proceedings would be of that character. Opposition to Bills in Parliament has frequently involved a considerable expenditure.

4492. Bills of a private nature?—I am not aware whether they were strictly private Bills.

4493. In conducting opposition to or promoting any Parliamentary business, has there been any expenditure at any time incurred which could not be fully stated?—I have no knowledge of anything of any expenditure which could not be fully stated and fully justified.

4494. Do you believe, in point of fact, that that there has been any money spent in that or any other way by the City of London, with the exception of the transaction you have referred to, which may be called of a confidential nature, of which a full account has not been given?—I am not aware of any sums of money respecting which a perfect knowledge has not existed in the minds of those who were administering the funds. There have been matters which have been considered sufficiently confidential to be referred to what is called a select or sub-committee to manage them, for the purpose of their being in the hands rather of a few members than of the general body of the committee.

4495. Are the Commissioners to understand that there has been money expended of which no account has been given to the public or to the constituency?—There has been no money expended of which an account has not been kept and given in the accounts.

4496. I refer to a detailed account of the expenditure. I suppose no such expenditure could take place without your knowledge?—I do not think it is likely that it should do so.

B. Scott, Esq.

11th Jan. 1854.

4497. Will you state whether there has been any practice of expending money for what you call private and confidential purposes, of which no detailed account has been rendered?—There are very many entries in the accounts where the totals are stated and no detail is rendered.

4498. Is that done because it is not thought necessary to go into details, or because concealment is for some reason or other thought justifiable and proper?—The details of an expenditure, such as was referred to just now, with reference to Parliamentary proceedings, would not be published; the amount would be stated in the accounts.

4499. Is that because there is anything in the nature of the expenditure which requires to be kept secret, or only because it is not thought necessary to go into details?—It is not desirable in matters of that kind to publish to the world the precise nature of the expenditure.

4500. Why not?—It has been so considered.

4501. Why has it been so considered?—It may have been so considered because it was thought probable that the opposition would be more effectual by not publishing to the world the precise modes or means by which the Bill was opposed or public opinion elicited with respect to it. I am requested by a brother officer in the chamber, to correct a statement respecting him which will be found at page 14 of the evidence; the questions are Nos. 114 and 115. The statement is with regard to proceedings against parties for taking up their freedom. The witness says, "The clerk does not state that for that accommodation he charged the poor creatures half-a-crown apiece, which is insurance money "for those two weeks. Here is one of the declarations allowing two months in one case, "and here is another in another case where the half-crown was paid. 764 half-crowns "brought 76*l.* 8*s.* 0*d.* in fees to the clerk of the chamber because they were poor." The gravamen of the charge consists in its being stated that they were fees "taken behind "the back." I am requested by Mr. Sewell, the clerk of the chamber, to say that that is not the truth; that no person was charged half-a-crown at all; but that in a case of that kind, where time was granted, he took the usual fee of 1*s.*, which is in his printed list of fees allowed by the corporation. Further, it was two months that was granted, and not two weeks. With respect to the expenses of the mayoralty, there is a statement at page 65 which it will be necessary for me to explain. Under the head of "Charges connected "with the office of Lord Mayor" the Lord Mayor is debited with 7,151*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* as his emolument derived from the metage of coals. The sum should be 500*l.*, which is the only sum which goes to the Lord Mayor, and not 7,151*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* The item is incorporated into the account as charged to the coal duty, in consequence of those pensions being charged against the 4*d.* coal duty at the time when the office of meter was abolished. The Lord Mayor received at that time the fees, which were commuted at 500*l.* With respect to the statement of Mr. Williams as to the mayoralty expenses, which he puts down at 25,034*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, in answer to question 2,800, I put in a report of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council of the 23d of March 1836, where the following abatements were made from that account:—Under item No. 1, 3,197*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* was abated; under item No. 2, 954*l.* was abated; the whole of item No. 3, 1,141*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, was abated; under item No. 5, 370*l.* was abated; under item No. 9, 198*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* was abated; under item No. 11, 1,224*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* was abated; under item No. 12, 3,697*l.* was abated; making a total deduction from the statement of the committee of 10,782*l* 2*s.* 3*d.*

4,502. According to that alteration the annual expenses of the office of Lord Mayor would be about 14,000*l.*?—Several items were then adjourned for further consideration and for separation. The report was sent back to the committee to amend, but was not again brought up by that committee; therefore the expenses of the Mayoralty are not very clearly ascertained; but assuming that those were the only proper abatements, the expense would have stood at that time at 14,252*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* The real statement of the case appears to be that the Lord Mayor receives—as far as I can ascertain, not having the whole of the particulars, some of them being only known to the Lord Mayor himself—8,319*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* Besides that, the expense of the Mansion House was, in 1836, estimated at 2,125*l.* a year; the building was put down at that rental. The expenses of the mayoralty have been very considerably reduced since that period, by the reduction of the salaries of officers, who were then officers of the household, and by the abolition entirely of some of the offices. I make this statement because the corporation at that time disputed the account; and Mr. Williams having placed it before you as a report from the committee of the corporation, in justice to them I state that the account was not admitted by the corporation at the time. The whole of the items were questioned, many of them were reduced, and no amended account was made out by the committee. I should also say that the corporation refused to print the account in that shape, and it was printed privately by the committee. I have a statement to make also with respect to the evidence of Mr. Williams, who put in the report of the revenue committee upon the subject of the salaries to the officers. The report of the revenue committee upon the salaries of the officers was brought up to the common council on the 24th of February 1836. There was a motion made to print the report; when this amendment was carried, "That by an order of this court of the 17th day of October 1834 it was "referred to a committee to inquire into the duties, salaries, and emoluments of the "clerks and officers of this corporation, and into the revenue and expenditure of this City, "and the said order contained an express instruction to the committee to report to this

" court whether any, and if any, what reduction could be made in the several items of " such expenditure. That in the report this day presented, the committee, in stating an " account of the salaries of the officers, has set forth the gross amount of the receipts of " office, without deducting monied charges and other disbursements payable thereout, " whereby an inaccurate impression is calculated to be made as to the actual amount of the " emoluments derived by the corporate officers from their various appointments. That in " the said report a statement of the duties of the several officers, as required by the order " of reference, is omitted, whereby the court is deprived of the standard by which the " sufficiency or exorbitancy of their salaries might be justly measured. That the com- " mittee has omitted to comply with the direct instruction of this court, by setting forth " in its report whether any, and if any, what reductions can be made in the salaries of any " one of the officers upon whose emoluments it has reported; in consequence of which " omission the only practicable beneficial object of the appointment of the committee is " frustrated or delayed. That the report be referred back to the said committee, to amend " the same by setting forth and adding up in separate columns both the gross and the net " receipts and emoluments of the several officers, and by setting forth their respective " duties. And that the said committee do with all practicable expedition report their " opinion to this court, whether any, and if any, what reduction can be made in the " several items of expenditure, both as regards the allowances to the various committees " of the corporation, and the salaries and emoluments of its officers, it being the firm " determination of this court to institute the most searching inquiry into all these " subjects, and to effect every retrenchment in the corporate expenditure which may be " proposed, provided such retrenchment is compatible with the efficient discharge of the " duties committed to its care, and is not inconsistent with a due regard to the just rights " of the various persons employed in its service." That amendment was carried. I mention this circumstance because it will account for a great many allegations which have been made, which it would be tedious to detail to the Commissioners, that the officers have made statements in one instance differing from statements made on another occasion, it being made to appear that the chamberlain's books do not agree with the officer's returns. In almost every instance the explanation I have given will account for that amount of difference. The chamberlain states in his account the actual amount paid to the officer; but the officer returns to the committee the amount which he has received, less the expenses of his office for clerks, stationery, and other necessary expenses. At the time to which I now refer, Mr. Williams brought up an account of the gross amount payable to the officers, and did not set forth sufficiently the details of their offices, so that an exaggerated idea was conveyed to the public and the court to the amount of salaries received. That is the account which he has brought before this Commission, which was never acceded to by the court. The matter stands as it did when the report was brought to the Court of Common Council. There is a class of statements which will have to be answered either by myself or by other officers of the corporation, in which comparisons have been instituted between the corporation and the borough of Marylebone, the borough of Leeds, and other places, contrasting the area of the City with the area of those places, and contrasting the population of the City with the population of those places, and the revenue of the corporation and the amount raised by taxes in the City with the revenue and taxation in those places. There are some very important matters to be pointed out in reference to that evidence; but I am not prepared to detain the Commissioners upon the subject to-day. Explanations may be hereafter put before them briefly, perhaps, in a tabulated form, to show that there are some inaccuracies in stating those matters which most materially affect the result. A statement has been made that the Borough Compter had been sold, and the proceeds had not appeared in the City accounts. The Borough Compter belongs to the Bridge House trust, and has not been sold to this day; it is an inaccurate statement altogether. I believe it was in contemplation to sell the Borough Compter, but it was considered that there was some doubt as to whether the jurisdiction of the magistrates in Southwark was at an end, so that the compter might be sold. There is a statement made at page 204 of the evidence by Mr. Bennoch, that the corporation, though they have made a charge in their accounts for lodging-houses erected for the labouring poor, have not taken any steps whatever to provide those lodgings. Mr. Bennoch states, " In connexion with this expenditure, as shown in their blue book, page " 61, I find put down the sum of 19,625*l.* under the head of Lodging-houses for the " labouring poor. Now, anybody looking at this account would naturally believe that this " money had been expended in the construction of lodging-houses for the labouring poor. " It is, however, merely a balance of the proceeds of a part of the Finsbury estate, which is " an estate held in trust, and being held in trust they virtuously consider that they should " not allow it to merge into the general funds of the corporation, but they set it aside for " a specific purpose, which purpose professedly was that of building lodging-houses for the " laboring poor. The foundations of those houses, however, are not laid, though it appears " here in the account of payments; but I suppose those houses will appear in due course of " time." In answer to question 2053, " Have they paid attention to the building of an " improved class of dwellings for the labouring poor?" the answer is, " By no means, and " that is one of the strong arguments against the past conduct of the corporation." In answer to that statement, I wish to say that the corporation obtained power, which they did not possess before, under the Clerkenwell Improvement Act, to purchase land, and to erect upon it convenient lodging-houses for the labouring poor. The account which is now upon your table shows the receipt and expenditure under that head. Immediately after the passing of that Act the improvement committee commenced negotiating for the purchase of ground; they had placed at their disposal the sum of about 43,000*l.* stock for that purpose. They obtained and purchased ground at a cost, as will appear in that account, of 19,480*l.*, which was covered with knackers' yards and other nuisances in the neighbourhood of Cow Cross. They proceeded to clear the ground, when they were served with notices by a projected railway company, which notices have been renewed from session to session. It would have been of course inexpedient for the improvement committee to commence erecting lodging-houses for the poor when they received notice that the ground might probably be required for the purposes of a railway company; they could therefore proceed no further in the matter. They then cleared some of the property which could not be allowed to stand, being a nuisance; the other portion has been let, and the matter remains in abeyance till Parliament has determined whether the railway company shall acquire the land in question. They would have proceeded further, but the powers of the Act of Parliament limited them to the neighbourhood of the street projected from the City to Clerkenwell; they had no power to purchase land in other places for that purpose. I am not aware that there is any other subject on which I have to speak, except to put in some statements relative to the expenses of committees. The corporation have referred to that subject in the statement which has been read before the Commissioners this morning. A very considerable reduction has been made, even in my recollection, in those matters. I will put in a statement of the amount paid to five committees, between 1802 and 1808, from which it will appear that they received 4,486*l.* 19*s.* on the average of those seven years.

B. Scott, Esq.

The witness delivered in the following paper:—

The corporation in 1836 printed a statement of the whole of the allowances to committees for the years 1833, 1834, and 1835; that is the next period at which this subject was investigated. There were then thirteen committees instead of five. The revenues had very considerably increased, and also the duties which were performed by those committees; but the average for those three years was only £4,662 for the thirteen committees. By the report which I now put in upon that subject you will see a very important alteration was made, which has not been referred to in the corporation statement. At that period the corporation drew upon certain Parliamentary trust funds, such as the trust fund for managing the river, for the improvement of the approaches to London Bridge, and the repair of Blackfriars Bridge, for their committees' allowances. Since the period of 1836 that practice has been discontinued, under an order of this committee, and the amount is paid out of the corporate funds. The next account which I will refer to of allowances to committees is that which is already before the Commission in evidence, at page 66, which is for the year 1852, from which it appears that a very considerable reduction has been made since 1836. Omitting the Irish Society, which is not contained in either of the former statements, what was in the year 1836 4,662*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* is now reduced to little more than half that sum, about 2,750*l.*

Scott, Esq.

4503. What are the duties of the office of chamberlain?—The principal duty of the chamberlain is to act as treasurer or banker to a great variety of public trust funds, the corporation fund being one of those funds.

4504. Is he in the habit of attending at the office?—The present chamberlain has attended daily since his election, every day and all day.

4505. You stated that you had been for some years first clerk in the office; has it been the habit for the chamberlain to perform his duties in person?—Yes; it has generally been the habit for the chamberlain to perform his duties in person, and to give a considerable amount of attendance to those duties.

4506. At present it is the habit of the office for the chamberlain to execute his duties in person, and not by deputy?—I conceive that the duties of the chamberlain and the duties of the chief clerk differ. The chamberlain is the responsible officer; he gives a large amount of security, and has, I may say, a moral oversight over the office; that is, he is responsible for the clerks being there, and performing their duties. His attendance is important, as head of the department. He acts in the outer chamber in hearing complaints against apprentices, as a judge. He admits to the freedom of the City, swearing in the party, and superintending that department; and he exercises just as much control and interference in all matters of account as he thinks fit, having the superintendence of the whole department.

4508. What is the jurisdiction of the chamberlain over apprentices? Does that occupy much time?—Yes, it does. It is not in my department; but I believe hardly a day passes on which complaints are not made, either by masters or apprentices; and the chamberlain has authority to adjudicate between them, his office being a court in that respect. He has power to commit them to the Bridewell, and to effect a separation if they do not agree; or, if there is misconduct on either side, to deprive the apprentice of his freedom, or to deprive the master of the services of the apprentice if he does not perform his duties towards him.

4509. Are the accounts of all the funds belonging to the corporation kept in the chamberlain's office?—The chamberlain is only bound to keep account of those funds of which he is treasurer; there are funds connected with the corporation which are not kept in his office, which are returned signed by other parties.

4510. Which are they?—In the first place, the Bridge House accounts are not kept in his office; they are kept by the bridge masters, two officers elected by the common hall. They are the treasurers of the Bridge House estates; they receive the rents, and account for the expenditure. The Irish Society keep their own accounts independently of the chamberlain.

4511. The rents of the Irish Society are not the property of the corporation?—They are not.

4512. Are there any other corporation funds of which the accouuts are not kept in the chamber?—I do not recollect any at this moment.

4513. What is the advantage of having a separate office for the Bridge House accounts?—I am not aware of any particular advantage.

4514. Then would it not be more economical and better, and tend more to uniformity, that they should be consolidated?—There would be no practical difficulty in taking the Bridge House rents at the chamber, provided Parliamentary powers were obtained for the purpose; it could not be done without, as all the leases make the rents payable to the bridge masters.

4515. Is there any other office besides that of the bridge masters at which accounts are kept, except at the chamber?—Not accounts of money received and paid. I believe, with that exception, the cash accounts of money received and paid are all kept in the chamber.

4516. The comptroller's account is merely an account of monies due, and not of monies received?—Monies due. He is the conveyancing officer, and makes out the leases.

4517. He renders an account of the monies due, and which ought to be paid to the City under the leases?—Yes.

4518. But no other account?—Everything which is a matter of revenue belonging to the corporation, whether arising from rent or otherwise, he is bound to acquaint himself with, and charge against the chamberlain. He charges the tolls, markets, metage dues and corn dues, and every item which belongs to the corporation as their property.

4519. In making out the account in the chamber, is it the practice to enter the revenue in its gross amount, or as the net amount; that is to say, are the officers who collect the revenue allowed to stop their own salaries and other expenses before they pay the money into the chamber?—That used to be very much the case in past years,—in the last century more particularly; but from time to time an opposite course has been pursued and there is hardly any item now which I could put my hand on in the City's account which is not the gross amount. The gross revenue is paid in, and the officers are paid out by warrants drawn upon the chamberlain. Without saying that there are not some trifling exceptions to that rule, the rule is, that the account shows the gross amount, and not the net amount. In that respect the corporation have been gradually approximating to what I conceive to be the proper system of accounts, such as the Government have now determined, by the vote of Parliament, shall be introduced into the Government departments.

4520. Is there any large amount of fees received by any City officer which does not appear in the chamberlain's account?—There are no doubt many fees received by officers, which do not belong to the corporation, and do not pass through the chamberlain's account.

4521. Are those fees received by the officers as officers of the corporation?—Yes, in most cases.

4522. Are they regulated by the authority of the corporation?—They have been regulated, from time to time by the corporation when the office has come before its committee.

4523. The corporation regulates the amount of the fee, and the officer receives the fee as being an officer of the corporation?—Yes.

4524. You say there are many cases in which the amount of those fees is not returned to the corporation?—It is looked upon as the property of the officer, and not as the property of the corporation; he is authorized for the time being to take the fee. Either the fee is authorized by Parliament, or by custom, or by a regulation of the corporation, and it is looked upon as his property, and he accounts for it when he is asked to make a return of what he receives.

4525. Does the chamberlain know the amount of the fees received in this manner by the several officers?—Certainly not; he has no knowledge of anything of the kind, unless it comes into his department.

4526. Is there any office belonging to the corporation in which that information exists?—No; unless the officer returns the information himself.

4527. A report of a committee of the common council was given to the Commissioners by Mr. Williams, in which it was stated that the amount of the fees received by the officers of the corporation, in addition to their salaries, exceeded 70,000*l.* a year; do you think that can be a correct statement?—I should receive anything contained in that report with a great deal of caution, because wherever the report was tested it was found to be very much exaggerated in every respect; and I know my father, who was engaged with Mr. Williams in preparing those accounts, repeatedly refused to sign some of the accounts.

4528. It was stated to us that in every instance the amount of fees was obtained from the officer himself, and was entered from his statement in the report?—I think under the word "fees" many things must have been included which are not fees. If any such statement was made at that time, I conceive nothing of the kind could exist at the present day, because the operation of all the alterations which the corporation have made in this respect has been to get rid of fees and uncertain sources of emolument, and give their officers fixed salaries instead.

4529. Could it be ascertained, from any document in the possession of the corporation, what is the annual amount of fees now received by the officers not brought into the chamberlain's account?—A return has been called for by the Commission, which is now in course of being made up; the officers are making their returns, in obedience to that order.

4530. How soon will that return be ready?—I have every reason to believe that it is now before the committee. I am not now actively engaged with the corporation.

4531. You are not able to state what the amount is?—I have not the least idea myself. The individual officers know what their fees are, but I have not the means of knowing, but I am clearly convinced that it cannot even approximate to the amount stated by Mr. Williams.

4532. Has it been the practice of late years to diminish the number of fees, and to increase the system of payment by salary?—That has been the universal rule, I believe.

4533. Has that been uniformly done, upon any office becoming vacant?—I may say, upon every office becoming vacant, it is the rule to refer the office to the officers' and clerks' committee, who sit specifically for that purpose, who call for an account of the emoluments and a statement of the duties. They revise the office, and make alterations as they think fit, from time to time reporting to the Court of Common Council for their sanction.

4534. It has been the practice, upon an office becoming vacant, to regulate the office that each officer shall be paid by salary, and not by fees?—It has been the rule. There may have been exceptions, but I do not recollect any.

4535. Have the fees been collected by the officers, and paid into the chamber, or have they been abolished?—Where fees have been retained, and that arrangement has been ordered by the committee, they have been paid into the Chamber. For instance, in remodelling the comptroller's office, a few years back, the officer's salary was limited to 1,500*l.* a-year. If he at any time made anything over that amount he was to pay it into the chamber. A few years ago, at the renewal of the Conduit Mead leases, which are very numerous, the profits of the office were considerably augmented, and 2,400*l.* was paid to the chamber as the surplus profits of that office. With respect to the office to which I have belonged, which is, strictly speaking, the only office upon which I ought to speak about these matters, there have been very important reforms effected. Before the year 1842 the chamberlain received the whole of the profits of his office, arising in a large degree from the interest of monies left unavoidably in his hands as treasurer, and the emoluments of the office were very considerable. It appeared from a return in 1842 that Sir James Shaw had received 3,600*l.* a year upon an average during the whole of the time he had been in office. That was considered an excessive amount of salary, and a scheme was agreed on according to which the office was dealt with. The interest of monies or of balances could not be used by the corporation; it would have been inconsistent with their office as trustees to have taken any share of the profits arising from monies in the hand of their treasurer; therefore they made an arrangement by which the treasurer pledged himself, before his election, to return to the trust funds anything which should exceed 2,500*l.* when he had made 2,500*l.*, anything beyond that sum was to be returned, for the relief of the trust funds out of whose balances the profits had been made. A reduction from 3,600*l.* to 2,500*l.* a year was thus effected. Beyond that reduction there has been a considerable saving every year, because the proceeds of the office have been more than sufficient to pay the chamberlain and his establishment of clerks. The sum of 20,000*l.* has been invested in Consols, and is in the Bank of England, for the relief of those trust funds. During the current year relief to the extent of 1,700*l.* will be afforded to those funds. Thus, the Commissioners of Sewers pay 200*l.* for the management of their accounts in our office; that 200*l.* will be now returned to them out of the profits of the past year. The police rate is managed in our office; 150*l.* will be returned which they have paid to the chamberlain for managing those accounts; and so on. A sum amounting to 1,700*l.* or thereabouts, will be returned to those trust funds this year out of the profits of the office in the past year, and there is no doubt whatever that with judicious management the whole of those trust funds will be relieved in future from any charges of management whatever.

4536. The entire emolument of the office of chamberlain now consists in that 2,500*l.* a-year?—That is the chamberlain's individual emolument. There is an establishment of clerks kept, which costs over 2,000*l.* a year.

4537. The chamberlain derives no profit from the balances?—Nothing beyond the 2,500*l.* If he has injudiciously managed the banking business, or if the balances should be insufficient, the corporation do not guarantee him 2,500*l.* a year.

4538. What discretion has he still in disposing of the balances?—He has a discretion in law with which the corporation cannot interfere; he is a public treasurer; he manages many trust funds which have not been placed in his hands by the corporation. In fact, the great bulk of the monies in his hands is not at the corporate disposal, except for purposes for which they can draw upon it.

4539. With respect to the money which, strictly speaking, belongs to the corporation, is there any limit imposed upon the discretion of the chamberlain as to what use he shall make of the balances?—He is bound to lay the books containing his banking transactions before the committee monthly.

4540. What committee is that?—The committee called the coal, corn, and finance committee. He lays his books before them monthly. If they see any reason to object to the class of securities he holds,—if they think that he is making a use of the money which they consider impolitic, or placing it in risk,—he submits, under deed, to sell out those securities, and invest them in something else which will be approved by the corporation.

4541. You mean that this committee has an effective control over his management of the balances?—They have as good a control as can be obtained without Parliamentary interference. The corporation have made this arrangement with him that he will limit himself as to his profits, and submit to restrictions which could not be imposed upon him legally by the corporation, and that he will not invest his money in a way which would be displeasing to them, or, in their opinion, hazardous.

4542. He enters into this engagement upon taking the office, does he?—Yes, he does; he enters into a deed between himself and the corporation to that effect.

4543. And the control of this committee, you say, is prospective as well as retrospective?—It is prospective in this respect:—that if the committee, at any time, objected to any class of securities, the officer would understand that he must not again bring that class of securities before them for their approval.

4544. Speaking of it as a system, do you think the present system under which the balances are managed, and the control exercised over the Chamberlain, all that could be desired, and that it is susceptible of no amendment?—I think the system is very much improved from what it used to be. Considerable risks were run; and I can give no other evidence, because it was upon my report, jointly with the City solicitor, twelve years ago, that the present system was adopted. We both of us felt that there were considerable risks. The money was in the hands of one person. That person was at the time confined to his bed. He was, therefore, obliged to entrust the custody of the money to one person in his office, myself. I felt that that was not a responsibility which should be placed in one person's hands; and I felt if it should ever get into the hands of a person who would be disposed to make an improper use of it, the whole sum might be dissipated. I mentioned my feelings to others, and the result was, that the matter was so arranged as that the chamberlain and his two senior officers should be placed in a drawing account, to sign cheques, so that they should be a mutual check upon each other. At the same time, the system was introduced of placing the securities in a strong room, with three doors, and three separate keys. I believe the corporation made every regulation for the security of the money in the chamber which could be then made, and, without going to Parliament, they could not have done more than they did. Still, with all that, there is no doubt that the system is susceptible of amendment, and might be amended at any opportunity, when there should be Parliamentary powers obtained.

4545. Would you object to suggest to us what additional securities you think it would be desirable to introduce for the proper conduct of the present system?—I think it would be much more desirable for the chamberlain, and better for the corporation, if he were paid a fixed salary, and had not to run any chances of making emoluments, by dealing with monies which had better be placed in a position of perfect security. I believe that that arrangement would be more satisfactory to the officer, who is now placed in a position of considerable risk and doubt, as to whether he will make his emoluments, and it would conduce to the security of the public funds in his hands. I am giving this, however, as the result of my own individual feeling in the matter.

4546. Is the whole of what may be called the chamberlain's fund derived from the profits upon balances?—No. There are contributions paid by the City for the management of their accounts, and contributions paid out of certain trust funds for the management of those accounts, that is, for keeping accounts which, as a simple banker, he would not be required tokeep.

4547. What is the amount of profit made upon the balances?—Of course it fluctuates very much with the rate of interest, and the rise and fall of securities. It has fluctuated, in my knowledge, in twelve years, between something like 3,000*l.* a year and something like 6,000*l.* a year.

4548. In the year when it was 6,000*l.* it would more than defray the whole of the expenses of the establishment?—It would.

4550. In whose name are those invested?—In the names of three parties, who draw upon the account, and hold the keys; the chamberlain, the chief clerk, and his cashier.

4551. Then it is not considered a fund belonging to the corporation?—It is expressly provided in the deed that the corporation shall not have any benefit from it; they are specially deprived of it, on the ground that trustees ought not to benefit themselves from the proceeds arising from their trust funds.

4552. Who has power over the funds?—The coal and corn committee can direct the chamberlain to relieve the trust funds in his office.

4553. Suppose it were thought desirable to appropriate 20,000*l.* to a public building, or some permanent object of that kind, would there be a power of so appropriating it?—Certainly not.

4554. Is it to be considered as invested in perpetuity?—It is invested, and can only be applied to relieving the public funds in the chamber.

4555. This is a fund created out of the profits upon the balances of the monies of the corporation, is it not?—Not of the corporation, strictly. The corporation account forms one account out of very many which are kept in the chamber; and where the money is directed to be paid by the collector to the chamberlain of London, he holds the money till a legal authority draws upon him; he is therefore a public banker.

4556. I suppose a large portion of the money from which profit is made is lent on the City estates, is it not?—The balance in the City's cash is very inconsiderable, generally; it has frequently been overdrawn during the present year.

4557. What is the fund upon which the balance is the largest?—One of the largest funds has been, but it is not so at present, nor is it likely to be so in futnre, what is called the London Bridge Approaches fund.

4558. Is that fund in the chamberlain's office?—Yes. The money is paid into the chamberlain's office, and once a quarter the money is handed over to Her Majesty's Board of Works, as soon as the accounts for the quarter are passed and examined; the 8*d.* coal duty, the 1*d.* duty, and other sources of revenue forming that fund. The chamberlain, in the meantime, has the money lying on account, from day to day, as it comes in; and he is, in that respect, a banker, and deals with that fund in the aggregate with other funds in the office.

4559. Is not that fund a corporation fund?—No. It is a trust created by Act of Parliament for a public purpose, the proceeds being exclusively applicable to public works under the Board of Works; the whole of it is now paid to the Board of Works. That is an illustration of a public trust fund which the corporation have no control over, further than to say to the officer, before he is elected,—"Will you submit to restrictions, and "not make an improper use of that fund which the law has placed for a ime at "your disposal?"

B. Scott, Esq.

4560. Though this fund is applicable to public objects, the City make a profit of it while it passes through their hands?—The Chamberlain makes a profit, and, after paying himself, he carries the balance of the profit to that fund, which will be relieved this year of all the charges which were formerly made against the fund.

4561. The profit so made upon that fund does not go into the City chest, but it goes to the fund itself?—It is most studiously kept separate, because the deed provides that the City shall get no profit out of it.

4562. Is no profit ever made upon any purely City fund?—The corporation pay something like 1,200*l.* a year to the chamberlain's fund for what they conceive to be their share for managing the accounts which belong to themselves.

4563. You state that certain profits are made from balances lying in the chamberlain's hands. Is any profit made upon any balance upon a purely corporation fund?—If any committees of the corporation, or the corporation itself, have power to invest any balance upon their funds, they make a special order upon the chamberlain for that purpose. In that case it is not his profit; it is their profit, if they order him to buy, say 10,000*l.* of stock, out of any fund; they take the risk of that transaction, and it is carried through their books. I was speaking of the chamberlain's balance being made from the aggregates, just as a banker makes his profit out of the aggregate of all the accounts within his keeping.

4564. You stated that in some years the profit upon the balances has been 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a year, and that in some years it is as much as 6,000*l.* Will you describe by what process these profits are made; what are the operations by which the chamberlain is able to realize those profits?—The chamberlain consults with his chief clerk, and looks forward from day to day, and from week to week, as to what future balance there will be in the office available for a temporary investment. He purchases, perhaps, Government securities; such as Exchequer bills, or India bonds, or City bonds; some security of a perfectly safe character; and he sells them when the monies are wanted again, from time to time. If there is likely to be 100,000*l.* or 150,000*l.* for the next two or three weeks in the chamber, he can invest it in any good securities, or place it out with joint stock bankers or bill brokers, upon the deposit of those securities. He does not deal in bills.

4,565. Supposing it were to happen that the operations were so unfortunate as that there was an actual loss, what would be the consequence?—The consequences would fall upon the chamberlain and his sureties.

4,566. If there were a loss upon some transactions, and a gain upon others, he would set off the loss against the gain?—All stock transactions are in the nature of profit and loss. If there is a fall in the funds while the operation is going on, there is a loss. The profit is the balance of profit and loss.

4,567. In fact the chamberlain carries on the business of a banker, to a certain extent?—He does. The only difference has been, that the corporation have limited the risks, and reduced, as far as they could, the emoluments of the office, and they can proceed no further in doing so without Parliamentary aid.

4,568. You have stated that you thought it would be better if the money were invested in a more permanent manner. How could that be managed?—I think it could be managed by making the balance in the office the property of the corporation; that is, recognizing it as City funds, and putting it under the control of a committee or some competent authority to make use of the money, and not leaving it in the hands and at the risk of an individual. I think the individual would feel more comfortable, and the money might be dealt with more advantageously.

4,569. When the chamberlain is newly elected he must suddenly find himself in the position of being called on to deal with a very large sum of money after the manner of a banker. Upon whose advice would he act?—He would naturally act upon the advice of those in the office who are best acquainted with the transactions in the chamber.

4,570. Who would advise the chamberlain upon such an important matter as that?—Under the regulations of the deed, he would advise with the chief clerk, who is supposed to know most of the transactions, and what demands are likely to come upon the chamber from time to time.

4,571. Have you in fact conducted by your advice what may be called the banking business of the chamberlain's department?—That has been one branch of my duties, to co-operate with him in such matters. I have in fact performed three duties. I have been the City actuary; I have been, so far as the accounts are kept in the chamber, an accountant; and I have also been bank manager, and have co-operated with the chamberlain and other parties in the office. The weight of the responsibility of those three departments has rested upon myself.

4,572. Supposing that there was an important decision to be made as to some large investment, involving the possibility of some considerable loss, as well as the possibility of a gain, would you have been the person upon whose judgment the decision would have been made?—The corporation have generally consulted me in matters of that kind.

4,573. Would not such a question be decided by the chamberlain, without the interference of the corporation?—It has been the practice for the chief clerk to advise with the chamberlain.

4,574. Does the chamberlain exercise any real discretion in the matter, or does he rely upon the advice of his chief clerk?—The Chamberlain has always been able to give very good advice upon those points, being himself the party responsible, and I have always found him very willing to look into the points of the case, and give his advice.

4575. Do you not consult some broker generally?—We occasionally consult a broker, but the business of the office has so much come into a course of routine, that it is not frequently necessary. We confine ourselves to transactions where the risk is exceedingly small; we do not touch the public funds at all. We confine ourselves to transactions in India bonds, Exchequer bills, Canada guaranteed debentures, and City bonds, which are not liable to very great fluctuations.

4576. You look to the security rather than to the chance of profit?—Yes; and we endeavour not to lock up more money than can be conveniently set aside. My experience has been, that in the last twenty-four or twenty-five years the matter has been managed with the greatest prudence in the office; the chamberlain affording all the assistance he could to myself and my predecessor. I am speaking of the administration of the system, rather than of the system itself. I believe it is administered most purely with a most conscientious desire not to speculate, but to make a small and safe profit, rather than to attempt anything great, and so increase the risk.

4577. Do you keep any bullion or money in the chamber?—The securities which are deposited and bought are placed in a strong room in the chamber, under three keys. A sum of money is allowed to remain in the hands of the cashier at the close of the day's business in the chamber, which is not to exceed 1,000*l.* at any time, to enable him to commence paying business in the morning.

4578. Has it ever occurred to the corporation to consider whether it might not be desirable to employ a banker for those operations?—That was considered in the year 1842, and some inquiries were made at the Bank of England as to the terms on which they would act; but as it is against their system to allow any interest whatever upon balances, and as it was found that very large balances must necessarily lie there which the corporation could not limit, it would be a very considerable loss of income to the chamberlain and his establishment if the money were taken to the Bank of England, so that the system was rather reformed upon the principle of the old plan than that of instituting an entirely new system.

4579. Has any attempt been made to find a private bank which would allow interest upon balances?—I think not. Private bankers have repeatedly and extensively taken our money, and deposited securities with us; that is, they have allowed us, as bill brokers would allow us, the current interest of the day, depositing for the money they received from us adequate securities for the amount.

4580. You are aware that the Government pursues a system not at all resembling that of the City of London; they do not keep their own securities and monies in a chamber, but they employ the Bank of England?—The resemblance is somewhat close, but not in all respects. The Bank of England represents the chamber; the different branches of revenue are lodged with the Bank of England, and the Bank of England hold the money, and make use of it. In the case of the corporation, it is an individual who holds the money; in the other case it is a banking establishment which holds the money, both of them making their profit out of the monies lying in their hands.

4581. Would it be impossible to transact this business through a private bank in a manner that would give equal security combined with more economy?—I am sure no private bank could keep the accounts which are necessary for the information of the corporation and other public bodies; you must have an establishment for keeping all the accounts.

4582. The Government keeps its accounts in the Treasury and Exchequer, but deposits its money in the Bank of England?—The system might be amended in those respects, no doubt, if there were power to do so.

4583. It is clearly desirable to avoid the handling of the money on the part of such a body as the corporation, is not it?—I think a very large amount of revenue would be sacrificed if the corporation did not make use of the balance in some way.

4584. You think no private bank would give the City so large a profit as they are able to make themselves?—I do not think it would.

4585. Is not a considerable part of the profit now absorbed in the expense of management, which in that case would be saved?—The banking expenses are very inconsiderable indeed.

4586. The system is very anomalous, and very unlike that by which any other corporation manages its money affairs, is it not?—I find, from looking at the accounts of various corporations which I have obtained, that a great diversity of practice exists. One of the difficulties we have to contend with is, that we have nothing like a model system before us which has been approved by Parliament or the Government. Some corporations have their money in the hands of a private banker in a provincial town. I think money so invested must be at more hazard than it is in the hands of the chamberlain, invested in Government securities and under the inspection of a committee. I find that to be the case in several corporations, and they do not appear to render to the account any interest for the large amount of money lying in their hands.

4587. Do you know what is the case with such corporations as those of Manchester and Liverpool?—I noticed, I think, at Manchester, there is a sum of 36,000*l.* lying to the account of the corporation at a private banker's. At Liverpool they appear to have a very large balance at a private banker's, besides an amount in the hands of the treasurer.

11th Jan. 1854.

4588. Do they obtain no payment from the banker in respect to the balance in his hands?—I do not not notice anything of that kind. I am speaking of their accounts rather from memory. I am convinced that by placing money in the hands of a private banker you would rather lose than gain in point of security.

4589. Do you know whether any other corporation follows the practice of the corporation of London in keeping their own money in their own custody?—I have endeavoured to look to that point. Part of the money appears to be in the hands of a private banker, and part of it in the hands of treasurer.

4590. Do you know any case in which the whole of the money is kept in the hands of the treasurer of the corporation?—I am not aware of any such case. I believe in some respects the office of chamberlain is a very peculiar and anomalous office; it has been an office of that kind for something like seven centuries; it appears to have been the office into which the King's taxes were formerly paid.

4591. Substantially has the system of the chamber of London remained unaltered for any large number of years?—It has remained unaltered for something like five or six centuries; no material alteration was made in the conduct of the business till the year 1842, when the scheme I have referred to was adopted, for the purpose of increasing the security, and limiting the amounts of the emoluments.

4592. Was there any charge made in that year in respect to the custody of the money, or its investment, or the profits derived from the use of it?—I have already explained that the power of investment, which had been hitherto made by the chamberlain, and the custody of the money, which had hitherto been in his hands, were placed in the hands of himself jointly with his chief clerk and his cashier. The emoluments were limited by an arrangement to the effect that when they reached 2,500*l.* the surplus should be placed aside, and not taken by him to his own profit.

4593. What you have stated is the extent of the changes which were made, is it?—There was no change, further than I have stated, which was of any importance.

4594. It was mentioned in the paper which the recorder read to the Commmissioners, that there had been a great increase in the revenue and expenditure of the City of London of late years; is that a point to which your attention has ever been turned?—Those figures are approximately correct. There has been a considerable increase in the rental of the City and in the proceeds of their several tolls and dues.

4595. Has there been an increase under any other head of revenue?—In some cases the revenue has decreased. The amount derived from freedom has fallen off very much, the fine having been reduced, and the numbers being diminished also. The coal dues, the proceeds of the markets, and the rental of the City have all of them increased with the increasing activity in trade and commerce and the value of land in London.

4597. How is the account of the proceeds of the coal duty kept?—The coal duties are three in number; they are all received at one office in the coal market, and paid every day into the chamber in three sums, which are carried to the respective accounts; the 8*d.* goes to the London Bridge Approaches fund for metropolitan improvements; the 1*d.* goes to the Metropolis Improvement fund, as it is called, by the Act of Parliament for Metropolis Improvements; and the 4*d.* goes to the credit of the City's cash.

4598. The whole of those sums are levied together, are not they, making 1*s.* 1*d.* upon every ton of coal?—They are all received together at the Coal Market, for the purpose of economy, one officer's salary covering the whole expense of collection; he accounts to the chamberlain, who is bound to distribute it to the fund to which it belongs.

4599. Are the gross receipts paid into the chamber?—They are.

4600. And the salaries of the officers and the expenses of collection are paid out of it?—Yes; they are paid proportionably; eight thirteenths are paid out of one fund, four thirteenths out of another fund, and one thirteenth out of the third fund.

4601. The City keeps the produce of the 4*d.* duty for itself, and pays over the produce of the 9*d.* duty to the Government?—To those accounts, and ultimately to the Government.

4602. How is the payment made to the Government?—By an arrangement with the Board of Works, we account to them once a quarter. The chamberlain receives the amount, makes all proper and legal payments during the quarter out of the amount, and at the end of the quarter, when the drawbacks have been settled by the committee, he returns the account under his hand to the Board of Works, upon which they send a receivable order to the chamberlain, who takes the receivable order to the Bank of England, and pays it in to the account of the Woods and Forests there.

4603. The payment made to the Government is a net payment, any expenses and outgoings being deducted?—Yes. In the case of the London Bridge Approaches fund the chamberlain pays the interest upon the loans which they have raised, and any legal payment which is payable out of the amount, and the balance handed over to them.

4604. Do all those duties rest upon the same footing; have they the same duration?—They have not the same duration; they are received under different titles and different circumstances. The 4*d.* coal duty, which belongs to the City, is a perpetual duty, strictly speaking, by prescription and charter; it is 4*d.* a chaldron. Till the year 1862 it is commuted for 4*d.* a ton; after that it reverts to 4*d.* a chaldron again, there being a provision in the Act that if it shall not cease or be repealed it shall revert to the ancient charge of 4*d.* a chaldron.

4605. What is the legal title by which that payment exists?—It is by prescription, confirmed by the charter of James the 1st and subsequent charters, and recognised by the Act of Parliament, the 1st and 2d of William the 4th, chapter 76, which has commuted it.

4606. Is the produce of the 4*d.* duty applied to any particular purpose?—It is carried to the credit of the City's cash, and it is mortgaged for a certain period, for the making of the Cannon Street improvement. The corporation set aside 20,000*l.* out of it, which has been sufficient hitherto to pay the interest of those mortgages, and it is mortgaged for the repayment of the sums which are stated in the accounts, amounting now to about 580,000*l.*

4607. Is it the produce of the 4*d.* duty which is charged with that sum?—It is.

4608. Is there any legal application of that fund, with the exception of the payment of that interest?—I do not know of any other legal application of it. Under existing circumstances, the corporation are released from the duty of measuring. There are charges which the corporation have considered as attaching to it; they undertook to pay the whole of the coal meters' pensions when the commutation took place; they were officers employed in measuring the coal; it was necessary to provide pensions as the offices were abolished, and the corporation took upon themselves the expense of paying those meters. That was originally 21,000*l.* a year, or thereabouts. It is now about 7,000*l.*

4609. What is about the annual produce of the 4*d.* duty?—It is rather better than 60,000*l.*, after allowing the drawbacks.

4610. What is the annual interest of the debt chargeable upon that fund?—It is about 20,000*l.* a year.

4611. Is there a sinking fund provided in order to pay off a portion of the principal annually?—No; there is none at present, 4612. Does that sum of about half a million go on in perpetuity, without any provision being made for its gradual extinction?—Part of it, 40,000*l.*, is due in February next, and there is a sufficient balance on the account to pay off that amount; there is no provision beyond that for discharging any portion of the principal fund. 10,000*l.* of the first loan of 59,000*l.* has been paid off, and 40,000*l.* is due next month. Beyond that there has been no provision to pay off the capital. It has been looked on, at any rate for some years to come, as a permanent mortgage.

4613. The fund seems large enough to provide for a small annual sinking fund—If the whole of the duties were applied to that purpose it would be so; but the corporation have at present limited themselves to appropriating 20,000*l.* a year out of the coal duties towards that fund. The remainder of the coal duties is carried to the City's cash.

4614. What is the duration of the 8*d.* duty?—There appears to have been some difference of opinion upon that subject. My own opinion is, that four tenths is continued in perpetuity after the year 1862,; that the remainder of it expires in 1862.

4615. Six tenths therefore will expire?—Yes.

4617. Had the City the prospective power of charging after the Government loan had been paid off?—The Clerkenwell commissioners, who were a separate body from the City, failed in making that improvement; they became in fact bankrupt; they offered to the Government to throw it into their hands. The Board of Works declined it; but the corporation ultimately undertook to finish the street if they were permitted to raise 88,000*l.* upon the fund. They raised that 88,000*l.* upon the fund, and that comes in as a second mortgage after the Woods and Forests are paid their 960,000*l.*

4618. Is any provision made for a sinking fund for that charge?—There is no occasion for it. The proceeds of the London Bridge Approaches duties fund are considered to be sufficient to pay off the whole of those charges by the time that the duties cease in 1862. That is the fund to which the 8*d.* duty is carried, the wine duties, and 11,500*l.* a year contributed by the corporation, and some smaller heads of revenue.

4619. What I desire to know is, whether any means exist for defraying the charge upon the 8*d.* coal duty. You say another fund exists to which the 8*d.* duty contributes?—The 8*d.* coal duty is carried to a fund which possesses other revenues, and arises from other sources. The London Bridge Approaches duties fund, as it has been termed, consists of the coal duties, the wine duties, and a contribution from the City of 11,500*l.*, also fees on the admission of freemen and binding apprentices, and the rentals of waterworks. The revenue is about 140,000*l.* per annum.

4620. There is no separate charge upon the 8*d.* coal duty, but the charges are all made upon this fund?—Quite so.

4621. Is there a sufficient sinking fund provided to pay off the principal of the debt you have been speaking of, when the 8*d.* coal duty expires?—The fund is of itself a sinking fund, because the duty, as it comes in quarterly, is handed over to the Government, who pay off the charges.

B. Scott, Esq.
11th Jan. 1854.

4622. The whole of the principal and the interest of the debt will be extinguished in 1862?—There is no doubt about it.

4623. How much does the 8*d.* coal duty produce annually?—It produced last year 113,600*l.* net.

4624. How much does the 1*d.* duty produce?—About 13,000*l.* net.

4625. Is there any charge upon that fund?—The Board of Works have effected various charges upon that fund; but upon that point I cannot speak, because the accounts are not required to be kept in our department; they are kept entirely with the Woods and Forests.

4626. What is the duration of that 1*d.* duty?—That is a question which I have some difficulty in answering. I am not quite satisfied whether the duty ceases or not in 1862. My impression is that it does. I know there is a difference of opinion upon that subject with the officers of the Board of Works.

4627. In fact, the City have no interest in 9*d.* out of the 1*s.* 1*d.* paid for the coal duty?—They have no interest beyond the charge of 88,000*l.*, which will come upon the London Bridge Approaches fund, for which they have issued bonds, to be met by the proceeds of that fund in 1862.

4628. That 88,000*l.* is not a charge which they have themselves effected, is it?—They undertook the improvement; they raised the money by bonds upon that fund, and they were authorized by the Act to charge it upon that fund; the improvement is beyond their limits, and therefore it was charged upon the London Bridge Approaches fund.

4629. Were the Clerkenwell commissioners independent of the corporation?—Quite so.

4630. Those commissioners, as I understand you, became insolvent, and the corporation undertook their obligations?—Yes; upon the understanding that 88,000*l.* was provided out of some public monies, to complete the improvement; an Act of Parliament was passed for that purpose.

4631. With respect to the 4*d.* coal duty, there is a charge upon the proceeds to the extent of more than half a million?—Yes.

4632. The City pay the annual interest of that sum out of the produce of the 4*d.* coal duty. They provide no sinking fund. They will pay off 40,000*l.* next month, and they apply the rest of the produce of their 4*d.* duty to the general purposes of the corporation. Is that a correct statement?—It is, and they have admitted in those accounts that they conceive it to be a liability upon their revenues. They have raised that money, and made it a liability upon their revenues. They carry the 4*d.* duty to their credit.

4633. Can you state how much of the produce of the coal duty has been expended beyond the limits of the City?—There is a very full return of it in the report made to the committee on the coal duties of last session; and a map has been prepared, which, if it is thought desirable, can be put in, showing the localities within which the improvements are made. Up to the close of the year 1852, when this account was made out, there appears to have been raised upon the coal duty, and expended within the City of London, 1,190,821*l.* 13*s.* 1½*d.*; [there has been a larger amount expended than is raised from the coal duty, because the property on the sides of the streets is sold and carried to the account ultimately;] without the City, 987,500*l.*; of a mixed character, being for the benefit of the City as well as the adjoining districts, 1,818,221*l.* 18*s.* 1½*d.*; making a total of 3,996,543*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* There is a note, however, appended to these statements, showing that it is perfectly impossible to separate items of that kind, and say how much is for the benefit of the City, and how much is not for the benefit of the City, because the City is the heart of the metropolis, and whatever relieves the circulation there will relieve the circulation in the extremities, and whatever relief is afforded in the extremities will be beneficial in the centre. I have brought with me the case and opinion of counsel upon the question, which has been so often discussed in public, as to whether the City had extended the area of their jurisdiction over coals in the year 1851. Perhaps the opinion of the law officers may be given in evidence. "We are of opinion that under each of the statutes referred to the duty upon coals is payable upon coals brought by rail, canal, or road within twenty miles of the Post Office, in a direct line, or, in common parlance, as the crow flies. (Signed) A. E. Cockburn; W. P. Wood; J. A. Stuart Wortley, Recorder; Edward Bullock, Common Serjeant." The question being, whether the measuring distance should be along the line of railway, or as the crow flies, twenty miles. The opinion of counsel was, that the effect of that Act of Parliament and the former Acts was clearly that we had the power before to measure as the crow flies, in a direct line.

4634. What was the date of the contested election for the office of chamberlain in which Sir John Key and yourself were candidates?—It was in May 1853.

4635. How was the vacancy created?—By the death of Mr. Anthony Brown, the preceding chamberlain.

4636. What are the proceedings which bring about an election for a new chamberlain? Is notice given by the corporation?—The Lord Mayor is required by law, within a certain number of days, to call a common hall, to elect a chamberlain.

4637. Was there any other candidate besides yourself and Sir John Key upon that occasion?—No other candidate went to the poll. Mr. Hawes was a candidate for a short period, but retired.

4638. For how many days was the poll kept open?—Seven clear days.

4639. It has been stated to us that the expenses on both sides were very considerable. Have you any objection to state what were your expenses?—As nearly as I can ascertain, they were very nearly the amount stated by the witnesses, about 3,000*l.*

4640. Did that sum include the whole of the expenses of your election?—It did.

4641. In what manner was that sum disbursed; to what purposes was it applied?—Making out lists of voters and polling lists; advertising in the newspapers; addresses, and so on; retaining a large number of canvassers, clerks, and people to canvass and look up voters; cab hire; refreshments to voters and people employed. A great deal of money goes in such elections without the candidate knowing precisely how it goes, or getting any very satisfactory account afterwards.

4642. Did you pay the expenses of bringing non-resident voters to the poll?—Yes.

4643. Was that a considerable item?—Not very large. I should think 100*l.* would cover that item.

4644. What was the expense of the refreshments supplied to voters; was that considerable?—Yes. A large bill is run up for committee rooms and for refreshments, which there is no check upon. In a contested election in the City people eat and drink, whether friends or foes, at your expense.

4645. Were there bills at many public houses and taverns for refreshments?—Yes.

4646. Do you happen to remember what the total amount of expenses for refreshments was?—No, I cannot state it, even approximately. Parties made claims upon me, in round figures, for their expenses, which I was obliged to satisfy, but of which I had no satisfactory account.

4647. Was it more than 1,000*l.*?—I dare say that 1,000*l.* was eaten up during the election in that way.

4648. Was any money given to voters which was virtually a payment for their votes, payment for time and trouble, and so on?—I have no personal knowledge of anything being given in the shape of bribery. I instructed my agents, to keep as clear as they possibly could of all those practices, and I believe they did keep themselves as clear as agents could do in a City election; but charges were made for loss of time, and for different sorts of services, which may possibly have been a consideration for voting.

4649. Do you happen to know what the expenses of your opponent were?—No; I do not. I have only heard by common report, and I should not like to give evidence upon such grounds.

4650. From your own experience, in your election, would you say that an election in common hall was conducted in a satisfactory manner?—No; I should think, very far from what is satisfactory.

4651. Do you see any reason for keeping open the poll for so many days?—No doubt the whole of the poll might be taken, if it were properly regulated, in one day, as is now done in the election for Members of Parliament.

4652. Do you think the constituency is a good one?—I think the livery of London are a highly respectable body; but, in point of fact, I believe they have not the election in their own hands. It is very much in the hands of a low class of liverymen, and a class of men who are not really voters at all; they go there, and throw the weight of their influence into one scale or the other; but, in point of fact, the livery do not decide the question.

4653. To what class of persons do you refer, as overbearing the decision of the livery?—A class of liverymen, who are in the receipt of charity from their different companies; men in a low situation in life, or who are brought to a low ebb, and who are tempted, either for the sake of a day's employment, or for a bribe in money, to sell their votes. I refer also to another class which is known to interfere in these elections, that is, a class of men who have no vote, but who personate liverymen who are on the list, and no doubt, commit both perjury and personation. There seems under the present system to be no effective check, by which such practices may be prevented. Candidates of the most honorable intentions may be victimized, by being supported, as well as opposed, by that class of voters in the City of London.

4654. Do you think the election, in which you were a candidate, was influenced to a considerable extent by that class of voters?—I would rather give evidence generally upon the system, than refer individually to that election. I believe that almost all the elections by that body are swayed, more or less, by that class of voters throwing their weight into one scale or the other; they virtually have the election in their hands, and the more respectable portion of the livery are deprived of their franchise.

4655. According to your view, it is desirable to do something for reforming the constituency in common hall?—I think it is most desirable, if the system cannot be reformed, which I think it can, that it should be abolished.

4656. Is there any advantage in choosing an officer, such as the chamberlain, who has purely administrative duties to perform, by a large constituency rather than by the common council?—I think the common council would be the best judges of the gentleman who would most efficiently conduct their affairs.

4657. Would not the aldermen, and the common council together be quite as likely to choose a fit person for managing the accounts and revenues of the corporation, as a large body of voters, such as vote in common hall?—I think they would be quite as well able to judge of the qualifications of their treasurer and accountant.

11th Jan. 1854.

4658. Practically they superintend his duties, do they not, and are well acquainted with the functions he is called on to discharge?—Certainly.

4659. The constituency in common hall have no knowledge of the manner in which the chamberlain performs his duties, or of the duties which he has to discharge?—Beyond receiving the report annually from the auditors, which is handed also to the common council, the livery do not interfere with the office or with the funds of the corporation in any way.

Adjourned to to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Thursday, 12*th January* 1854.

The Right Honourable HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., in the chair.

Benjamin Scott, Esquire, further examined.

B. Scott, Esq.

4660. Is there anything which you desire to add to the evidence which you gave yesterday?—There was one point in my evidence upon which I felt some difficulty at the time in giving the fullest information to the Commissioners. I communicated my feelings to the gentlemen in the City who constitute the committee. I felt that in some respects I had been confidentially employed, and that I could not, perhaps, answer the questions of the Commissioners so as to give them the fullest information upon the subject without communicating with those gentlemen to ascertain whether I was at liberty to do so. I refer to the questions respecting the existence of a secret service fund. I stated that there was no fund by that name, or of that character, in connection with the corporation, but that, on some occasions, expenditure of a confidential nature had taken place with respect to opposing or promoting bills in Parliament where the City's interests are materially concerned. The reason why I felt a difficulty in answering fully the questions which were put to me was in consequence of my having been employed confidentially in the matter of opposing the Government Bill for removing the Smithfield market, and the measures which were taken for promoting the City's Bill for making the new central cattle market On that occasion the Markets' Improvement Committee, to whom the matter was referred to promote the Bill, and to oppose the competing Bill in Parliament, confided in me a trust that I should be employed to check the expenditure of the Parliamentary officer in that matter. I was, therefore, confidentially aware of that expenditure, but I did not feel, without asking permission, that I was at liberty to disclose what had been made known to me—not officially, but individually—in confidence. In my department of principal clerk to the chamberlain I had nothing whatever to do with matters of that kind; it was merely as an individual in whom the committee reposed confidence that I was employed on that occasion.

4661. What committee do you speak of?—The Markets' Improvement Committee. The expenditure to which I refer amounted to the sum of 2,750*l.*, which appears in the accounts in the years 1850 and 1851, as paid to the remembrancer for the disbursements of the Markets' Improvement Committee. The committee instructed the remembrancer, as their Parliamentary agent, in these words: they authorised him "to take measures by obtaining petitions and expressions of public opinion" that would be against the Government measure, to deprive them of their market and their tolls, and in favour of their measure for a central cattle market, with improvements, such as they submitted to Parliament. In consequence of that order of the committee, the remembrancer took the steps which were reported from meeting to meeting of the committee. The committee, upon hearing his report and my report, drew warrants in the usual form, signed by seven members, which were paid and carried to account in the usual way in the chamber. The only difference was this, that instead of the expenditure coming in detail before the committee, the committee requested me individually to check that expenditure, and it was thus treated as a confidential matter. I am now authorised to state fully to the Commissioners what the amount was, and how it was expended. 2,750*l.* was the whole amount expended. That was expended in canvassing agency, procuring very numerous petitions from all parts of the country, printer's charges, and law stationer's charges. Mr. Acland, who was at that time the Secretary of what was called the Central Markets' Association, an association consisting of butchers and dealers at Smithfield market and parties interested, was employed by the remembrancer upon that occasion, he being fully cognizant of the question, and very well qualified to assist in getting up petitions of this kind.

4662. On behalf of the City?—Yes. A large portion of the money was paid to him; but 2,650*l.* out of the 2,750*l.*, or thereabouts, was expended entirely in those charges, in promoting petitions to Parliament.

4663. Do you mean that the money paid to Mr. Acland was included in the 2,750*l.*?—It was.

4664. That sum covered the entire expenditure of that description?—Of that description. 2,650*l.* out of the 2,750*l.* was exclusively applied in promoting petitions, and in getting up a memorial from the electors, in number 7,000, to the members for the City, and in ascertaining the validity of the signatures. There were frauds committed in signing those papers, and the whole of those signatures had to be tested by agents waiting upon, or writing to the parties to verify their signatures. The remaining 100*l.*, or rather less than 100*l.*, was expended in payments to some gentlemen at the bar, and others, for literary services which they rendered.

4665. What do you mean by literary services?—They had given to them the various reports of select committees of the House of Commons, and the various bills which were before Parliament, and they drew papers and advised with the remembrancer, and were to assist generally in a literary way.

4666. Do you mean that they wrote pamphlets and articles for the newspapers?—I could not state that they wrote articles for the newspapers. I dare say the articles found their way into the newspapers, but there was no arrangement with the press, nor with those parties respecting their doing so, but they were literary persons retained by a fee marked upon the bills. They rendered, no doubt, services of that kind. The only point which I do not feel at liberty to mention is, the names of the gentlemen who were so retained. The whole amount so expended was under 100*l.*

4667. The counsel who were so retained were not employed before the Parliamentary committee, were they?—No. The regular payments of that kind before the committee were charged by the remembrancer in the usual accounts. I am now speaking of that expenditure which, for one reason which I have not yet mentioned, was considered at the time confidential. That reason was, that it is generally understood that petitions presented to Parliament, and expressions of popular opinion, are more powerful if the hand is not seen which is moving that agency. The committee do not wish me to disguise that matter. I believe that is a very common course in oppositions of that kind. Our opponents employed an election agent in the City; a gentleman who is employed in the same way as Mr. Acland is employed in these matters, and they procured petitions also.

4668. Whom do you mean by your opponents?—There was a society formed for the purpose of promoting the removal of Smithfield market, and they employed Mr. Brown as we employed Mr. Acland.

4669. Was there a subscription and funds raised by that committee for that purpose?—There were subscription lists in the papers. I know nothing further than that.

4670. You do not mean that the Government employed any person for that purpose?—Not that I am aware of.

4671. Was that measure promoted by individuals at their individual expense, or was it undertaken by the Government on public grounds?—I have no knowledge of what was done by the Government. I only state that, as the corporation thought their property was attacked, and they were about to be deprived of their tolls without compensation, they felt that they were justified in making use of every means in their power to prevent the passing of such an Act of Parliament.

4672. When those accounts came to be audited, did the auditors take no notice of this sum thus lumped together?—It was not lumped together in the audit account. I should explain that the Blue Book before you is a mere abstract; the audit account is that vellum account which was before you yesterday—a much larger account. The auditors had each warrant, with the signatures of seven members of the Markets' Improvement Committee before them, stating that they were disbursements of that committee in reference to those bills, and were perfectly satisfied in passing the entries with the chamberlain upon such authority.

4673. All that the auditors would look to would be an order by the Markets' Committee for the payment of the sums?—That there was a competent order upon the chamber, and that the receipt of the remembrancer was upon the order.

4674. Do not you think that the auditors, besides that, should take care that the accounts are so distinctly rendered that the expenditure shall be completely intelligible?—As the law now stands, the auditor is required to see that there is a competent authority for drawing upon the chamberlain, and that, upon the face of the order, it is for such a matter as that committee have authority or power to draw for. The order would recite the reference from the Court of Common Council to the Markets' Improvement Committee, and that the order was for Parliamentary services, rendered by the remembrancer.

4675. Admitting that it would not be right that the auditors should have a discretion of saying whether an expenditure was, or was not a proper one, which is a matter to be determined by the authorities themselves, would not it be more satisfactory to the public that the auditors, in the performance of their duty, which is to take care that the accounts are clear and intelligible, and really afford a means of testing the expenditure, should have the power, and exercise the power, of pulling to pieces an account of that sort, and putting each item under its proper head?—It might be desirable to increase the power of the auditors in that respect. I am merely speaking now of how the matter stands at present. The auditor has no authority, and no such authority has been exercised for centuries, of questioning the expenditure of the corporation of London under any head, if there is upon the face of the order the signature of seven members of a committee which has power to draw and spend money for the purpose.

4676. I am not speaking now of the question of the propriety of any expenditure, but, as a mere matter of account, do not you think it desirable that the auditors should have all the authority necessary to take care that the accounts are clear and intelligible, and afford a statement which shall enable the public and the corporation to judge exactly how the money has been spent?—It is desirable that the fullest information should be afforded upon the face of the accounts and the vouchers, to enable the auditor to arrange them under the proper head, provided he be not made a comptroller of the expenditure of the larger body—the body elected by the citizens.

4677. According to the present system, if so large a sum can be wrapped up under a general head, and the nature of the expenditure altogether concealed, does not it open the door to possible abuse?—I think it does. I do not think the power has been abused.

4678. Is there anything else which you desire to state?—Nothing.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, Sergeant-at-Law, Town Clerk, D.C.L., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

4679. You hold the office of Town Clerk to the corporation of the City of London?—I do.

4680. How long have you held that office?—I have held that office for eleven years; in June next it will be twelve years.

4681. Were you connected with the corporation in any manner before that time?—Before that time I was not connected with the corporation, except that I had occasionally been counsel for them in cases which they had in the courts of law and in parliament.

4682. Will you be so good as to inform us what are the duties of the Town Clerk of London?—The duties of the Town Clerk are to attend to all the business of the corporation. He is at the call at all times of the Lord Mayor, the Court of Aldermen, the Court of Common Council, and all the committees emanating from both those bodies. It is his duty also to attend upon the Lord Mayor when required for the purpose of giving advice or assistance, or such information as may be necessary. It is also his duty to attend at every Court of Aldermen, and likewise to attend at every Court of Common Council. It is his duty to take charge of all the documents belonging to the corporation, which are left in his custody. It is also his duty to see that the minutes of the Court of Aldermen are properly entered in those books which are called the repertories. It is his duty also to see that the minutes of the Court of Common Council are duly entered, are duly printed for immediate circulation, and are eventually entered in a set of books which are called the journals. and in which is a minute account of all the proceedings of the Court of Common Council, He has, of course, clerks under his direction for the execution of all these objects. He has clerks for the purpose of attending and taking minutes of all the committees, and some of the minutes of those committees which are standing committees, and have matters particularly committed to them of importance, are afterwards fairly copied, and are regularly preserved. I refer to the Navigation Committee, the City Lands' Committee, and the General Purposes Committee. Besides those duties, he has to attend upon the courts of conservancy, to prepare precepts for the courts of conservancy; particularly he attends, when necessary, the Navigation Committee, which is an important committee, connected with which matters constantly occur which are of considerable importance, particularly with regard to the regulation of the Thames. I believe I have given a general view of the duties. Of course I am prepared to enter into any further particulars if the Commissioners desire it.

4683. Do those duties occupy the whole of the time of the Town Clerk?—I think I can say those duties occupy the whole of his time, as well as the time of all the clerks in his office. He has a chief clerk, who has been fifty-two years in the office. Of course he does a great deal, and is referred to on all occasions when any question of difficulty arises.

4684. Does the Town Clerk ever engage in private practice or other professional business, except that connected with the City?—None at all. I do not think I have, since I have been in the office, done above two or three things of a general character, and they were under peculiar circumstances, and were cases upon which I had been advising before I took the office upon me. One of them was a question respecting the Scotch fisheries in the House of Lords. One or two cases also I have answered, particularly a case or two for the Borough of Reading, of which I am Recorder, which was specified to the corporation at the time I was elected, as well as my being Solicitor-General to Her Majesty the Queen Dowager. Those several matters were mentioned to the corporation, and I had their sanction for attending to each of them.

4685. As a general rule, was it the understanding when you took the situation that you should devote your whole time to the business of the corporation?—It was a decided term of my appointment.

4686. What is the salary attached to the office?—The salary proposed to me when I entered the office was 2,000*l.* a-year; it has never really equalled that amount, except in one year, when I think it exceeded it, but an account of the whole of the receipts was laid before the committee of common conncil, and finding that for many years it was under the amount which I was led to expect, they made good the amount for the year when I made the application. That is now some years ago. I have made another application since that time, which is at present before the committee of the corporation.

4687. From what sources is your salary derived?—The salary is derived from many sources. A certain sum is paid out of the City cash, amounting to 900*l.* a-year, by four quarterly payments. The remainder is made up of allowances from different funds of the corporation, of which I shall be very ready to lay before the Commissioners an account. They are different accounts, which are kept in the Chamberlain's office, and when I was appointed I was directed to be paid 50*l.* out of one account, 50*l.* out of another, and there were four or five sums of that kind. When I receive my salary I have to give five receipts for the different sums. Besides that, I am nominally the registrar of the Mayor's court, but at the time of my appointment it was particularly provided that I should nominate a deputy to execute the duties of the registrar in the Mayor's court. I appointed, of course, the gentleman who had long been in that office, and had discharged the duties of it, and was well acquainted with all the proceedings, which, probably, the Commissioners are aware are of a peculiar character. It was essential for the sake of the City Recorder who presides that a proper person should be put into that situation. Certain fees out of the Mayor's court were still reserved to me—among them a certain sum for affixing the City seal for authenticating documents, which go to the colonies and abroad generally.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

4688. Does the amount of those receipts fluctuate?—It fluctuates much. The Mayoralty seal has fluctuated considerably. It has always fell short of the estimate which was made upon my entering upon the office, till a very late period, when, under the sanction of the Recorder, alterations have been suggested in the Mayor's court, reducing the fees of the court, but which have had the effect, as was anticipated, of much increasing the business. The court, in point of fact, being recommended to be thrown open to all counsel and to all attorneys has led to an addition of business which has increased that product considerably. Of course I felt that I had no title whatever to that increase of fees produced by those means, and I communicated to the committee, as well as to the common council, that I should not take any of that increase, but limit my receipts to the amount which was calculated as my proportion.

4689. In your opinion, would not it be desirable that there should be a regular salary attached to your office, and that the amount should not depend upon the fluctuation of those fees?—Personally, when I entered upon the office I determined to myself that I would not make it a matter of money, and therefore I yielded to whatever the common council did, but it is fit that I should state to the Commission that the common council themselves, I believe, strongly entertained the opinion, and have made a reference to a committee upon the subject, that for some of the charges which are made, and some of the fees paid in my office a money payment should be substituted. I, of course, was led to expect that 2,000*l.* a-year would be the salary and that is all I have the slightest expectation of. To me, personally, it would be a gratification if that were received in the shape of salary, and there were no fees whatever.

4690. Did you state that barristers and attorneys were now freely admitted to practise in the Lord Mayor's Court?—They are not yet admitted, but the subject is under the consideration of a committee, who have had a great deal of trouble in making this arrangement, as might be expected. So far as the counsel are concerned, upon the matter being mentioned to them they most readily consented to give up their claim upon the terms which were suggested to them by the committee.

4691. What was the nature of the claim to that exclusive practice?—There were four common pleaders, who, immemorially, as far as I could trace back in the books, had had a regular retainer from the corporation. They had also the livery, and had the privilege of demanding to be employed in all causes. No cause could be heard before the Recorder in which one or other of these gentlemen was not engaged on the one side or the other. That was found to be an impediment in the court. They were appealed to. One gentleman surrendered the office; another gentleman was admitted in his stead, but an express stipulation was made that he was not to insist upon any exclusive privilege,—and two others therefore only remained who were entitled to it. Both of those gentlemen concurred at once upon the suggestion of the committee in giving up the privilege.

4692. How were they appointed?—They were elected by the common council. There were also four attorneys of the Mayor's court, as they were called, having each of them peculiar duties as such attorney. The senior attorney has the custody of the seal. The second attorney is the clerk of the Hustings' court. The third attorney and the fourth attend at all the wardmotes when there is an election upon any vacancy, and they make a return of that election to the Court of Aldermen. I rather mention this for the purpose of showing that they have some peculiar duties as officers of the Mayor's court. Besides that, they have the exclusive practice in the Mayor's court. They alone practise in the court. Other attorneys if they want to practise there use them, as was formerly the case in some of the courts of law, as parties to transact business, paying them agency fees for doing so.

4693. How were they appointed?—Those were some of the offices of the corporation which unfortunately years ago were sold, and they all therefore take office in that manner, the sale comprehending a power of alienation, so that if they alienated before their death, the office then went to their successors who were appointed and who might be young men. Therefore it had a tendency to go on in perpetuity. The corporation have felt the inconvenience of that, and are very desirous to re-purchase the places. Two vacancies have occurred since I have been in the corporation. One was a case where a gentleman at a very advanced period of life died suddenly, having omitted to alienate; at least, though he had executed a deed for the purpose, it was not with such formalities as could be relied on, and therefore the grantee from him was contented under an arrangement with the committee of the common council, to take the place under certain terms, under which he was to have no power of alienation. The other attorney of the court is the city solicitor, who was requested by the committee to take upon himself that office as a locum tenens, till arrangements were made, and who I believe has derived very little profit from it. That being the real nature of his occupation, of course he has no power of alienating; there are therefore only two persons who have the power now of alienation. The power of alienation of one of them has been purchased by an arrangement for a sum of money to be paid upon his death, but no arrangement has been made with respect to his share of the practice, which is supposed to be materially interfered with by the new arrangement made in the court by other attorneys being admitted. The other attorney has had no arrangement made with him, either for alienation or with respect to his practice, a misunderstanding unfortunately arising between him and the committee, at the time when his case was under consideration. It was agreed that a certain sum should be paid him for his right of alienation, but the committee apprehended that that included also his giving up his practice, upon the notion that being in very good practice in the court, he would, though the court was opened, have as large a share of business as he had before. He did not think it was included, the committee thought it was. That produced a little misunderstanding, and the matter has been standing over ever since, but is still before the committee.

4694. Is it the amount of compensation that those parties might fairly be entitled to, which has caused the delay?—Yes, but it might be satisfactory that I should state how the difficulty arises with respect to that. A short time ago, a general Act of Parliament was passed, giving all parties a right to be admitted in courts of inferior jurisdiction. The matter was before the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a mandamus, applied for by some individual to be admitted into the Mayor's Court, under the authority of that Act of Parliament. The application was opposed on the part of the attorneys of the Mayor's Court, they contending that the general words of an Act of Parliament did not over-ride the peculiar customs of the City. The Court of Queen's Bench after argument were of a different opinion, and held that the Act of Parliament did apply to it, and consequently that the court should be opened. But a writ of error was applied for upon that judgment. It went to the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The Court of Exchequer Chamber, as I understand, did not differ decidedly in opinion from the Court of Queen's Bench, but an objection to a return of the mandamus was taken, which was proved to be fatal, and there the matter has rested ever since. Under those circumstances, there being this question arising upon the statutes, and it being the feeling of the corporation that if the gentleman had really purchased his place under other apprehensions, and supposed he was entitled to hold it, though in law he might not be strictly entitled to compensation, they were ready to do him substantial justice, and to take an equitable view of his case.

4695. Are the Commissioners to understand you that there is no doubt about the principle in the view of the corporation, and that they are prepared to throw open the court both with regard to barristers and attorneys, the only question being one relating to the compensation of those individuals, so far as they think their claims are equitable?—I ought to state that it was the decided opinion and the recommendation of the Recorder that that should be the case. That was acted on by the Court of Aldermen, who decided that they should be admitted, and in consequence of that, a great number of attorneys have been admitted, and have had their names entered upon the roll.

4696. Then the admission has actually taken place?—There is a gentleman who has questioned it, one of the old attorneys has brought an action against one of the attorneys so admitted, and that action is still pending; the whole matter of the arrangement is before the committee, but I think there is every reason to expect that they will act under the advice of the Recorder, and will eventually carry it out, though there is a little difficulty in arranging it. In order to avoid the litigation which will arise out of this very complicated question, they are endeavouring to make such arrangements as all parties may concur in.

4697. In the Court of Queen's Bench there was a difficulty in respect to the mandamus you speak of on the ground of there not being a roll?—Yes.

4698. Then the case went to the Exchequer Chamber, and the Exchequer Chamber determined it upon a technical bye point?—Yes. In the return it was described as a court of law, and it was not said also that it was a court of equity, which is the fact.

4699. There was no decision upon the main point by the Exchequer Chamber?—There was not. The difficulty in respect to the roll in the Queen's Bench was, that there being no roll in point of fact in the City, that was argued as a proof that the clause did not apply to the City court.

4700. Are there any other courts connected with the City, in which there are any exclusive privileges of the nature to which you have been referring?—There were two courts called the Sheriff's Courts. The City of London was divided into two compters, as they were called, of which there were two particular officers, called sheriffs. For each of those compters there was a judge;—they were called judges of the sheriffs court. When the alteration of the law took place with reference to the county courts generally, the corporation felt that the sheriff's court was in such a peculiar situation that it would require a separate and distinct Act for the City of London. Accordingly an application was made for an Act, and the Act was passed, and now to a certain degree the old sheriff's court is absorbed in the county court for the City of London. It is still called the sheriff's court, and they were very desirous not to interfere with the officers in that court, but there are still officers existing connected with the old sheriff's court, which is still kept alive by that Act of Parliament, but I do not think that they derive profit or interfere much with their proceedings. Mr. Brand, who is the prothonotary there, one of the officers' is present, and there were some other officers called clerk setters, but they have fallen off by degrees; the number is now reduced to one.

4701. The statute with respect to what may be called the county court of the City of London, was originally the 10th and 11th of Victoria, chapter 71, local and personal, was not it?—Yes.

4702. Were not the same provisions in that Act which were rather conflicting with the provisions of the county court Act, and was not that Act of Parliament therefore repealed by the 15th and 16th of Victoria, chapter 77, local and personal?—I understand from the remembrancer—and from recollection, I have no doubt he is quite accurate—that it was repealed with the view of making it co-extensive with the general Act on the subject.

4703. There is a difference between the general county court Act and the City Act, as to the persons who are to be sued in the City Act the words are inserted "or have any employment in the City of London," which are not in the county court Act?—It was intended I have no doubt by the second Act, that the jurisdiction should be as extensive at least as that under the general Act, and it would appear that they have even gone beyond it. I understand from the remembrancer, that those particular words "or employed in the City," were introduced for the purpose of including under the operation of the Act all the clerks in the numerous private and public institutions in the City. Clerks at the Bank for instance, and others of the same description.

4704. Are you aware whether any complaints have been made of the extreme difficulty of discovering whether any man has any employment in the City?—I have not heard of any complaints of that kind; I think it would have been represented by the judge to the committee if there had been any, because the committee frequently meets to consider the operation of this statute, and looks to it both in a financial and a judicial point of view to a certain extent, having constantly the concurrence of Mr. Gurney the judge.

4705. Do you exercise any superintendence over the legal business of the City of London?—None at all.

4706. Have you any communication with the City Solicitor upon the subject of the conduct of the legal business?—I am happy to say I am in constant conference both with the remembrancer and the solicitor, as to matters connected with their different departments, but I never interfere with them unless I am asked, and when I do so, it is more in the way of suggestion than anything else.

4707. You are not responsible for the conduct of either of those officers in their respective situations?—Not at all. Of course it would be my duty at any time, to advise either the Court of Aldermen, or the Court of Common Council, or any of the committees, if I saw in either of the departments anything proceeding which I thought was contrary to the interests of the corporation. It is my duty to take care to give such advice to the corporation as I think would be generally for their benefit.

4708. In the conduct of any law proceedings in which the corporation may be engaged, who does the solicitor consult with?—The solicitor has again and again consulted with me upon many points. Of course I am ready to take all the responsibility of any advice which I have given in that respect.

4709. He would not take your directions, would he; you do not consider yourself responsible?—Most certainly not. The course which he would take would be that which any other solicitor would take; he would resort to counsel and act under their advice, that is what he invariably does. Of course acting for a public body, it is fit and proper that he should not so much rely upon his own individual judgment as upon that of the recorder, if it is a corporate question, or upon that of the common serjeant. If he requires assistance beyond that, he calls in aid the first counsel in the country. The attorney and solicitor general are always retained as counsel for the corporation.

4710. There is no one officer now representing the corporation in matters of that kind who communicates with the solicitor?—No. I imagine if any interference of that kind were necessary, the recorder and common serjeant would be the two officers who would interpose.

4711. A solicitor acting for a private individual would be of course in communication with that individual, and to a certain degree take his directions. Is there any officer who represents the corporation generally in matters of this description, and confers with the solicitor and guides his conduct to a certain degree?—Upon matters of great difficulty and where it is essential that the corporation as his clients as it were should be consulted, he applies to the common council, or if it is a matter which has been referred to in any committee he applies to that particular committee who has the matter in charge. Practically I do not think the slightest difficulty arises from that mode of disposing of the legal business of the corporation.

4712. Are the charters in your custody?—They are. They are here, at least copies of them, which I presumed would be more convenient to the Commissioners. The originals shall be brought here if you have any wish to see them.

12th Jan. 1854.

4713. Have you here copies of all the charters possessed by the City?—The greater part of them.

4714. How many are there in number?—They are about 120 altogether; they are not all in this book; they were directed to be translated and arranged by a gentleman in the Tower very conversant with these matters—Mr. Hardy, who has made a translation of the charters up to the reign of Edward the 3rd. Since that time he has satisfied himself with giving the charter of Inspeximus of the reign of Charles the 2nd, which in truth includes almost all the former ones. This volume (producing the same), contains translations of the charters up to the reign of Edward the 3rd; this, (another volume), contains the Inspeximus of Charles the 2nd, which includes all the charters. The charters which were omitted were quite immaterial as being repetitions of former charters. In early times it was the practice of corporations and others, to apply to the king in the first year of his reign, for a confirmation of the charters of the former reigns.

4715. Have your charters ever been published?—They have been published in many shapes. There was an individual of the name of Luffman, who published them in print.

4716. Was that officially on the part of the City?—No they have never been published on the part of the City.

4,717. Does the Inspeximus of Charles the 2nd contain a recital of all the charters previously to that time?—Very nearly all—all with the exception of the charters I have alluded to, which were mere transcripts at the beginning of another reign of the charters which had been granted by the preceding kings. The charters have been published also by Mr. Norton, I believe most correctly. No book connected with the corporation of the City of London has ever been written which contains more accurate information than that book of Mr. Norton. The object of that book was not to give so much a bead roll of the charters, as it was to show the nature of the institutions of the City of London, and the first part of his book is limited to that point, but as it was obvious that frequent reference to the charters would make it necessary to produce them, he goes through them all and I believe there is nothing material omitted by him.

4718. Was that book published by authority?—Mr. Norton was at that time one of the common pleaders. It was before he went to India; he published this book entirely upon his own account. Mr. Tyrrell edited the book after Mr. Norton was appointed to India.

4719. Mr. Tyrrell at that time appears to have been deputy remembrancer to the City of London?—He was.

4720. Therefore the publication may be said to be quasi official?—It is everything but official.

4721. It has the authenticity and accuracy of an official publication, though not professedly made by the City of London?—The writer had all the information and all the means of access to documents which would have been conceded to a person who published it officially, but it has not the stamp of the corporation upon it.

4722. Do you mean that this book contains the entire substance of the charters of the City of London?—I think it does.

4723. Complaints have been made to the Commissioners that parties engaged in litigation with the City of London have suffered considerable injury from not being allowed access to those charters, under which claims were made which they thought unfounded or prejudicial to them. How do you reconcile that with the statement that the substance of those charters is published in extenso, and available to all the world?—I cannot myself think but that the complaint is frivolous and unfounded. I have no idea of anybody, who has an interest or a wish to know the contents of the charters of the corporation of London, who could not put himself in possession of the information at any book-stall in the City.

4724. In point of fact, would a person interested in a point connected with one of those charters be allowed to inspect those charters?—To a person in a suit, who was not a freeman, without the permission of the corporation I would not show the charters, if he was in litigation with them. I am sure I shall be excused for saying that I imagine that that is the most ordinary ground of defence of any person who is called on to show his title, or vindicate his title, to any right or possession. Any person applied to would shut his muniment room, or his box of deeds, and would not show them in such a manner that the production of them would be proof against him as an admission. If I, the recognized officer of the corporation, were to show any of these documents to any individual applying for them in the course of litigation, of course it could be given in evidence that I had done so, and that to a certain degree might prejudice the question which was depending in the courts of law against the corporation.

4725. If a claim is made on the part of a great body like the corporation of London against an individual, founded upon a charter, does not it seem hard that the individual should not have the fullest means of investigating the charter so far as relates to that claim?—I imagine it is a hardship, to which every person who makes a claim against another in possession is subjected. It would seem to me, with respect to that as well as to other matters, that the solicitor would refer to counsel.

4726. Do you think that a corporation like that of the City of London, acting under a public trust, is warranted in proceeding on exactly the same principle that an individual would in defending his own private property?—I must confess it has always appeared to me that it was so; and I have known repeated instances, in my own experience, in which corporations attacked have shut the doors of their muniment rooms, and prevented the inspection of the documents.

4727. You think there is no distinction to be drawn between the two cases?—I cannot conceive any. I should certainly regard it as my duty to withhold the inspection under such circumstances.

4728. A case has been stated to us in which an individual, engaged in a long and expensive course of litigation with the City of London, was resisted in his demand to see those charters. The court, upon application, decided that the City of London should produce those charters. The City then again appealed, and, in short, fought the point in that way with that private individual, resisting the production of the charters on which its own claim was made?—That question is before the ordinary tribunals of the country, and is not yet decided.

4730. If any one were to bring an action against the corporation, you say it would not be reasonable that they should be called on to show their charters. But suppose the corporation were to bring an action themselves against an individual, as in the case of Combe, Delafield, and Company, and the answer were—"We resist your claim, and call "upon you to tell us under what authority you make it," is that precisely the same situation as you have alluded to?—There would be only a difference in point of morality or of feeling—none in equity or in law.

4731. We were told that the Master of the Rolls, or the Vice Chancellor, had made an order; there was an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, who then confirmed the order; and now there is an appeal to the House of Lords, which is pending?—I have nothing to do with the legal proceedings, nor do I know with sufficient accuracy the position in which the case stands to be able to refer to it.

4732. If in reality the substance of these charters is published, and known to all the world, what reason can there be for the City preventing anybody from inspecting them?—I really imagine that it resolves itself into a pure question of law and legal proceedings. I believe there is no object, nor can I think there is any object; but whether there is any or is not must depend upon the progress of the cause, and upon the circumstances connected with the cause; but I am quite confident of this, that no step of this kind has been taken without the impartial and unprejudiced advice and opinion of the best lawyers of the land, taken in the progress of a legal proceeding. I am sure in the corporation there is no feeling upon the subject, nor any intention to deal harshly with individuals.

4733. Does the present state of the charters of the City of London give rise to a good deal of doubt with regard to claims, and consequently to a good deal of litigation?—I think but little. I have never heard but of those two cases; I cannot, however, conceive anything more easy than it is to raise a doubt upon almost every charter that was ever granted. The moment a charter is exposed to legal investigation, the imperfections of language, the ignorance of the circumstances under which the charter was granted, and probably the nature of the general words contained in the charter would render it open, at least, to argument and discussion if it were brought before a court; there have been thousands of instances of that kind.

4734. You are probably aware what was the course taken by the legislature in the Municipal Reform Act with regard to the charters of other corporations in the United Kingdom?—Perhaps I may infer that you allude to the preamble of the Bill, and the clause repealing the former charters. I would almost rather not express my opinion upon that subject. I am quite aware of it; but I must confess that I always looked upon that as the most unconstitutional Act that was ever done in this country.

4735. In point of fact other corporations now hold any rights which they have under statute, and not under charter. Is not that the case?—That Act of Parliament, I think, repeals all the charters as far as they are inconsistent with the Act itself, and no further.

4736. As far as relates to property, and matters of that kind, it leaves the charters subsisting, but with regard to functions and powers it repeals them, except so far as they are not inconsistent with the general law of the land. Is not that so?—I believe it is. My apprehension of it has always been, and I have been called on to act upon it, that the repeal is purely confined to matters that would be inconsistent with the particular provisions of the Act.

4737. As a general principle, the other corporations of the country hold their powers under statute, and not under charter. Is not that so?—I do not think I could go the length of that proposition. There are the words—"Be it therefore enacted that so "much of all royal and other charters, grants and letters patent, now in force relating to "the several boroughs named in the schedules A and B, to this Act annexed, or to the "inhabitants thereof, or to the several bodies or reputed bodies corporate, named in the said

12th Jan. 1854.

"schedules, or any of them as are inconsistent with or contrary to the provisions of this "Act, shall be and the same are hereby repealed and omitted."

4738. In effect this preamble of the Act over-rides all the charters?—I presume the inference to be drawn from it is, that this Act, being passed for the public good, is made by the Legislature to over-ride such parts of the several charters as are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

4739. In all cases to which the Act applies?—Yes.

4740. How many charters are there in the books which you have before you?—I think the whole of the charters in this book are one hundred and twenty.

4741. That number of one hundred and twenty would include the whole series from the earliest charter down to the latest?—From the charter of William the Conqueror down to the present time.

4742. How many of those are in print in a form accessible to the public?—There are forty-nine contained in Mr. Norton's book, and they are the substantial charters of the City.

4743. Do you think that any evil would arise if the City were required to publish all its charters officially?—There was an application some years ago by Mr. Pulling, who has written a book containing a good deal of information upon the subject of the City of London, but certainly not quite accurate. He made an application to the Court of Common Council for permission to publish the charters. The corporation considered the matter much, and it was debated in the Common Council. It ended in its being not thought proper to concede that to him. I ought not to omit saying, what is the real fact, that the Court of Common Council said they thought, if they were published at all, they should be published by one of their own officers. Certainly the remembrancer and myself contemplated the propriety of doing such a thing. I can answer for myself, and I believe he can also state, that the duties of our offices are such that it would be in vain to expect to have an opportunity of doing so.

4744. Irrespective of that, do you think any inconvenience or evil would arise from their publication?—I have no idea of there being anything objectionable in it; and when my opinion is asked, I must beg that it must be understood solely as an opinion of mine divested of my official character. I cannot answer in that character for the corporation; but for myself, I should think, if they were published and proclaimed at Charing Cross, it would do no injury whatever to any one. I imagine everybody is already in possession of knowledge of the contents of the charters quite sufficient for any purpose that may be required, except for actual proof in the courts of law.

4745. At present there is a considerable number of charters in existence of which there is no printed copy; is not there?—I do not think there is any one which contains anything material of which there is not a printed copy.

4746. You speak of those which are in the possession of the City?—Yes.

4747. Do you know if there are any charters which have by some accident got into the hands of private individuals?—I think it very possible. I am afraid there was a time when the documents of the City of London were not kept with that vigilance with which I hope they are kept now, and when there was not the same convenience of keeping them; but now the common council have provided proper rooms for their safe custody, and they are properly arranged.

4748. Are you aware of any particular charters which are so circumstanced?—No, I am not. I believe, however, there are charters in the Tower of London which are not in the possession of the corporation. I should state that the charters of the City of London are all of them, in fact, confirmed by Act of Parliament; many of them are granted with the sanction of Parliament.

4749. They are confirmed generally, are not they; the powers are not specified, and then confirmed?—The point which I wish to draw the attention of the Commissioners to, is this, that a great many of the charters are in effect specified upon the face of them to be made by the King, with the consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. Then a quo warranto having proceeded against the corporation of London, and all the charters having been seized by Charles II., upon the accession of William III. an Act of Parliament was passed expressly confirming the charters of the corporation.

4750. You stated that the number of charters in the possession of the City of London was about 120, and you also said, that rather less than fifty was the number in print?—That is the number in print in Mr. Norton's book, but I rather think in the volume before me there are more than that printed.

4751. Do you suppose the number in print considerably exceeds half the total number?—I should think not.

4752. Of the half which remains unprinted, are there any which you believe to be important?—I believe none at all. I have stated that I believe the little book before me, which is not a good translation, contains the greatest portion of the charters, and Mr. Norton gives everything material. I have never found occasion to see any other charter which was not contained in his book.

4753. Is there any order of the common council, or any instruction with respect to the office of town clerk, on the subject of the exhibition of the charters either to freemen or to the public generally?—With your permission, I will read the standing order upon the subject. These are the standing orders upon the subject of records. "55. Every member of this court now has, and always has had, a right to inspect the books and papers belonging to the corporation, save and except such as may be under the consideration of any of the committees. And further, every member of this court has a right to take such extracts as he may require. No officer of this court shall be at liberty to show, lay open, or expose, any of the books, papers, or records, of the corporation to any person not a member of the corporation, without leave or licence of this court." Therefore, I here to-day produce these charters before you, under the sanction of the court, who have desired that all the officers of the corporation shall afford all the information, oral and documentary, to Her Majesty's Commissioners which they may require.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4754. Any person, not being a freeman of the City, who should be in litigation with the City on any right contained in a charter, would be debarred from the power of inspecting any charter unless he could obtain the information from some printed book?—In the terms of that proposition, I should say certainly.

4755. Supposing he were to apply to the Court of Common Council for information, what would be the answer he would probably receive?—The application, in all probability, would be made to me, and I should say that he could not see them; but if he pressed his application, and thought fit either to request me to mention it to the common council, or should himself memorialize the common council upon the subject, of course I should give him every facility in both those respects.

4756. The charters of the City of London, either all or for the most part have, in fact, the force of Acts of Parliament, have they not?—Directly or indirectly they certainly have.

4757. If the corporation brings any private person into court as a defendant, and the litigation turn upon some public right, created by charter, does not it seem reasonable that he should be officially and authentically informed of the charter, or other document, or muniment, upon which the claim rests?—If it related according to the terms of the proposition to any public right, it is a question which I do not feel myself competent to answer, but if it related in any degree to the private rights of the corporation, I should say the party could not be entitled to the information.

4758. Take the case of the corporation against Combe and Delafield. The statement which has been made to us is this: that Messrs. Combe and Delafield imported certain malt into London, from a place in the east of England, and that they did not wish to measure that malt, but that when they landed it upon the quay, in the port of London, not within the precincts of the City, they were informed that the City insisted upon measuring it, and that certain metage dues would be charged for that measurement. They said that they were aware of the quantity of that malt, and did not wish to have it measured, and they declined, therefore, to submit to the City metage. Thereupon, the City institutes proceedings, and brings them into court. They say they do not know what is the legal ground upon which this claim rests, and they file a Bill of Discovery, to compel the City to produce the charter, or other instrument, upon which the claim is founded. The City make some resistance to this application, and gave, what is considered by the defendants, imperfect information. Thereupon, further litigation ensues. Does it appear to you that in that case the City, acting, no doubt, under the advice of counsel, took a reasonable course with regard to the claim which they were seeking to enforce?—I am quite sure you will excuse me, having been bred up to the law, and having practised in the law for a great number of years, if I have a hesitation in answering a question which relates to matters now under the consideration of the courts, and in the ordinary course of legal inquiry; but still, if the Commissioners wish me to answer the question upon that point, I will do so. I imagine that all the proceedings in that action have been, as I stated before, considered and taken under the advice of professional men. Of course, I do not wish to express any opinion adverse to, or in any degree touching upon, the course which they have thought right to recommend, but I should think that if Messrs. Combe and Delafield, or any body else, wished to have a knowledge of what the charter contained, there is a little book they might obtain at any stall, which would give it to them, but how far it might be prudent or becoming to give a copy of that from the archives of the corporation, in the progress of litigation, is what I must be excused from expressing my opinion on. I ought to inform the Commissioners that this which is demanded of Combe, Delafield, and Co. is what has been taken in the river Thames, I believe, as far back as any trace can be made; but the corporation of London have always felt that, whatever rights they have, they were inclined to exercise those rights with respect to all equitable claims, as well as with reference to the benefit of the general trade of the port, which to them is, of course, of the greatest consequence. They had, therefore, before this inquiry began, referred this question of metage, and that of corn not wanted to be measured, which is an essential ingredient in it to a committee, who have sat for thirty-nine days, I think, and have examined a great number of witnesses—they have courted a meeting of those connected with this trade—such a meeting has been held, and there seems to be every prospect of their coming to an amicable arrangement upon the subject. I state that to shew that the corporation are most anxious that everything should be done which is equitable, as well as for the general benefit of the trade.

4759. There is no doubt that the corporation, till an order of a court of competent jurisdiction is made upon them, have a right to refuse the inspection of those documents; but in a case where they sought to enforce a right in restraint of trade extending over the whole port of London, and not confined to the precincts of the City, does it seem a reasonable course that they should not set forth fully the legal grounds upon which they make that claim? It would then be a question whether the facts proved in the individual case would justify the enforcement of the claim; but does not it seem reasonable, that they should set forth fully the legal grounds upon which the claim is founded?—I think you are asking me with respect to proceedings at law; they take their ordinary and usual course, and with respect to the expediency of yielding to any matter which is in restraint of trade, that is a question of general policy which I can hardly be expected to give an answer to.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4760. Is there any general charter with respect to the constitution of the corporation?—There is no governing charter of that description in the City of London, and perhaps I can explain the reason why that is so. Those charters to which I thought it right to draw the attention of the Commissioners speak so constantly, and that from the earliest charter down to almost the present time, of the customs of London, that I have no doubt it was left from time to time to be regulated by the customs of London. The Commissioners are probably aware that not only did the charters refer to the customs of London, but there is a particular provision in the charters for authenticating the customs of London, which is by the recorder ore tenus before the court in which they may be called in question. It is provided that, whenever the customs of London are called in question, the mayor, alderman, and commons, shall be at liberty to report by word of mouth their customs, and to do that by the mouth of the recorder. That is practised in the present day. There have been two or three instances lately, during the time of the present recorder, in which certificates have been given by him in court by word of mouth.

4761. That is a privilege which was never possessed by any other corporation?—I believe not. Probably the Commissioners are aware, with respect to these governing charters, as in modern times they have been called, that they were not in practice at all till after the reign of Henry the Sixth. It is since that period that they have by degrees come into that formal shape which has entitled them to the name of governing charters, a term which generally signifies the last charter granted to them, which specifies with particularity that they shall be corporations in fact and in name; that they shall have a Common Seal; that they shall have a mayor, so many aldermen, so many common councilmen, and other officers mentioned. And then the charter goes on to appoint a succession of different persons to those offices, and provide for future elections. That is the general nature of a governing charter; but that is a practice comparatively speaking of modern times.

4762. Does not the corporation of London possess a power of themselves modifying and improving their municipal institutions, which was never possessed by any other corporation in this country?—Yes; they have a particular charter which authorizes the Mayor and Aldermen, with the consent of the commonalty, to alter any of their customs which may require amendment or remedy, and to make such provisions as shall be for the good of the King and the public.

4763. What is the construction which has been put upon these words, which seem rather vague?—There has not been recently any direct construction put upon them. The charter was called to the attention of the common council a short time ago with reference to an improvement which was then meditated, and it was considered with reference to the Election Act of the City of London, the 11th of George the 1st., which assumes that the right of electing was in the Liverymen. That Act of Parliament has been very frequently under the consideration of the common council, and in reference to that and other matters, this power of remedying any defects in their own constitution was considered, but it was found impossible to use it against the express words of the Act of Parliament; therefore they thought that the Act of the 11th George the 1st. could only be got rid of by an actual repeal in Parliament.

4764. Has it been found that this charter would give to the City the power of making any alterations, however extensive, which were not in direct contravention of an Act of Parliament?—I think the power seems to be as large as words could well make it. I will take care that a copy of the clause shall be before you.

4765. Are there any other material distinctions between the corporation of London and the other corporations of this country, as they existed before the Municipal Reform Act?—I do not think there are in substance, but the old charters of many of the other boroughs were overlooked and disregarded. The system in the City of London, however, seems always to have been to keep alive the recollection of their old charters, and to act as uniformly in respect to them as they possibly could. I am not aware of any other important distinction. I think the real distinction is that they have not a governing charter, because their customs had formed them into the shape they have assumed at present, and they thought if they wished to alter it, they had the power under the charter of Edward the Third, of doing so.

4766. Were not there then some of the other corporations which resemble the corporation of London in that respect, in not having a governing charter?—Yes, there were many. As I stated before, and I believe I am justified in saying so, there were no governing charters, as they are called in these times, existing before the reign of Henry the Sixth; I believe the doctrine of corporations had not been thoroughly understood up to that time.

4767. Can you call to mind any considerable towns in England which have not governing charters?—I cannot at this moment, but I can inform myself upon the subject, because I have taken pains to collect them all together.

4768. What is the evidence upon which the recorder satisfies his mind as to the existence of any custom, when he certifies it at the bar of the Court of Queen's Bench?—By a painful and conscientious inquiry into the information to be derived from records in my possession. The former recorder I know gave a great deal of time to the consideration of one important certificate which he made, and the present recorder certainly entered into a considerable investigation, in order to justify him in the certificate which he lately made. One case, I remember, was argued at some length on two different days before the recorder.

4769. Is there considerable difficulty in construing old charters, and arriving at conclusions with respect to the customs of the City?—I think I may say, generally, all the charters are in such general language that they are open to discussion. I do not know, practically speaking, that there is any difficulty in applying them. Of course it will be my duty, among the other charters which I was requested to be prepared to give you information on, to read that charter which relates to the City metage, and the Act of Parliament which has adopted it and has been founded upon it.

4770. Is the certificate of the recorder necessarily taken as a proof of the validity of any custom in the City of London?—It is absolutely conclusive as to the existence of the custom; it is no doubt subject to the decision of courts of law upon it, but it is conclusive in itself; the custom would be taken, for instance, as a fact.

4771. If a question arises, and the recorder is called in to certify whether the custom exists or not, in point of fact, does the recorder hear it argued before him?—The course which the recorder took in the recent case, was to apply to me to know if I could give him any information from the records upon the subject. He applies also to the deputy registrar of the court, as to any matters in his knowledge, and having informed himself in that way, he then hears both parties, and from the conflict he makes up his mind.

4772. Supposing a contest to arise as to the existence of a particular custom, would the inspection of all the charters from beginning to end enable you to say whether it existed or not?—I think not.

4773. The charters themselves do not specify the customs, but preserve them; is not that the case?—Precisely so. Besides the charters I have a large mass of books in my possession, going back to a very remote antiquity.

4774. Containing bye laws?—Some of them contain bye laws and other acts done, shewing usage. The principal points would turn upon the usage, and upon that we have abundant records and many indices, some very perfect, but others not quite so perfect; but when I am called upon to look into them, I amply satisfy myself as to what is the information contained in those records.

4775. In the present state of the records and charters of the corporation, is not the existence of any custom or any rule of corporate law, a question of difficult research and requiring labour?—Certainly.

4776. And much legal knowledge and acumen?—Perhaps so. I think it is rather a dry investigation of facts, leading to the conclusion that at such a time such a thing was done.

4777. Is not it also necessary to judge of the effect of those facts in a legal point of view? Certainly; and if any question arose of that kind, it would be submitted to the recorder and the common serjeant, who are the two legal advisers of the corporation; very often with the assistance of the judge of the Sheriff's Court, Mr. Gurney.

4778. Is not there a difficulty in determining the effect of one charter upon another, and how far one charter repeals by implication previous charters?—I am quite justified in saying that a very difficult point in law is involved in the consideration how a subsequent charter repeals or interferes with the provisions of a former charter. It turns upon the effect of the acceptance of the subsequent charter upon the provisions of the former charter. In that a good deal would depend upon the intent of the parties both granting and receiving the charter.

4779. Has there ever been any provision for reducing the charters and muniments of the corporation into the form of a digest, so as to make the legal powers of the corporation more accessible and more evident?—As I stated before, the corporation dropped a hint that if any thing of the kind was done, they would wish it to be done by one of their own officers.

4780. I am not speaking of a reprint of the existing charters, but something more like a consolidation of the charters and a reduction of them into a more convenient form?—Nothing of that kind has been done.

4781. Has it ever been contemplated?—The book I have before referred to is the very best book of the kind I have ever seen. Mr. Norton took great pains to investigate the subject, and had full access to the books. The recorder reminds me that when certain litigant parties, the litigation being between themselves, asked for the certificate of the recorder, the fullest access was given them to all the records in the office. That is invariably done. When any question of the kind arises, if the parties want information they have immediate access to it; the other is a technical objection.

4782. My question rather refers to what might be called codifying the charters and bye laws of the corporation, has any such plan as that ever been contemplated?—No; and it certainly would require a great deal of legal acumen and a great deal of labour to effect such a work, and it would probably end after all in considerable error.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4783. You have given your own opinion that, in reality, no practical inconvenience arises to the public or to the City from there being confusion in the charters as they now exist, and you do not think that they give rise to litigation?—I am not aware of anything of the kind. Those two cases which have been mentioned before you are the only two cases that I recollect at this moment in which the matter has come in question; the case of Coombe, Delafield, & Co., and the question as to the right of the soil and the bed of the river.

4784. Can it be truly said that there is any governing charter of the City of London?—Decidedly I think there is not; certainly there is no such charter as the one I was just now describing, beginning with the incorporation, and fixing the number of the body, specifying the seal, the officers, and their number, nominating persons to fill those offices, and providing for the future elections upon vacancies.

4785. I understand by a governing charter, a consolidation of the previous charter upon an Inspeximus, the confirmation of them, and then a provision regulating the future constitution of the body. That being accepted, you have, upon looking at it, the means of knowing of what number the corporation is to exist. There is you say no such charter in London?—No.

4786. Upon reference to all the charters of the corporation of London is there in any one of them a provision that the body shall consist of a mayor, so many aldermen, so many common councilmen, and so on?—Certainly not; the practice has never been of that kind; the corporation of London have from time immemorial regulated the number of their aldermen and the number of their common councilmen according to their own arrangements. Of course they could not make aldermanries or give a jurisdiction to a court in a given part of the City; that requires either a charter of the Crown or the interposition of Parliament, of which a very early instance was given in the reign of Richard the Second. Farringdon Without having become very populous, it was necessary to make provision for it, and an express Act of Parliament was passed authorising the inhabitants of Farringdon Without, as well as the inhabitants of Farringdon Within, each of them to appoint an alderman, and each of those aldermen were to exercise jurisdiction in the respective wards, so that those two wards were separated by Act of Parliament. So far as the naming of an alderman for corporate purposes goes, I imagine the corporation have the power of doing it, but for jurisdiction of course they could not establish a court or hold a ward mote, or anything of that kind, without the authority of the Crown or Parliament.

4787. Are the Commissioners to understand that the present number of the aldermen, and the division into wards, and the number of the common council have been all regulated from time to time by the whole body itself?—Yes; there has been only one instance of an alderman being added in comparatively speaking modern times, which was the alderman of the ward of Bridge Without. That I shall probably have occasion to explain when the question about Southwark arises.

4788. What are the present boundaries of the City?—The boundaries of the City consist of the City proper, that is, the City within the walls, the course of which can be easily defined; there are also liberties without the walls which are with more difficulty defined, but I believe they can in all instances be defined. Perhaps it may be necessary that I should just point out to the Commissioners how those liberties arose. They arose, as I imagine they do in many cases on the Continent, from that portion of the ground outside the walls which is necessary for the protection of the wall. Of course it will be obvious that the jurisdiction must extend without the wall, or else from a hostile attack they would never be safe. The liberties of the City of London form a very striking illustration of that fact. All the liberties without the walls are places where the walls have been accessible. For instance, Farringdon Without extends up to Temple Bar, which was the high ground opposite to Ludgate-the-Gate, at the top of Ludgate Hill. Cripplegate Without was the same. There were walls, and a bastion, and so on, and open ground in front of it; there the liberty extends as far as would have been necessary for the general purposes of defence. Aldersgate Wards Within and Without are under the same circumstances, but when you go further round the City and come to the river, you find there is no liberty without, because there was no wall, the river itself being a protection. As a still further illustration of that, in Coleman Street Ward there is no liberty, it bordering upon the moor which surrounded that part of London. Again, when the moor is passed and you are on the other side, Bishopsgate Without exists, which was where the road passed out to the Bishop of London's lands at a distance from the town. That I believe is the explanation of the liberties, and those boundaries can be clearly defined.

4789. How long have the boundaries of the City remained unchanged?—I am not aware of there having been any change in them whatever. It is one of the curious features of London, that the original boundaries can be so accurately defined.

4790. Do the present boundaries, including the liberties, go up to the time of William the Conqueror?—I do not think I can say that. I can only say, as far as my books go back, and some of them are very old, they must always have been very nearly the same. You cannot look with certainty to any period before Edward the Third.

4791. So far as your information extends the boundaries have remained unaltered?—I believe so.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

4792. What is the area contained within those boundaries?—I am informed, on the authority of the surveyor, it is about one mile square.

4793. Can you tell the Commissioners at what time the metropolis began to extend beyond the boundaries of the City?—That is extremely difficult to state, because it is a matter of remote history. As the Commissioners know, the Strand, for instance, consisted of a series of noblemen's houses; bordering upon the river there was Essex House, and Exeter House, and many other houses down the line of the Strand, but no continuous street, the road being hardly passable along the Strand. It will be remembered again that going up from Temple Bar northwards there was a very old lane, called Chancellor's lane, and on the side of that was Lord Lincoln's property, now Lincoln's Inn. Going up further still, towards Hampstead and Highgate there was a property of the family of the Gray's, which is now represented as Gray's Inn. I think there was a prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas of the name of Brownlow, who in some record or other shows the extent of the wood which he cut upon his estate in Holborn, which I imagine is where Brownlow Street now is.

4794. At that time there was a village of Charing?—Yes.

4795. When the judges used to go down to Westminster Hall they breakfasted at the village of Charing on their way?—Yes. It is said that when the house of a nobleman in Piccadilly was built he was remonstrated with, and asked why he had built his house so far out of town; his answer was, that he was determined that nobody should ever build beyond him.

4796. Were not there some portions of what is now the City of London which were by Act of Parliament taken out of the county of Middlesex and put into the City of London?—I am not aware of that; they probably were still within the boundaries of the City of London. There are some places which were before exempt from the jurisdiction, such as the Temple.

4797. It was stated to us on a former occasion that some part of the county of Middlesex had been taken from that county and made part of the county of the City of London?—I am not aware of that. There is a charter which alludes to all those exempted places, and brings them within the jurisdiction of the corporation of the City of London.

4798. For a long time the City and London were substantially the same, were not they?—I have no doubt originally the corpus, if one may so say, of the metropolis was the City of London.

4799. Did not it remain so till about the time of Charles the Second, and after the great fire did not the extension of the metropolis beyond the limits of the City commence?—I am not aware of that as a matter of history.

4800. No attempt has ever been made to extend the limits of the City as the town increased?—None at all.

4801. Do you happen to know whether that is a subject which ever occupied the attention of the corporation in former times. As London distinguished from the City strictly so called increased, did they ever consider the propriety of increasing their limits?—I have no knowledge of any attempt being made of that kind on the north of the river. On the south of the river there can be no doubt from an early time there have been efforts of that kind with respect to the borough of Southwark. That appears upon the face of the charters, and appears by the proceedings of the common council to have been a suggestion that was often entertained, and, as far as I can judge from the records, everything was done that could be done to make that a perfect jurisdiction; but the charters, which gave some power over Southwark, were not sufficient to enable them to do it effectually.

4802. Southwark always remained in the county of Surrey, did not it?—I cannot say that, because with respect to Southwark in the reign of Edward the Third there was a complaint of the citizens of London, that thieves and ill-conducted persons came into the City, committed thefts, and were guilty of misconduct, and then escaped into Southwark; that was complained of as inconvenient and injurious to the City, and, therefore, the City had the borough of Southwark granted to them.

4803. It was not taken out of the county of Surrey, was it?—No; it is perhaps one of the most difficult subjects in English history to know what the effect of these charters was. Charters were generally obtained, of the kind I am now alluding to, for the purpose of keeping off the exactions of the officers of the crown. The sheriffs, the bailiffs, the clerks of the markets, and purveyor were constantly intruding, particularly the sheriffs. Therefore a charter was obtained to make the place a peculiar jurisdiction. As soon as the charter was obtained the sheriff found out that it did not in some way or other exclude him, and it was a vexed question from the earliest times, what had been the effect of those charters—many places, in order to exclude the sheriff altogether, obtaining charters about the reign of Henry the Sixth and onwards, making them counties of themselves.

4804. Do you mean that at the present day there is any doubt but that the borough of Southwark is in the county of Surrey, and not in the county of the City of London?—It is free from doubt, because there was an actual litigation in which the officers of the City of London were successful in disputing the execution of writs within the borough of Southwark.

4805. When did that occur?—I forget the date at this moment, but I can supply it.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

An action was tried, and there was great resistance made to the interposition of the sheriff of Surrey within the borough of Southwark, but eventually it was found to be accompanied with so much litigation that of late years it has not been insisted on.

4806. The present connexion of the City with the borough of Southwark is one of an anomalous description, is not it?—Certainly.

4807. Do you think it is quite satisfactory in its present state?—I should say decidedly not, neither to the City of London nor to Southwark; they neither of them know what are their respective rights or their respective duties.

4808. Have you formed any opinion, and if so, have you any objection to state, what course you think had better be taken with respect to the borough of Southwark?—I ought to say that I do not feel myself authorised to express any opinion. I have an opinion, and whenever the time arrives I think they could be put upon a footing which must be satisfactory.

4809. You had rather not state to us any opinion which you may have formed as to the course which you think it would be desirable to take with respect to Southwark?—I think I may be justified in stating what has passed. I know that applications have been made on behalf of some of the inhabitants. I do not remember any very general interposition, but a very large number of the inhabitants have, from time to time, made application to the Court of Common Council to consider their case, and to consider the position of the borough of Southwark. The corporation of London have, as they always do, referred those applications to a committee of inquiry. The committee took the subject up again and again, but they found it was so extremely difficult to settle the conflicting rights of the parties that they have not been able to do anything effectual. It would occur of course to any body, as one of the points, that if the borough of Southwark claimed a participation in the property of the corporation of London, which belongs in point of fact to the freemen of London, it would be an embarrassing thing, and not just or equitable. There are also other difficulties with respect to jurisdiction. But my strong impression is, that the corporation of London found themselves unable to deal with the subject without legislative interposition. If legislative interposition was necessary, it would be for the borough of Southwark to solicit it, and I have never heard the least surmise from the corporation that they would have any objection to their taking such a course in that respect as they should think fit.

4810. The feeling seems to have been on the part of Southwark, not unnaturally, that they would wish either to be incorporated with the City of London, and enjoy all the privileges of citizens, or else to be entirely dissevered from the City of London, and have an opportunity of procuring municipal rights for themselves independently of it?—Speaking merely from what I have collected from the past, I should say a similar feeling would exist in the corporation of London.

4811. Which do you think of those two courses would be the preferable one?—I must say that the considerations are so balanced in my mind, that I should be unable, perhaps I ought to be unwilling, to express an opinion upon that subject; it really involves most material considerations.

4812. Supposing it were thought right entirely to sever the connection between Southwark and the City of London, are there any inconveniences which would occur to the City which you are able to point out to us, from the adoption of such a course?—None at all.

4813. It could be done without any inconvenience to the City at present?—I should say the advantages and disadvantages were so equally balanced, that the wish of either of the parties ought almost to decide the question. If the inhabitants of Southwark truly and really wish to be dissevered from the corporation of London, and can make out a proper case for it,—which I think they would have no difficulty in doing,—my notion is, that the corporation would not be likely, judging from their past acts, to give the least opposition to it.

4814. As far as you know, you do not anticipate that there would be any embarrassment in the City affairs, or any difficulties arising from carrying such a measure into effect, if it were thought right upon public grounds?—I see none; but I must be understood as unwillingly expressing anything like an opinion upon the subject; at all events, it must be considered merely as my own view from what has passed. It seems to be very questionable whether the people of Southwark really wish it or not. In the course of the evidence before you, it has been stated that a meeting would take place of the inhabitants. As far as I can obtain information upon that point, the members for Southwark attended there, and some other influential persons; but the meeting was very small, and I do not suppose would be represented by anybody as a popular exponent of the wishes of the inhabitants of Southwark.

4815. The result of the meeting to which you refer was an expression of opinion that they would desire to be incorporated with the City of London, was not it?—I forget how that was. My principal object in looking at it was to see if the meeting was of such an influential character that any person would with satisfaction act upon its decision.

4816. Hitherto the borough of Southwark has been very slow in expressing any opinions upon these points, has it not?—I believe it has; and I know how difficult it is to obtain the opinion of people upon such subjects.

4817. Still you think the present state of things is one in which it cannot be supposed in the long run to be likely to acquiesce?—I do not know how to answer that question, because they have acquiesced; and, with the exception of petitions which they have presented to the common council, I do not know of anything they have done. The only opinion I feel justified in expressing decidedly is, that the corporation of London have failed to do anything on the subject, from finding it totally impracticable without legislative assistance.

4818. But you think any reasonable arrangement with regard to Southwark would not be distasteful to the corporation?—From what has passed, I think it would not be. Beyond that I think I must not go.

4819. Setting aside the question of Southwark, the powers and jurisdiction of the corporation of the City are for the most part limited to their own boundaries, are they not?—Almost entirely so.

4820. They have certain powers which extend beyond their boundaries, have not they?—Their powers of police are of that nature to some extent.

4821. Their right of metage and porterage extends to the whole of London?—Yes.

4822. And their power of conservancy of the Thames?—Yes; it extends from Staines Bridge to Yantlet Creek.

4823. Those points are far beyond the limits of the City?—Certainly.

4824. Is there any power beyond those of metage and porterage and conservancy which they exercise, without the limits of the City?—I do not remember any at the moment.

4825. Are not the tonnage dues collected in the river; and is not the coal tax levied beyond the limits of the City?—Certainly.

4826. The corporation of the City is the only municipal body within the metropolis?—Yes; I do not know how far Southwark may be called a municipal body; it has some of the characteristics given to it of an ancient municipal body.

4827. So far as Southwark is a municipal body, it is connected with the corporation of London?—Yes; it has its own courts. A Court of Record and a Court Leet, and all those ordinary accompaniments of municipal institutions.

4828. Looking to the facts which have been stated, that there are certain powers which the corporation exercises without the limits of the City, and that is the only municipal body within the metropolis, does the corporation consider itself as representing for certain purposes, the entire metropolis of London?—I never heard such a thing. I have no idea of anything of the kind.

4829. The corporation considers its functions and powers as limited strictly to that portion of the metropolis which is situated within its own boundaries?—As far as my experience of their conduct goes, it is entirely the case; they confine themselves entirely to their own district. In point of fact, as I imagine, in many boroughs and cities in the olden times, so large a body of inhabitants was collected together in one spot, that it was difficult for them to be brought within the government of the sheriff, and therefore they were generally excluded from the jurisdiction of the sheriff, and had their own judicial establishments, consisting, generally speaking of a Court of Record for civil matters, analagous to the Hundred Court in the county, and a Court Leet with regard to all criminal matters.

4830. The corporation, in administering their funds, look exclusively to the interests of that portion of the town which is situated within their own limits,—is that your meaning?—That is certainly not the case. For instance, in dispensing their charities, they are frequently called on to subscribe to charities which are out of their jurisdiction and control; they do that freely. I believe, too, they have heretofore contributed to public improvements out of the City. I think they did so many years ago with respect to the great improvement in the Strand. It was before my time; but I believe that was the case.

4831. To a certain extent they do consider themselves, therefore, as representing the interests of the entire metropolis?—I do not consider that as in any degree a representation of the metropolis. They have only interposed for the public good or for the purpose of charity beyond their own jurisdiction.

4832. To a certain extent in administering their funds they have regard to the interests of other portions of the metropolis?—Upon a proper application being made to them by petition to the common council, they consider all the circumstances of the case, and of course consider (and it is always with them a primary consideration) what the individuals living within the walls may claim from them. If they find that the circumstances are such as to justify it, and they are enabled to do it, they do contribute to charities and other establishments out of the boundary of the City.

4833. As far as their representative character is concerned, do you consider that they confine themselves strictly to their own district?—In the City Pocket Book there is an enumeration of the different sums which have been from time to time subscribed by the corporation, distinguishing what apply to matters without the City and what within.

4834. What are the duties of the Lord Mayor?—The duties of the Lord Mayor are very numerous. He is of course, as his name would import, the head of the corporation; he has to attend more or less to all the concerns of the corporation; his duty is, as a magistrate, to preside at the Mansion House in all inquiries that are from time to time brought before him there, which occupies a considerable portion of his time in the morning. When he is himself, from his other duties, prevented from sitting there, he has the assistance of one of his brethren, the aldermen. He presides, of course, over the Court of Aldermen; he summons it, and regulates, to a certain degree, matters of which notice is given, to be considered before the court. He also in the same manner presides over the common council, appoints their meetings, and, upon a requisition signed in a particular form and by a certain number of persons, at all times calls the common council together whenever it is necessary. He also presides over the Court of Conservancy, two meetings of which are held in each of the districts under the jurisdiction of that Court, the county of Middlesex, the county of Essex, the county of Kent, and the county of Surrey; and he would also, if occasion required,—and he has done it,—hold a Court of Conservancy within the City, with respect to any matters arising there. Besides that, the Lord Mayor of course is open at the Mansion House to be consulted upon all occasions by any of the officers or any persons in the City who may wish for his interposition. I do not at the present moment recollect any other general duties which he has to perform. It will of course be borne in mind, that under the general description which I gave of his duties, is included the superintendence of all the concerns of the corporation; he must be occasionally called on to perform duties which it would be very difficult to enumerate.

4835. Is his time almost entirely occupied during his year of office by his official duties as Lord Mayor?—I should say his official duties of one kind or other engross the whole of his time, and that he has some difficulty in attending to them all. I think, as far as my own experience goes, I have seen that Lord Mayors have rather sunk under the labours of their office than otherwise.

4837. With regard to the expense of the office, can you give us any information?—I have only very indirect information upon that subject. The expenses all pass through the chamberlain's office; but I believe I can give you a summary of them. I obtained this statement from the chamberlain. The Lord Mayor receives as compensation for the loss of emoluments on the abolition of the metage on coals, 500*l.* It will be seen in the City's printed Report, page 36, that the allowance which he receives is 5,997*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* There are expenses attending the Court of Conservancy which amount to 300*l.* a year, for which he has an express allowance from the common council. Of course there is a considerable portion of wear and tear in the furniture at the Mansion House in the course of the year, for which, when it is certified that the furniture is duly delivered up, he receives from the common council an allowance of 100*l.* The income tax is also paid for his lordship, which amounts to 228*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*; there is a small sum for a gown, 18*l.*, and the cocket dues amount to 1,000*l.* There is a payment, which I presume originated in early times, from the name given to it; it is called a "Benevolence," given out of the Bridge House Estate to the Lord Mayor, 50*l.* It was a species of contribution probably to the annual festivity. There are certain fees at the Old Bailey, amounting to 40*l.*, and there are others amounting to 86*l.*, making 126*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* The total amount of the charges connected with the office of Lord Mayor is 8,319*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*

4838. There is an impression that the Lord Mayor is entitled to be summoned to the first privy council which is held after the demise of the Crown. Do you happen to have any information upon that point?—I have looked into the subject, and I imagine in ancient times it would have been done as a matter of course, because there were a great number of state affairs in which the Lord Mayor originally used to take part when his influence in the constitution was much greater than it is at present. As one instance, as far as I can trace back, he always has been summoned upon the demise of the Crown. I have no doubt originally, upon the demise of the Crown, the Lord Mayor of London was applied to, as the person highest in authority in the land, and as, probably, the instrument which should be used for the transmission of the Crown from one Sovereign to another. I need not remind the Commissioners that there was a period when all offices of all kinds ceased upon the demise of the Crown, till an Act of Parliament was passed to remedy that great inconvenience. I imagine the custom arises from the Lord Mayor of London originally partaking largely in the national concerns. I may mention as a little fact to explain this matter of etiquette, that a communication is always sent from the Home Office immediately upon the demise of the Crown, who instantly desires the great bell of St. Paul's to be rung, which is the announcement to the public of the event.

4839. Are there similar communications made upon the death of other members of the Royal Family?—Always upon the birth of a child of the Sovereign a communication is made to the Lord Mayor. Upon the death of other branches of the Royal Family, also, a communication is sent. In the case of the demise of the Queen Dowager, a communication was sent from the Home Office to the Lord Mayor.

4840. In the case of the actual Sovereign dying, the Secretary of State for the Home Department would communicate to the Lord Mayor that fact, would he not?—Yes.

4841. Does the Lord Mayor, upon the demise of the Crown receive a summons from the privy council office to attend at the first privy council?—Whether he receives a summons or not, I cannot answer. The remembrancer, through whose hands all such matters pass, will be able to answer; but I know this, that the Lord Mayor goes and attends the privy council, for I remember on one occasion, the Lord Mayor not being quite ready, the Duke of Wellington was reported to have insisted upon no steps being taken till the Lord Mayor came 4842. When the new Sovereign is proclaimed any person, either the Lord Mayor or any one else, not being a member of the privy council, is admitted, is he not?—I am not aware of that. I thought the Lord Mayor, upon going to the council, did some formal act; but I have no knowledge upon the subject.

4843. You are, perhaps, aware that some evidence has been given to this Commission with respect to the hospitality exercised by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House. Is there any remark which you wish to offer to us upon that subject.?—I have no remark to make upon it, further than that hospitality of that kind is not at all unusual in England upon great occasions. As we know in all stations persons of consideration in the country offer hospitalities of that kind,—the Officers of State, the Judges, the Archbishop of Canterbury,—indeed, the custom seems to pervade all the higher ranks of English society.

4844. I observe it is stated in the document which was read by the recorder that the procession on Lord Mayor's day, commonly called the Lord Mayor's Show does not cost more than 200*l.*?—I believe that is about the amount.

4845. That has been accurately looked into, has it?—Certainly, before that statement was made, the question was looked into with respect to the present Lord Mayor and other Lord Mayors. The remembrancer, who knows what takes place upon that occasion, was also consulted upon it, and I believe that sum to be accurate.

4846. Are you aware what was the expense of the pageants in former times, in the days of James the First and Queen Elizabeth, when they were very fine ones?—I do not know, but I dare say it can be ascertained.

4847. Does not it appear to you that on those occasions of public hospitality, the Lord Mayor appears in the character of the first magistrate of the whole metropolis, rather than of that particular district of it which is contained with the City walls?—I must say I do not think that; I am quite sure the Lord Mayor and the corporation would be very glad that the effect of having such entertainments should be felt outside the City, but there is nothing done by the Lord Mayor which would raise that inference.

4848. With regard to the Lord Mayor's Court, there is a peculiar custom in the City of foreign attachment. Is that a subject which you have ever considered so as to be able to give the Commissioners an opinion upon it?—I think, perhaps, I had better, in the first instance, draw your attention to the very early charters. Foreign attachment, in point of fact, is a thing which is almost necessary in a large commercial city, because inasmuch as there were many provisions in the charters that merchants who traded to this country should not live in the City, but should only have places of resort in the different hotels, it follows that the time of any merchant's remaining here was so uncertain and so short, that if he incurred any debt, he could not be called on, perhaps, to pay it. The merchant, therefore, who came to sell his goods, or who wanted to buy goods here, which was more to the purpose, would not be able to obtain credit unless there were means of obtaining payment from him; it would, therefore, seem to be a necessary consequence of the mode of carrying on the traffic in merchandize at that time, that if he came and bought any articles, or incurred any debts, and left any property behind him, there should be an opportunity of arresting that property, so as to make him pay the debt. That would seem to be the reasonable explanation of foreign attachment, and I think the Commissioners will find distinct traces of it in the early charters. You will find this provision in a charter of Henry the First, which is a very early one: "If any shall take toll or custom of any citizen of London, the citizens of London in the City shall take of the borough or town where the toll or custom was so taken so much as the man of London gave for the toll, and as he received damage thereby, and all debtors which do owe debts to citizens of London, shall pay them in London, or else discharge themselves in London that they owe none. But if they will not pay the same, neither come to clear themselves that they owe none, the citizen of London to whom the debts shall be due may take all goods in the City of London of the borough or town, or of the county wherein he remains who shall owe the debts." So that it seems that their property within the City was to be made responsible for the debts which they had incurred.

4849. That provision which you have read would apply to all persons residing without the City of London, whether English subjects or aliens, would not it?—Certainly.

4851. In the corporation law a foreigner means a person dehors the corporation, does not it; it does not mean an alien?—It means both; it is used in both senses. In many charters, and in still more entries in our books, when they are speaking of the freedom of the City, a foreigner is a person who is not admitted into the body as a freeman, but when speaking of alien merchants, the term foreigner is applied to them, and that is the case also in the statutes of the realm.

4852. Is there any similar provision to this in any other of the great seats of commerce in England?—In most of them. In Bristol it was so; my impression is, it is so in

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

Liverpool, but I am not so sure of Liverpool, because Liverpool was not one of the earliest boroughs in this country.

4853. Is it your opinion that it is desirable to maintain this peculiar custom in respect to the City of London in its present state?—I really think it is very serviceable, for the sake of the merchants as well as for the sake of the creditors.

4854. If it is a good custom for Fleet Street, is not it a good custom for the Strand and Oxford Street?—I should imagine if a new corporation were made for the Strand, it would be very desirable that such a power should exist.

4855. This is a power which is quite independent of the corporation, is not it. It is a custom affecting all the inhabitants of the City, and all persons sueing in the Lord Mayor's Court?—No doubt it applies to all of them; but, like other rights, it is limited by the jurisdiction. I believe there is no such thing in the practice, or the law, or the history of the country, as any right of this kind being exercised by a corporation beyond the particular limits to which the jurisdiction of the corporation extends.

4856. If it is a good custom for persons residing within the jurisdiction of the corporation, would not it be so for other parts of the metropolis similarly circumstanced?—I cannot help thinking that it would, but in a great degree, the same thing is effected out of the City. You have a fieri facias against the goods of any man. With respect to a foreigner in the strict sense of the word, meaning an alien, it would not be necessary to be spread all over the country. It was the peculiar nature of the traffic in the City of London which made it so essential to be applied there with respect to foreigners. The old law of the City of London was, that no foreign merchant should be allowed to reside within London longer than forty days, and during that time was to have no house, nor be at liberty to hire any house, but was only to be at one of the hotels. That gave such a fleeting residence, if I may use the expression, to a foreign merchant within the City, that those great powers over his property when he was gone, became necessary.

4857. Has not the nature of foreign trade extremely altered since those days?—It has altered, but not in such a respect as to make it no longer desirable that if a debtor does quit the City and leaves property there, it should be capable of being attached.

4858. That provision of the general law which you think to be in some degree a substitute for this particular custom in the City, would, if the custom were abolished, apply to the City as well as to the rest of the country, would it not?—That, of course, would be a matter of legislative enactment. I do not know that it is a matter of course that it should.

4859. The general law of the country would apply in the City if that custom were abolished, would not it?—There is no mode in which you can so promptly get a debt paid as by taking the property. Nothing would appear to me so just and equitable as that you should take the property of a debtor to satisfy his debt if you find it within the jurisdiction, the jurisdiction being answerable for the due execution of the law.

4860. You do not know what is the case at Liverpool and Glasgow?—I do not know anything respecting Glasgow. I believe the case at Liverpool is the same as at Bristol, and I believe it is so in Dublin, because the peculiar jurisdictions of Dublin were, in fact, borrowed from Bristol.

4861. Is not the peculiarity of the custom of foreign attachment, that there is a remedy against the debtor of the defendant?—Certainly; you pursue his property, wherever you can find it. Supposing there is a debtor who has left the place; if he has a debt due to him from A or B, he says to A, do not pay that money to my credit, or keep it for me; keep it till I have satisfied the court that I am entitled to have it. It is only kept as a pawn or pledge.

4862. Is there any such power as that in the general law?—No.

4863. Then the peculiarity of the custom of foreign attachment is, that it gives a remedy against a debtor of the defendant?—Just so.

4864. That power enables you to seize money in the hands of a banker?—Yes.

4865. Is not that the principal practical operation of the custom in the City of London?—Just so.

4866. If that be a good regulation for the City of London, would not it also be a good regulation for the rest of the metropolis?—I think it would.

4867. And for the whole country?—I see no reason why it should not be so. It appears to be a prompt mode of making men pay their just debts.

4868. Is it much resorted to?—It is a good deal; it is frequently resorted to, and found very useful, in effecting the ends of justice.

4869. If it is a good custom, is there any reason why it should not be extended to the whole country, and if it is a bad custom, ought not it to be abolished in the City of London?—Yes, all bad customs should be abolished; but I think it is a good custom, and the first part of the proposition is, in my opinion, a true one.

4870. Suppose the defendant to be absent, and there is a disputed debt, the garnishee cannot avoid the necessity of that debt being handed over to the plaintiff, can he, without putting in bail to the full amount of the sum demanded?—Not without appearing, and putting in bail.

4871. Without regard to the amount of the debt he himself owes, or the amount of the goods he has in his hands?—That is so.

4872. Is that just?—I am reminded by my friend, the common serjeant, that there must be substantial bail.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

4873. Supposing the plaintiff sues for 1,000*l.*, and attaches the debt in the hands of the garnishee, to the extent of 200*l.*, that attachment cannot be got rid of, without putting in bail for 1,000*l.*?—Certainly not, but he may pay the smaller sum into court.

4874. The effect of the system of foreign attachment is, to bring into court a person who is not the party to the original suit, is it not?—It brings him into court, just in that character, to tell him not to pay over the money. It must be indifferent to him, if he has the money of A in his hands, to whom he pays it.

4875. There may be all sorts of transactions between him and the defendant; there may be sets-off, disputed claims, on both sides?—If he thinks fit, he states that fact to the court, he brings it forward.

4876. Is not it rather hard upon him, to be incidentally brought into court in that way; it does not follow that the defendant in the cause would ever have brought the garnishee into court?—He might not. In the mean time, the creditor, who has a just debt due to him, is much aided by this prompt mode of taking possession of the property.

4877. Without arguing the question, your opinion, upon the whole, is favourable to the system of foreign attachment, and rather than abolish it in the City, you would extend it, either to the rest of the metropolis, or the rest of the country?—I should say, upon the reasoning which has been suggested, that it, being made out to be a good custom, if it is good for one place, it is good for another.

4878. It has no peculiar adaptation, at present, to the limits of the City, has it; whatever its original suitability may have been, it has no peculiar fitness from the City, as distinguished from the rest of the metropolis?—Except that commercial transactions being so numerous in the City of London with foreigners abroad and with persons liable to be going to our colonies, and so on; it is, with respect to them, a very convenient mode of putting your hands upon money, which belongs to a debtor, in case he goes away.

4879. Are there other peculiar jurisdictions in the City, besides that of the Lord Mayor's Court?—There is a peculiar jurisdiction which is very rarely exercised, which is that of the Court of Delegates in St. Martin's-le-Grand.

4880. Complaints have been made that the custom of foreign attachment operates badly, in compelling the defendant to put in bail to the full amount of the debt claimed; can that be referred to the alteration of the law with respect to arrest? Formerly, when a defendant could be arrested upon an affidavit of debt being made, if he had been personally within the jurisdiction of the court out of which that had been issued, his person might be taken; and therefore, if any goods of his or any property of his were attached, it would seem not to be very hard that he should be forced to put in that bail which he would have been required to put in if he had been personally there to be taken; but, since the abolition of arrest upon mesne process, it operates very differently. Do you think the objections which have been made recently to foreign attachment have any relation to that circumstance?—I think it is very probable they have, but I am not acquainted with the fact myself, nor have I heard of such complaints; I do not think it is a general complaint.

4881. Could it be remedied by such an alteration in the foreign attachment as would regulate the amount of the bail to be put in by the value of the thing attached?—My notion is that it could under the charter to which I before referred; and it has been so, for he can bring the real debt into court.

4882. As to the mode of election of the aldermen, and their tenure of office, have you anything which you wish to state?—Supposing the constituency to be put upon the satisfactory footing which the old habits of the City of London of course insured—every householder being obliged to attend the wardmote, and to be there sworn to his allegiance, and to take upon himself the character of a freeman supposing in that way—all the inhabitants of the ward to be included in the constituency, it would appear to me impossible for anything to be less objectionable than the election of the alderman. He is elected by those persons over whom he is to preside, and there is no doubt that, even in the present state of things, there is a very great feeling of attachment between the alderman and his ward. I believe nothing can be more perfect speaking generally than it is, particularly as he appoints his deputy, which is again another binding connection between him and the ward, because of course he takes the person who is most approved by the ward; and also, the same persons who elect him elect the common councilmen, who are sent as the representatives of the ward to the common council.

4883. Is there not now much inequality in the size of the wards and the number of the voters?—There is. I have a return, which has been prepared by the Court of Aldermen, of the number in the different wards, of householders and of freemen.

4884. Will you have the goodness to put it in?

The same was put in and is as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

"RETURN of the TOWN CLERK of the number of Municipal Electors in the several Wards, "for the year ensuing, in compliance with the order of the Court of Aldermen, of the "18th day of November, 1851, distinguishing the numbers in each of the years 1844, "1849, 1850, and 1851."

That is, the number of Inhabitants exceeds the number of Houses by 20¾ per Cent.

George Payne, Police Receiver,
25th May, 1852.

December 8th, 1851. HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, Town Clerk.

4885. The ward which had the smallest number of voters in 1851 appears to have been Queenhithe, which has 73 voters, and the largest was Farringdon Without, with 783 voters?—That is so.

4886. The last three columns show the number of persons rated above 10*l.*?—Yes.

4887. That is the constituency for the election of members of parliament?—With a residence within seven miles.

4888. Do those numbers exhibit the parliamentary voters, or the municipal voters?—The municipal voters.

4889. With regard to the ward of Aldersgate, it appears, that if the constituency were taken to be the parliamentary voters, it would reduce the present number, rather than increase it?—That was the effect, in consequence of the alterations which were made in the bill, in its passage through parliament; in one or two cases, it had the effect of lessening the number of voters.

4890. The aldermen, as we know, hold their office for life?—I should rather say without reasonable cause being shown for their removal.

4891. By what authority could they be removed, supposing reasonable cause could be shewn and were shown; how would the removal be effected?—By a proceeding in a court of law, a quo warranto.

4892. Could any act of the corporation itself remove an alderman?—Yes; I imagine the court of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, or the Lord Mayor and aldermen in common council assembled would have power to disfranchise an alderman and turn him out of his place, of which there have been instances.

4893. When was the present tenure of the office of alderman created?—I believe the provision which I have mentioned, that they shall be removable only for reasonable cause, is in one of the early charters.

4894. Several hundred years back?—Yes.

4895. What is the date of their magisterial duties?—Their magisterial duties are also derived from an early charter; not so early, but still an early one. First of all, the aldermen who have passed the chair, are by a particular clause made magistrates. Then, at a subsequent period, in the reign of George the First, all aldermen, whether they have passed the chair or not, are constituted magistrates. I think all the aldermen, passed the chair, were made magistrates in Southwark, also by a particular charter.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4896. How many courts are there, in which the aldermen sit as magistrates?—There are two; at the Mansion House, when called upon by the Lord Mayor to assist him, and also at the Guildhall; they being appointed to that duty by a rota which is made out, and every alderman is expected to attend there, without fail, according to the rota, or provide a substitute; there are particular provisions in their standing orders to secure that.

4898. It has been suggested by several witnesses, that, partly for the purpose of relieving the aldermen themselves from the regular duties to which they may often have been accustomed, and partly for the sake of securing a more uniform and regular administration of the law, it would be desirable that stipendiary magistrates should be appointed to act in the City, as they do in the rest of the metropolis. Is that a subject on which you wish to make any remark?—I have had frequent opportunities almost ever since I have been in office, now nearly twelve years, of learning what I think is the real feeling of the citizens generally upon that subject. I am quite sure that, as on the one hand there could be nothing more satisfactory, and, I think, more beneficial to them than to retain the aldermen as they are, as their magistrates, so it is a matter upon which the general wishes of the citizens are very strongly expressed. I have frequent opportunities of hearing what the opinions of the citizens are, and nothing can be more uniform than the respect they pay to the aldermen, and the anxiety they feel to preserve in their own hands the election of their magistrates. It is one of the most favourite rights that the citizens of London have.

4899. Your opinion, then, would be adverse to a change?—It is so, of course. I do not wish to say anything that would be out of my province; but, I must say their distaste for the other proposition is also very strong.

4900. In the election of aldermen do the voters look principally, or to any considerable extent, to the way in which they will be likely to perform their duties as magistrates?—I have no doubt in the world but that the generality of voters would consider they were doing an important act, when they were electing a person who was to act as a magistrate over them. Of course I can only answer that question in a general way.

4901. You describe their feeling to be one of desire to elect their own magistrates. What in fact they do is, to elect the aldermen, who are magistrates. The proposition would be true, if in the election of aldermen, the electors look mainly, or to a considerable extent, to the manner in which the person elected is likely to discharge the duties of a magistrate?—I intended my reply to meet what I understood to be the question. I think they do consider that circumstance, generally speaking, when they are appointing an alderman, because I know there is so great a desire upon their part to have their magistrates of their own selection. Whenever an expression is made of their feeling in that respect, they do constantly allude to the fact that those persons are acquainted with all their transactions, and can more readily apply themselves to the facts with a greater experience of proceedings in the City than strangers could.

4902. Is not there a paid assessor in each of the courts?—He can hardly, perhaps, be called an assessor. There is a paid clerk in each court, who would perhaps come very well within the term assessor; that is to say, he is generally a person, selected for his legal knowledge, who is capable of directing the Magistrates as far as the legal part of the duty is concerned.

4903. Practically, do the aldermen who have not had much experience in the administration of justice, adopt the advice of the clerk who sits in their court?—I do not think that the magistrates would ever act upon his advice with respect to the result of the facts brought before them; but I have no doubt that they do generally yield to the statement made to them by the assessor, as to the construction of a new Act of Parliament or the particular form in which a decision is to be made. In that respect, I think they would refer to those gentlemen with great satisfaction and confidence and benefit, and in fact, they generally do so; but in the substantial execution of justice between man and man, founded upon the facts of the case, I think they rely upon their own judgment. In the other case, I think they would also use the best judgment they have, as a check upon the advice given to them by their clerk.

4904. The aldermen would receive from their clerks the same kind of assistance that a petty jury would receive from a judge?—In some degree. I should rather say the same portion of assistance which a judge occasionally receives from the clerk at nisi prius or the clerk of arraigns in a criminal court. Of course the judges are prepared themselves to decide upon an Act of Parliament, but there is also a certain degree of information on certain points which is valuable.

4905. The assistance you have last alluded to would be confined, would it not, generally speaking, to matters of form?—Certainly. I wish to separate the proceedings as regards matters of form from the substantial determination upon the facts of the case.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

4906. Can you describe to us the functions of the court of aldermen?—The court of aldermen has a great many duties to perform.

4907. How often does it sit?—It sits upon an average once a fortnight. The days of its meetings are all fixed in the calendar which has been handed in to the Commissioners. A Court of Aldermen will be held on the 17th of this month and again on the 7th of February. Again on the 21st of February. Those are rather irregular intervals, created by the sitting of the Central Criminal Court. The court of aldermen is never appointed to sit during the time that the court at the Old Bailey is sitting, inasmuch as the attendance of a certain number of aldermen is necessary there.

4908. It may be said, therefore, that they sit about twice a month?—I think that is the average.

4909. Does the court consist of the Lord Mayor and aldermen?—The court consists of the Lord Mayor and aldermen. The two sheriffs also attend there for the purpose of communicating to the court their returns with respect to the prisons, which are always the first thing read in the court upon its meeting, after the previous proceedings of the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council have been read. I should also mention that the recorder always attends there as the assessor of the Lord Mayor. It is perhaps better for me to mention to the Commissioners the mode in which the court is summoned, and the sort of business which they transact. When a notice goes out for a meeting of the court, a summons is issued, which specifies all the material matters to be considered; especially all the monies which are to be granted, and all circumstances of that description. A notice of that kind being sent round to the aldermen, they meet at the time specified. The Lord Mayor is in the chair, and the recorder attends with him. The names of the aldermen are all called over, and it requires the attendance of thirteen out of the number as a majority to constitute a court. The court being constituted, there is a certain degree of formal business gone through. The chamberlain presents his list of applicants for the freedom of the City, which is submitted to the court, and decided on;—certain bills and payments necessary to be made are then presented; brokers are admitted or discharged, or put in nomination for a future court. Any petitions which are presented to the Court are then considered. After the petitions have been considered, any reports brought up from the different committees are also considered and determined on. If any alderman has any motion to make, it is then the time for making it, and of course it is considered. If it requires any investigation at all, it is referred to one of the several committees which are appointed. There is a Committee of Privileges; a Committee for conducting the affairs of Emanuel Hospital; a committee to consider all matters relating to the Gaols of this City; and a Committee for General Purposes. I think I have already stated that the sheriffs always attend the Court. The first matter of business after the proceedings of the prior Court of Aldermen and the last meeting of the common council have been read, is, that the sheriffs of the City come to the table, and under one of the standing orders in this book present their returns of the state of the gaols, and of the prisoners in them. They are read. If there is anything material, of course it is referred to a committee.

4910. Do the sheriffs remain after they have made their presentment?—They generally remain during the greater part of the sitting of the Court.

4911. Do they take any part in the proceedings?—As sheriffs they do not vote. Of course they would be heard if anything connected with their particular duties should require it; but they have no vote, unless they happen to be aldermen, which, generally speaking, is the case with one of the sheriffs.

4913. What are the powers of the Court of Aldermen?—In some respects they act judicially; for instance, in all matters connected with brokers they exercise a jurisdiction over them. They receive petitions and complaints as to the misconduct of brokers which are brought before them. They appoint a subsequent day, upon which the person making the complaint is called on to attend, and the broker is called on in that case to attend, and give his answer in writing to the charge which is made against him, and also to produce the books, which he is required by the regulations of the aldermen to keep. They also decide all questions arising out of the elections in wardmotes. If any common councilman is returned, and his return is objected to, a petition is presented to the Court of Aldermen, and they adjudicate upon it, and determine either that the party who has been returned shall continue or that his return shall be set aside; and the Lord Mayor is requested to issue a precept for another election. They consider also all the presentments of every kind made by the wardmote inquest, who present anything which occurs within their wards. A frequent presentment on their part is that there are persons who are living within the wards, carrying on business there, who are not freemen. Returns of that kind are made to them. Those returns are then referred to the chamberlain, whose duty it is to summon those people to show if they have any reason why they should not take up their freedom. Another frequent return is that of inquest men who refuse to perform their duty; those are considered. If they can make an excuse they are excused from service, if not, in the form of the judgment, they are held to the office and obliged to perform it; if they were contumacious, they would also be fined.

4914. Is the business which is to be brought before the Court of Common Council previously brought before the Court of Aldermen and discussed by them?—No; I believe not. In early times it used to be the practice that when a bill was brought in to alter any custom of the City, the aldermen considered the bill. If the common council suggested any bill, it was brought up to them by the common serjeant; if the aldermen presented any bill to the common council it was carried to them by the recorder; but that course of proceeding has not been adopted of late years. In other respects, all that the Court of Aldermen do with regard to the proceedings of the common council is to have the minutes of the last common council read at the bar of the court.

4915. Are the Courts of Common Council held immediately after the Courts of Aldermen?—Generally; not necessarily.

4916. In the Court of Common Council is any previous notice requisite of any motion intended to be made?—Always. The Court of Aldermen is usually held on Tuesday, and the Court of Common Council usually on the Thursday following. Three clear days before the meeting of the common council a summons is to be prepared for them, which it is my duty to lay before the Lord Mayor, and to receive his directions respecting it. That summons contains a statement of all the business which is to come on before the common council, the reports to be taken into consideration, the freemen to be admitted, the leases to be granted, the petitions to be presented—specifying the hour at which they are to be presented—and the motions to be made by the different common councilmen.

4917. The aldermen are component parts of the common council, are they not?—Yes.

4918. And they would have a notice as such?—Yes.

4919. At their own meeting do they discuss those subjects before the Court of Common Council assembles?—Very rarely. It is very much the feeling of both courts not to interfere with each other; they pursue their own course. If any alderman wishes to do anything in the common council he goes and does it there as a member of the common council; with this exception, that if anything material has taken place in the Court of Aldermen which is necessary to be communicated to the common council, the aldermen usually request the Lord Mayor to make it a subject of communication to them. I think it would be convenient for the Commissioners to have before them one of the summonses to the common council. I believe nothing in the world can work better than the respective duties of the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council, particularly the manner in which the courts are kept distinct the one from the other.

4920. What are the boundaries between the two?—The greater part of the duties which I have mentioned as performed by the Court of Aldermen are separate and distinct from those of the common council. They would not come under their consideration. With respect to the distinct duties of the aldermen and common council, of course the magisterial duties of the aldermen are quite distinct. Each of the courts have the power of drawing for cash upon the chamberlain, but the Court of Aldermen, in point of practice, confines its drawing to matters connected with the magistracy, the prisons and the police, and, in some instances, with respect to the conservancy. Those are the heads which occur to me at the present moment as the principal ones as to which the Court of Aldermen draw. There is one other with respect to pensions. The Court of Aldermen occasionally grant pensions, either to decayed aldermen or the reduced widows or children of aldermen. The cases are rare, they are always noticed upon the summons before they are granted, and publicity is given respecting them to all the aldermen. I think I may venture to say that no pension is granted without discussion upon it. A case is always made out; they never grant it but where there are some peculiar circumstances which call for the interposition, and, generally speaking, that sort of canvassing which a little contrariety of opinion may produce takes place before it is granted. Lately, even where they have been heretofore granted, the Court of Aldermen have taken great pains to ascertain that the circumstances of the individuals to whom the pension is granted and renewed are in the same state as when the pension was originally granted. I am perfectly justified in saying that they take great care in that respect. The common council have, of course, the whole affairs of the corporation under their guidance, and it is by the opposition of opinion in one way or other that what is expedient and what is just and proper is elicited. I may perhaps be allowed to say, from my twelve years' experience, that I know no subject in the corporation which is not watched with the greatest jealousy; and when questions arise, though there may be, as in all public meetings there will be occasionally, a little warmth of expression, I believe, for practical purposes, the result at which they arrive is generally sound and dictated by good sense and propriety.

4921. Is the power of the Court of Aldermen of drawing upon the City cash unlimited within the subjects upon which they exercise that power?—I believe it is quite unlimited, except by their own feelings. I ought also, however, to say that, limited by their own feelings, the tendency is rather to restrain them than to permit them to be extravagant. The moment anything is proposed which any individual thinks extravagant it is resisted.

4922. The building of a new prison would be a subject within the power of the Court of Aldermen, would it not?—That is rather a combined question. It is within the power of the Court of Aldermen, as far as they regulate the sheriffs' and the criminal jurisdiction of the corporation, and, in fact, they are bound to find prisons in which to confine prisoners; but the essential point, when you come to build a prison, is the cost at which it is to be built, and the mode of getting the funds; that entirely rests with the common council. The prison committee appointed by the Court of Aldermen met the committee appointed by the common council for the purpose of building the prison. They conferred with each other, and the matter was arrranged with the consent of both committees—a very common course to be taken whenever there is anything to be done in which the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council have each of them separate and respective duties.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4923. Does it often happen that questions arise which fall within the powers of both courts, which have to be decided by combined committees?—I should say there are many subjects of that kind. I may mention one which has led to many conferences between the two bodies, that is, regulations to be made or proceedings to be instituted against persons who do not take out their freedom. Each court has its respective duties; the Court of Aldermen sets the chamberlain in motion, and take care that he follows out the presentment of the inquest. On the other hand, the Court of Common Council, as I think the Commissioners were informed the other day, did a short time ago resort to an old right in the common council of admitting freemen as they think fit, and a list of applicants for freedom is as commonly introduced in the Court of Common Council as it is in the Court of Aldermen. That being the case, it was a most material matter for the common council to consider what ought to be done with respect to the admission to the freedom. They entertained the subject, and referred it to a committee; the committee sat for a great length of time, the whole of the clerks of the corporation were examined for the purpose of reporting to them what had been the ancient practice, and the whole of this subject being referred by the Court of Aldermen to their committee, and by the Court of Common Council to their committee, the committees frequently had conferences, and arranged between themselves what should be done. That is one instance, and there are others. The question of conservancy is in a certain degree connected both with the one and the other; that is to say, for the conservancy certain sums of money are to be paid, the common council look at them with a great deal of strictness, and that has led to conferences between the two courts. So, also, I imagine, if any fundamental alteration under the charter I have referred to to-day were to take place, and a measure were to be suggested, it would be thought expedient and proper that the two courts should have a previous understanding upon the subject, and, I dare say, committees would be appointed in both courts who would confer together for the purpose of bringing about a mutual understanding.

4924. The relation of the Court of Aldermen to the Court of Common Council is not that of a controlling body, so that a measure which has passed the Court of Common Council has afterwards to be considered by the Court of Aldermen, but the two bodies are, in fact, co-ordinate, and divide the business between them?—That is really the case. The Court of Aldermen have not, and do not pretend to have, a control over the common council. They have their particular duties to perform, and they perform them, and I think there is a reasonable jealousy as to any interference at all with the common council. On the other hand, the common council have their particular duties; and there is no doubt that the common council, as the representatives of the body of freemen, which they are presumed to be, have a general control over the whole corporation as far as the freemen themselves would have it. They are the representatives of the freemen, and they have the whole power of the freemen in their hands.

4925. The Court of Aldermen do not, in any respect, revise the decisions of the Court of Common Council, do they?—Certainly not.

4926. Is there any instance in which a measure which has passed the Court of Common Council would require the assent of the Court of Aldermen?—None. I do not recollect anything in my time which has drawn forth a reconsideration of any measure which has been taken by the Court of Common Council. Between two such bodies it may occasionally occur that there would be conferences on points of difference.

4927. The relation of the Court of Aldermen to the Court of Common Council bears no resemblance to that which subsists between two legislative bodies like the House of Lords and the House of Commons?—Certainly not. I said that the Court of Aldermen had no power of legislation except in the case of making ordinances as far as regards matters under their immediate jurisdiction.

4928. Are there any matters the control of which is given expressly by Act of Parliament or by charter to the Court of Aldermen, as distinguished from the Court of Common Council?—The old Acts of Parliament generally gave the jurisdiction of all kinds to the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen; now, the powers, whatever they are, are given to the Mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, that is the language which is invariably used. The Court of Aldermen, it should also be mentioned, is a court of record, which introduces a substantial distinction between the two. The common council is the representative of the freemen, and embodies the whole power of the corporation, but the Court of Aldermen is a court of record, which would be necessary for the sake of some of the determinations which I referred to before; unless it were a court of record it would be difficult to appeal against them, or deal with them at all.

4929. The Court of Aldermen have no respect to the character of lords of articles, have they; they never prepare measures for the Court of Common Council?—I mentioned before that under the application of that charter for amending the customs, the old practice used to be that they did so. They prepared their measure or proposal, or whatever it was, and sent it by the recorder to the Court of Common Council. On the other hand, if the Court of Common Council wanted to suggest any alterations themselves, and they had not done it previously through committees, the Court of Common Council would prepare a measure or resolution, and send it up, as it were, to the Court of Aldermen by the common serjeant. That was the old mode of doing it, but that has not been practised for many years.

4930. Setting aside questions of jurisdiction, in which the Court of Aldermen are alone competent to act, would it be possible for the Court of Common Council to assume a power over other matters in which the Court of Aldermen now act. Take, for instance, the superintendence of prisons. Could the Court of Common Council pass a resolution declaring that the whole control of the prisons should be for the future vested in themselves, and not in the Court of Aldermen?—I imagine not. If done at all it must be done under strict compliance with the charter to which I referred and then it would be done in the manner I mentioned. I think it is to be done by the Court of Aldermen with the consent of the commonalty, where not affected by statutes.

4931. You consider the present division of the business as something fixed by law, with which the Court of Common Council cannot interfere?—I think it is. At all events they can only interfere under the charters or statutes.

4932. You do not consider the common council as the supreme representative body of the commonalty of London?—Yes, I do. I conceive that it is so.

4933. If it is the supreme representative body, I presume it could override the practice of the Court of Aldermen?—The Court of Aldermen, being a court of record, what they do must be understood as something more than practice.

4934. I am not speaking of judicial powers, but such powers as the control of the prisons and the conservancy of the river, matters in which the Court of Aldermen, as a court of record, has no jurisdiction?—In respect to the prisons, I imagine it would be found extremely inconvenient if the Court of Aldermen had not the jurisdiction which they have at present. There are particular powers, with respect to the prisons, given to the Court of Aldermen by statutes. The statutes with respect to the prisons put the aldermen of the City of London in the same position as the magistrates in the counties; they are not only visiting justices, but they have the power of building prisons and of raising funds for the purpose, and of declaring where the prison shall be built.

4935. Those are special powers given by the Act of Parliament. Take the case of the conservancy of the river. Supposing the common council passed a resolution, that for the future all business relating to the conservancy of the river should be transacted by themselves, and not by the Court of Aldermen, would that be a valid resolution?—I think not. There again I am very much inclined to think the Court of Aldermen is to be regarded as a court of record. There are instances in which trials have been had. The grand jury still sits and makes its presentments, but from the habit of removing those presentments by certiorari, they have very rarely had a petty jury. I find in my office instances of a common jury being empannelled.

4936. Your opinion is clear that the present division of the business between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council is something fixed by law or by usage equivalent to law, and that neither court can disturb that arrangement?—I think not, unless under the provisions of the charter referred to.

4937. Is there anything with respect to the mode of the election of the common councilmen, which you would wish to state?—No; as far as I can see the mode of election appears to work exceedingly well. I should not feel equal to the task of suggesting any thing which would have the probability of working so well as the present system does.

4938. Do you think the number of the court is too large; it has been stated to us that inconvenience sometimes arises from the large number of the court?—That matter having been frequently mentioned, I have felt myself bound to apply my attention to it. I have done so by asking myself the simple question, what is the evil to be corrected or the good to be obtained. I cannot find either the one or the other. I know of no evil; there will be occasionally strong expressions made use of, perhaps strong conduct manifested; but on the whole, I should say, nothing can work better than the present assembly does, and I am inclined to think it works so well, that there must be something even in the number of which the court is at present composed, because I think those who are silent may, in a certain degree, operate as a check upon those who speak, and those who speak may in some degree be restrained in the course they take by the silent persons who are sitting around them. I cannot see what advantage there would be in reducing the number. I may be excused for saying that that is entirely a private opinion of my own derived solely from my own experience.

4939. Are you in the habit of attending all the meetings of the common council?—Every one. I believe I have not been absent from more than two or three.

4940. Is there ever any difficulty in making a quorum of the council?—None; forty is the assumed number of the quorum, which has at all events come into practice, it was founded upon a sort of enactment made during the commonwealth, but all those enactments were repudiated by the City; they were afterwards desired to be expunged from the books, and they were all crossed out, this being one of them. Since that, however, they have considered forty to be the quorum, and practically it seems to me to work very well. It is occasionally, after a long sitting, difficult to retain many more than that number, and I think the forty persons who stop, and by stopping show that they take an interest in the matter, are very likely to come to as sound a conclusion as could be arrived at.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D,C.L.

4941. The Lord Mayor has the power of suspending the proceedings at any moment, has not he?—Yes; but that is very much like some other powers which might be exercised on extraordinary occasions. There was an instance of a Lord Mayor who did it, who ordered the mace bearer and the sword bearer to take up their respective insignia and to leave the court, and he left the court, and so broke it up. The occurrence is so rare that it is hardly fit to be considered.

4942. The business of the common council is not of a legislative kind in general, is it; it is chiefly what may be called an administrative business?—It is so in a great degree, but so much may be done by standing orders and by bye-laws and resolutions that it would be very difficult to say that it is not a legislative body; besides which it actually performs acts of legislation, it passes Bills in the same form as Acts of Parliament are passed. A bill is brought in; it is read a first time, a second time, a third time, and passed.

4943. An Act of City legislation is complete when it has passed the Court of Common Council?—It is; here is one of their bills relating to fellowship porters (producing the same).

4944. How often does the Court of Common Council usually sit?—About as often as the Court of Aldermen.

4945. About twice a month?—Yes, about that; the Court of Aldermen sitting on Tuesday it is almost immediately afterwards followed by the Court of Common Council, and there are sometimes special courts; last year there were altogether thirty one.

4946. Much of the business of the Court of Common Council is transacted by means of committees, is not it?—A great deal of it is, but they always report to the court, and I think I may say, generally speaking, all those reports are canvassed in the court. Of course, if there is in the committee any difference of opinion, those who are opposed to the decision of the majority frequently repeat their opposition in the Court of Common Council.

4947. The committees are very numerous, are they not?—They are.

4948. There are thirty or forty members put in one committee, are not there?—The usual mode of selecting a committee is to make it what is called a ward committee, in which one member is taken from each of the wards.

4949. Is it the general rule that a committee consists of twenty-five members?—It is so, unless upon special occasions. The general rule is to have a ward committee, which consists of one member chosen out of each ward, consequently the number is about twenty-nine, besides the aldermen; all the aldermen present are usually put upon the committee.

4950. Is it a good plan, do you think, to put so many persons upon committees?—I do not think there is any reason to complain of the number; it is very difficult to get persons to meet frequently on those committees; it sometimes happens that there is a difficulty in obtaining a quorum of a committee, which is generally seven.

4951. Do you think that the business transacted by the committees of the Common Council is satisfactorily transacted?—I think it is remarkably so. I could not picture to myself anything better than the manner in which the business altogether is transacted, particularly in the committees. It is my duty to attend the committees whenever called on. I send from my office a minuting clerk to take the minutes, and I become therefore acquainted with all what takes place in the committees. I do not think that it is possible for business to be done better than that is, with greater devotion, or I am quite sure I ought to say with more entire purity. I never have, since I have been in the corporation, seen the least tendency to jobbing of any kind in the committees, and the only thing of which I certainly have once or twice in rare instances observed, has been that the feeling has been a little too strong against jobbing, and they have done something like injustice to an individual towards whom they might be supposed to have had an inclination to serve. I do not know whether you have had your attention drawn sufficiently to the standing orders, which secure the committees as much as any provisions can do, and they are added to from time to time as required, from the possibility of any improper or personal interests.

4952. What is the average number of the attendance upon each committee?—That I cannot speak to; my clerk notes the number of persons in a book, but I am unable to state it. It is suggested to me that fifteen or sixteen is about the average. I know before the business of the day is over, which is often long, the number is reduced.

4953. Will you read the standing orders limiting the power of the committees with respect to the appointment to offices?—The second standing order is, "No person shall "be allowed to be a candidate for any office or place in the gift or appointment of this "court, who is a member of this court, or who has been so within three calendar months "of the day of election, unless the office or place has become vacant since such person "ceased to be a member of the court." "No member of this court, (aldermen excepted,) "shall be upon more than one of the following committees, viz.;—City Lands, Bridge "House Estates, Thames Navigation and Port of London, Coal and Corn and Finance, and

"General Purposes, except in such wards where there are only four members." Some of the wards are so small, that there are only four members of the common council, for although the wards are irregular, the number of common councilmen for each ward is made as far as it can be conveniently made to correspond with the size of the ward. Some wards have twelve and some sixteen common councilmen, some small ones having only four. "No member whatever to be upon the City Lands and Bridge House Committees, "nor upon the City Lands and Markets Committees at the same time, except the chairman "of the City Lands Committee, and he to be a member of the Markets Committee." "No "commoner having served on the committee of City Lands or Bridge House Estates for "four years, for any ward having more than four members eligible to serve on committees "shall be appointed on either of the said committees for a period of four years, whilst there "is a member of the ward who has not served thereon, except by consent of every member "of the ward." "No member of this court who shall be a shareholder in or concerned for "any public company, speculation or undertaking, which shall in any manner be opposed "by this corporation in parliament or elsewhere, shall be eligible to sit or vote upon any "committee of this court to which shall be delegated the opposition, or considering the "propriety of opposition to any such measure, during the time the same shall be under "the consideration of the committee." "No member who is a shareholder in, or director "of, a solicitor, engineer, architect, or valuer, to any railway company, speculation or "undertaking, shall be eligible to vote in any committee whilst any matter affecting or "concerning such railway speculation or undertaking shall be under consideration." "No "placeman or servant of this City, nor any member of this court, who holds any place or "appointment under government, from which he derives any emolument, or who receives "any income, salary, or allowance out of the public money, (except the Corn Meters in "trust, and such members as may hold commission in the Royal London Militia), shall "be appointed on any committee or commission chosen by this court." "No person who "has ever been convicted of fraud, or who has compounded with his creditors, or been a "bankrupt, or has taken the benefit of any of the Acts for the relief of insolvent debtors, "and has not paid twenty shillings in the pound, shall be elected or continue upon any "committee or commission chosen by this court, or become a governor of either of the "royal hospitals by virtue of an appointment of this court." "No member of this court, "nor his partner, nor any other person on his behalf, shall be a contractor for or shall be "employed directly or indirectly in any work to be performed in his business or profession, "for or against this City, or this court, or any of its committees or commissions, or any "committee or society, the members whereof are appointed by this court; nor shall accept "any order or employment of any kind from the Court of Aldermen; nor be engaged in "the supply of any materials or the sale of any goods, or the transaction of any general "or professional business which is to be paid for in any way out of the City's cash, or out "of any funds held in trust by this corporation, over which this corporation or any of its "committees or commissions have any control. No new member acting in contravention "of this standing order, either in his own person, or by his partner or by any other "party whomsoever, shall be elected or continue on any committee or commission of this "court."

4954. Are there many offices in the gift of the common council?—Yes. In the pocket-book to which I have referred, the Commissioners will find all the places which are in the apppointment of any committee mentioned immediately under the entry of the members of the committee. There is another standing order which prohibits any son of any member of the court being a candidate for any office. "That in future no son of any member "of this court be admitted a candidate for any office or situation in the gift or appoint-"ment of this court or any committee or commission of this court, but that this order "shall not apply to any person who has already served this corporation in any office or "situation." I have pleasure in reading this because I believe I am thoroughly justified in the observation I have made, that every possible channel to improper influence is studiously stopped by the corporation, and, to prevent it, new standing orders are made from time to time as circumstances may render necessary.

4955. The Commissioners have heard objections to the plan of making allowances for dinners to the members of the committees of the common council. Is that a subject to which you have paid attention?—There are provisions made in the standing orders for those allowances, I believe it has been a subject which has been from time to time under the consideration of the corporation. There can be no doubt but that it is difficult and onerous to ask persons to come and sit at uncertain hours for the performance of the business of the corporation, when they have no remuneration for it at all, and as was mentioned in one of the statements which was laid before you, almost all other public bodies do the same for those who perform work for them; directors and others have allowances of some kind. It is sufficient for me to say that that has always been the practice of the corporation of London as far as I can see for a great length of time. The difficulty has been to put it into such a shape that it should not be practically objectionable. Originally they used to be paid by what is called line money, that is to say as each member of the committee came into the room, his name was marked with a line next to it and at a certain time after the names had been called there was a line put and the names of those who came in afterwards were put below that line—they were entitled to no remuneration, but the others used to have a certain sum paid to them for their attendance. The practice was objected to; it was thought there was something unseemly in the appearance of it. It was observed upon by the Commissioners under the last royal commission, and having been observed upon, it was put an end to by the corporation. The committees were then allowed a certain sum of money, each committee having a particular sum put at its disposal which it was to use as it thought best. These amounts are included in the standing orders, they are well known to the whole of the committees and well known also to to the freemen. I think I may also properly draw the attention of the commissioners to the fact that during the time that this inquiry has been going on, and their objections to the conduct of the common council in this respect have been made known, the annual elections have taken place, and I believe there are not more than two changes in the whole body of the common council.

4956. Do you think that this practice secures the attendance of members, and would there be difficulty in transacting business without an allowance of that kind?—My opinion is that it has a tendency to secure the attendance of parties. It does seem to be a more social mode of disposing of the money, to apply it in the way in which it is now applied, than to permit them to put it into their own pockets. I ought to say that the meeting, after the asperities of the day are over, is generally of service in polishing off those rough corners which will subsequently occur when people meet for business.

4957. Nothing of the sort is found necessary in other corporations is it?—I imagine it is very common.

4958. An allowance out of the corporation funds do you mean?—I should think dinners of that kind are had, and paid for out of the corporation funds; that is my impression.

4960. Is there anything as to the mode of election of the sheriffs that you would wish to state?—I think the commissioners have had the subject so thoroughly explained by Mr. Scott, with respect to elections in common hall, that it will hardly be necessary for me to trouble you with it a second time. Undoubtedly the mode of election of the sheriffs in the common hall does not seem to answer; it is in vain to say that that is not the case. First of all, there is the disinclination of people to interfere on occasions of this kind; the hall is very thinly attended. From time to time regulations have been made to confine the admission into the hall entirely to liverymen, but I believe those regulations have always failed in their purpose; by some expedient or other people get into the hall who are not liverymen. I believe it would be absurd to endeavour to describe the election of the sheriffs as made substantially by the great body of the liverymen. I feel that I am obliged to say, that therefore though by accident or circumstances, persons of the best class may be elected as sheriffs, and generally speaking they are of that class, yet it is more to be attributed probably to good fortune, or perhaps to the disposition of the individuals themselves to take the office upon them, than it is to the exercise of any sound election.

4961. Is there considerable difficulty in inducing persons to serve the office of sheriff? Sometimes there is and sometimes the contrary. I should say, as a general answer to that question, that there is a difficulty; it is a very onerous office, and an expensive one. I may say that it is under the consideration of the corporation at the present moment, whether some arrangement should not be made for a more substantial allowance to be given to the sheriffs as well as to the Lord Mayor, in order to prevent the risk of the office not being properly filled in consequence of the expense. So far the corporation already are entertaining the subject.

4962. When you say the duties are onerous, what are the duties of the sheriffs?—Their duties are onerous in requiring constant attendance at the Criminal Court, which is now held monthly. They also have to attend the courts of law on some occasions. I believe they do that by deputy. I think they attend the Court of Exchequer and the Court of Queen's Bench on the occasion of the swearing in of the jury.

4963. It is the under sheriff who attends on those occasions?—It may be so. Besides that, they are expected to attend upon the Court of Aldermen, upon the Court of Common Council, and upon the Lord Mayor whenever they are required.

4964. They have to give a great deal of personal attendance, have they?—Yes; and besides that they have a great deal of attendance to give which is not strictly part of their duty, but it has been so old a practice that no sheriff thinks of breaking through it,—such as charity sermons and occupations of that nature. Their time is very much taken up in that manner, and practical inconveniences have resulted from their absence from the City; they also present all petitions from the common council to the House of Commons.

4965. What is the amount of the expenses of the office of sheriff?—The amount of the expenses is very considerable; but the best thing I can do in that respect is to lay before you the returns which have been made by two or three sheriffs of the expenses which they incurred. To some extent, of course, it is a matter for their own consideration to what extent they will go; but the best evidence which can be given to you upon that subject will be to present two returns—one made by Mr. Alderman Wilson during his shrievalty, and one by Mr. Alderman Harmer during his. There has been a statement made also by one of the under sheriffs. I will take care that they shall be laid before you.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

4966. Will those returns show both the amount and the object of the expenditure?—Yes; I think with as much particularity as you would require. If they do not, you shall be supplied with further evidence.

4967. May those be taken as fair samples of the ordinary expenditure of a sheriff at the present time?—I should think so. If there is any particular alteration at the present time, I will take care that it shall be noted.

4968. With respect to fines which arise from estreated recognizances, where do they go?—I believe they are given up to the under sheriff. The under sheriffs undertake a great part of the expenses of the office, and as a renumeration for that, an arrangement takes place between the under sheriffs and the sheriffs. I am not quite sure whether the present senior sheriff, Mr. Alderman Wire, has not made an arrangement by which the system should be altered. I think he and his under sheriff, both of them having been heretofore under sheriffs, have seen some of the practical inconveniences resulting from the former arrangement, and my present impression is that they have made a new one.

4969. Has there been any abuse with respect to the imposition of fines for non-service of the office?—There is no doubt that heretofore there were great complaints made upon that subject, and perhaps I may say not without sufficient ground. It was supposed that persons were nominated as sheriffs who were known to have a disinclination to serve the office, particularly with respect to taking the oaths. I am speaking now of a period in Lord Mansfield's time, when the great question with respect to dissenters filling public offices was considered. It is supposed that at that time, persons having conscientious scruples as to taking the oaths, had been named as sheriffs; and the certainty of their being obliged to pay the fine; but from that suspicion the corporation at present are totally exempted. I am sure that no feeling of that description has at all existed since I have been in office. I put that limit to it because I can speak to it during that time with more confidence. To prevent the possibility of such an imputation, the fines of the sheriffs, whatever they are, are applied to a charity fund, namely, the fund for the Orphan School for the Orphans of Widows. So that I am sure at present there is no such thing existing; and from those acts which have been done, I infer that there is no probability of its ever existing again.

4970. You speak with confidence of the fact that at present the system of using the sheriffs' fine as a means of revenue is entirely abandoned?—It is totally abandoned; and I think now there is no chance of its ever being revived.

4971. The sheriffs of London constitute the sheriffs for Middlesex, do not they?—They do.

4972. Is there any advantage in retaining that arrangement?—I am afraid, to a certain degree, that question trenches upon the subject of suggestions for the future, which I desire to keep distinct.

4973. Do any benefits arise from that state of the law?—I infer that the City was very much in the same state as other boroughs in ancient times, and that the sheriffs of the county still attempted to interfere within its jurisdiction. In order to put that matter quite at rest, they first of all got the power of appointing their own sheriff, because one ground of objection was this: it was said in the borough, "You have no sheriff, you must have a sheriff, and therefore the sheriff of the county must interfere." The City applied to be at liberty to choose their own sheriffs, which they did upon the payment of a sum of money, in the reign of King Stephen. As early as that they obtained permission to appoint their own sheriffs; and in the succeeding reign it was granted them that they might select as sheriff whom they choose, and present to his Majesty or the Exchequer. That being done, I suppose there was still some interference of the sheriff of Middlesex; and the consequence is, that they agree to pay a fee farm rent of 300*l.* a year for the grant of the shrievalty of Middlesex. That sum they pay at the present moment. I take it, the real meaning of calling them sheriffs of London is because they were appointed as sheriffs of London, but with respect to the universal analogy throughout the country that there is only one sheriff for a county, the two are supposed to hold that office.

4974. You seem to think that there was at one time a sheriff of Middlesex besides sheriffs of London?—Yes.

4975. How could he interfere with London unless London were a part of the county of Middlesex?—I imagine the pretensions of the sheriffs was altogether unfounded. I only mention as a historical fact that I think that is the only mode by which the claim to the appointment of distinct sheriffs in places which were counties themselves, grew up.

4976. The pretension of the sheriff of a county to interfere in a borough which was not a county, would be very different from the pretension of a sheriff to interfere in a borough which was a county?—That was so; and, therefore, in subsequent times, different boroughs obtained grants that they should be counties of themselves. But the cases are not numerous; the instances are all mentioned in "Blackstone,"

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

12th Jan. 1854.

but are more particularly referred to by Mr. Corbet, in his book on the Elective Franchise.

4977. Is there any document to show when London became a county in itself, separate from the County of Middlesex?—I do not think there is.

4978. Can you point out any advantages which result from the present state of the law, by which the sheriffs of London execute the office of sheriff of Middlesex?—I do not know that I can, except that I believe it is universally admitted, and was so felt in the profession when I belonged to it, that the office of under sheriff is exceedingly well executed by Messrs. Burchell, who are practically the under sheriffs. I dare say, the commissioners will be aware that the County of Middlesex is different from other counties in England; the large portion of the metropolis which is situated within it, and the immense amount of property which every day is changing hands here, make the duties of the sheriff and the under sheriff much more important in Middlesex than in any other county; and the consequence is, that, I suppose by the result of experience, the under sheriffwick of London is practically in the hands of Messrs. Burchell as deputies, in whose family it has been for a great number of years. Mr. Burchell is appointed as deputy to the senior under sheriff of the City of London, and he transacts the business remarkably well. I have learned that since I have been employed in my present office, because he has been repeatedly before the committees, and the mode of transacting the business, and the division of profits, and so on, have been under consideration.

4979. I understand you to express your opinion, that judging from the experience in your office, you have found that the present division of duties between the court of aldermen and the court of common council has worked in a satisfactory manner?—I think so.

4980. What do you consider to be the principal advantage of dividing the duties between the two bodies rather than vesting them all in one body?—I do not imagine that they were divided in that manner by any preconceived idea of the utility of the division, but the division has rather sprung out of existing circumstances from time to time, as it has been found expedient. For instance, the court of aldermen certainly at one time exercised the greatest influence by itself, and was substantially the governing body in the City. The wardmotes interfered, and excessive numbers coming from the wardmotes to the Hall, the proceedings were much embarrassed. It was that which led to the expedient of having the liverymen and a part only of the freemen attend, instead of the whole body. After a time, a resolution of the common council was made, declaring that the elections should be in the liverymen. It would appear to me that such a resolution in its conception was altogether illegal. The effect of it was to limit the right of voting to one class of freemen, selected by bodies foreign to the corporation. Of all the suggestions that were ever made, I have no conception that any such bye-law as that could be correct, but that was the original conception of the matter. That having passed since then, the liverymen have been somehow or other the representatives of the great body of the citizens who ought to meet in common hall.

4981. According to your view, the rights of the liverymen are a sort of encroachment upon the general rights of the commonalty of London?—I should not like at this time of day, and after so long a usage, to say so. As far as that bye-law goes, I am convinced that in the estimation of any lawyer, such a bye-law as that must be thought to be illegal.

4982. They obtained an Act of Parliament, did not they?—I think not. I am speaking of what took place in the reign of Edward the Fourth. It is a curious fact, that the Act of the 11th of George the First, which is generally supposed to give them the right, does not in point of fact, give them the right, but it assumes that they have it, and regulates the exercise of it. They were no doubt at that time in possession of it, and that Act of Parliament proceeded upon the footing of their being so. It would be therefore a very difficult thing for anybody to say now that it is illegal, though it may have had an illegal inception. With respect to the two courts being separated, I can only say, that the separate control of the two courts seems rather to have arisen out of circumstances, than anything else.

4983. You think, according to the present decision, the duties exercised by the common council, are best exercised by them, and the duties now exercised by the court of aldermen, are best exercised by that branch of the corporation?—I should not in the first place, feel justified in recommending an alteration, and next, I see no occasion for it.

4984. You think each portion of the duties, is best exercised by that branch of the corporation which at present exercises them?—I think so; during my twelve years of office, I have seen no practical inconvenience which is in the least degree worth mentioning.

Adjourned to to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Friday, 13th January 1854.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., in the Chair.

HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, Serjeant-at-Law, Town Clerk, D.C.L., further examined. 13th Jan. 1854.

4985. Are there any parts of your evidence of yesterday, to which you are desirous of making any addition?—I was asked yesterday, what was the quorum necessary to constitute a Court of Common Council. I gave to the Commissioners a history of the adoption of forty, as the number which was necessary for the purpose; but, I believe, I fell short in giving an answer to the question that was put to me, whether any difficulty had arisen, in consequence of there not being forty present to constitute a court. In my experience of twelve years, I do not recollect a single instance, in which that number was not present, at the beginning of the court, or in which, a court was not held in consequence of such a number, not being present. The other point was of precisely the same kind. I was asked the quorum necessary for a committee; my answer was, it was seven. I believe I did not go on to state, as I ought to have done, that I do not recollect a Committee's failing to sit, in consequence of the non-attendance of the seven. I think I stated that they were often reduced in number before the end of the meeting; but, generally speaking, the seven necessary to form a quorum are always present. There was also a matter, which I referred to, as to which I had not with me the papers necessary to enable me to establish it—that was with respect to the summonses of the courts. I have brought down the forms of the summonses. The first is a summons to the Court of Aldermen.

The same was delivered in.

And on other business.

Swordbearer's Office, Mansion-house.
Thursday 8th December 1853.

I was asked whether there was any interference by the Court of Aldermen with the Court of Common Council, and how they acted with reference to each other. This which I hold in my hand is the summons that is sent to the aldermen, which is in a different form from that which is sent to the common council, when the common council is convened. This calls upon the aldermen to attend upon the day; and there is a nota bene,—"A Court of Common Council will be holden." It is therefore, in point of fact, the summons of the Court of Aldermen, with a notice that a common council will be held for the purpose specified in the summons.

The summons of the Common Council is as follows:

Sir,—You are desired to be at a Court of Aldermen, at Guildhall, on Thursday next, the 17th day of February 1853, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

That the freedom of this City, in a gold box of the value of one hundred guineas, be presented to Austen Henry Layard, Esq., D.C.L., M.P., as a testimonial of his persevering and zealous exertions in the discovery of the long-lost remains of eastern antiquity, and for securing them in so perfect a state as to demonstrate the accuracy of sacred history, and illustrate the early habits of the human race; and for his indefatigable labour and skill by which this country has been enabled to place such valuable memorials of ancient grandeur amongst the collections of the British Museum. 1852. 10th June.

By James Anderton, Esq.

That it be referred to the Secondaries and City Courts' committee to inquire into effect of the absence of one or both of the sheriffs; and what measures should be taken to prevent the inconveniences arising from such circumstances. 1852. 10th June.

By Mr. Deputy Lake.

That the chamberlain be instructed to pay to the Rev. William Meynell Whittemore the allowance agreed to on the 4th of December last, to be made to the minister of St. James, Duke's place, from the 23d of October last, the date of the acceptance of the resignation of the last incumbent, Mr. Whittemore having performed the duty from that period. 1852. 24th June.

By Mr. Deputy Lott.

That Thomas Grissell, Esq., and George Moore, Esq., having been nominated for the office of sheriff of London and Middlesex, under misapprehension, and they having severally paid a fine of 400*l.* to be discharged from such nomination, this Court doth order that the sum of 400*l.* be paid to each of those gentlemen, out of the chamber of London, in respect of such fines. 1852. 1st July.

By James Anderton, Esq.

That it be referred to the Navigation committee to ascertain and report to this Court, the amount of income derived by the corporation, in respect of the property under the management of the committee during the past year, and the amount expended. 1852. 1st July.

Also the amounts expended by the committee in taking views up and down the river during the last five years, distinguishing those attendant upon the navigation of the Shallop and its repairs, from the amount of the City expenses. And the same return with regard to the Maria Wood; and how often it was used in each of the said years, and by whom.

Also to report to the Court, the probable saving to the corporate funds by abolishing the said two establishments, and superannuating the different officers connected therewith?—and to ascertain and report whether the Lord Mayor, as conservator of the river Thames and waters of Medway, can transact all the duties connected with the conservancy without such establishments; and whether it would be to the interest of the public that he should do so.

By James Anderton, Esq.

That it be referred to the General Purposes committee to examine as to the magisterial and other official duties of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; the patronage attached to and belonging to their offices; and whether it is desirable for the public service that they should be relieved from any of their official duties by the appointment of assistant magistrates or otherwise; and to report thereon to this Court. 1852. 1st July.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

By James Anderton, Esq.

That it be referred to the Police committee to inspect the several police stations within the police jurisdiction of this City, and the places of confinement therein for prisoners; and report the state and condition of the same to this Court; and whether they are properly fitted for the purpose intended, and were so, previous to the month of October, 1850.

By Mr. Deputy Obbard.

That it be referred to the officers and clerks committee, to consider and report to this Court, whether it is desirable that the income of the Town Clerk should continue to be made up partly from fees upon warrants, and orders for payment of money, or whether any of them should be discontinued, and the income of the Town Clerk paid out of the chamber.

C. W. Hick, Swordbearer.

Swordbearer's office, Mansion-house.
Saturday, 15th February, 1853.

The same was delivered in.

The summons to the common councilmen contains, of course, the same list of business, the heading being in this form:—"Sir,—You are desired to be at a Court of Common "Council at Guildhall, on Thursday next, the 17th day of February, 1853, at eleven of "the clock in the forenoon." I referred yesterday to the charter which gives to the corporation the power of altering the customs. I now produce a copy of that part of the charter. It is referred to in Mr. Norton's book, page 470. The date is the year 1341, the 15th of Edward III. This is the extract:—"Moreover "we have granted for us and our heirs, and by this our charter have confirmed "to the Mayor and Aldermen of the City aforesaid, that if any customs in the "said City heretofore obtained and used, be in any part difficult or defective, "or anything in the same City arising, whereof no remedy was before obtained, "may require amendment, the same Mayor and Aldermen, and their heirs and "successors, with the assent of the commonalty of the same City, may as often, and when "it shall seem expedient to them, appoint and ordain a fit remedy, of good faith "and consonant to reason, for the common benefit of the citizens of the said City and of "other our faithful subjects resorting thereto, provided such ordinance be profitable to "us and our people, and of good faith and consonant to reason, as aforesaid."

4986. Has it been the case that under that power material alterations have, from time to time, been effected?—A great many.

4987. Will you have the goodness to specify one of the most recent?—One of the most recent, I think, has been an act of the common council with reference to jurors. The juries heretofore in London used to be marked upon the back of the presentment at the wardmote; and out of these were selected by the secondary the jury to serve. The recent Act with respect to jurors had appointed a different mode of selecting them; and that was also done by the secondary, but from other sources. It was found the two did not work well together; that there were different classes in the one list from those in the other, and there was altogether an uncertainty, in point of practice, in the arrangement. That was all corrected by a Bill which was brought into the common council a short time ago, in which the system adopted in what is commonly called Sir Robert Peel's Act was directed to be the general system for the City, so as to have only one list.

4988. When the number of the common council was reduced, was that done by Act of Parliament, or by the City authorities themselves, under that charter?—By the City authorities themselves. I believe there never has been any Act of Parliament at all, affecting the number of the common council, or affecting their position. The common council is the creation of the corporation itself, and has from time to time been regulated by its provisions, or standing orders, or resolutions.

4989. Do you apprehend that it would be in the power of the corporation to alter the term of tenure of office of the lord mayor, or any matters of that kind?—I think not with safety, because, inasmuch as the duration of the office of lord mayor for a year is embodied in one of the earliest charters, it has always been a principle, recommended to the corporation, not to interfere with any of those matters which have existed so long that they fall, as it were, under the title of prescription, because it is well known that any prescription which is altered is of course destroyed.

4990. That is rather putting it upon a ground of expediency, than upon one of right?—Perhaps it is. According to the general words of the charter I have read, it would seem to me that the corporation have the entire power of making all alterations within themselves which they think necessary, with the exception only, that they cannot interfere with any Act of Parliament. That was the case to which I drew the attention of the Commissioners yesterday. The Election Act having passed and recognized a right in the liveryman, the corporation have always found themselves unable, under that charter, to deal with that enactment.

4991 You stated yesterday that it would be hardly possible, under that charter, for the corporation to deal with the number of the aldermen, the extent of the wards, and matters of that description, inasmuch as those questions touch upon others connected with courts of justice, for which an act of the legislature would be necessary?—That is exactly my view. I think there is no doubt whatever, if it were found advantageous to have more aldermen, as connected with the corporation, for corporate purposes, under that charter the corporation might effect the object; but inasmuch as the very essence of the existence of an alderman in the City of London has reference to his ward, and in the ward there is a wardmote held I imagine that they could not, by any regulation of their own, give a jurisdiction to a new ward which they themselves might create. That experiment they tried in the borough of Southwark, but it altogether failed.

4992. Do you suppose, if it were thought expedient to sever the connection of Southwark with the City of London, that could be done by the City without the assistance of Parliament?—I think it might.

4993. Would not that be interfering with courts of justice?—No; they are authorized to hold a court leet, and a court of record for Southwark, that is a part of the charter. I imagine that it is universally allowed, that the grantees of a charter may surrender or cease to act upon, any part of a charter which is made for their good, but if they do so, I believe it has been held a partial surrender cannot be permitted; it must be a surrender of the whole, or none at all. Some difficulties of that kind might occur. My strong impression is, that with respect to Southwark, if anything is done with it, it will be done with the consent of all parties, through the medium of the legislature.

4994. Was the alteration of the rights of the freemen in 1835, under the power of the charter you have just read?—Certainly.

4995. Are you aware that some doubt has been expressed as to the legal effect of that alteration?—I think it is very possible that such doubts may exist in the minds of some persons. I cannot say myself that I see any foundation for them whatever.

4996. You believe that there is no doubt as to the competence of the Common Council to make that alteration?—I think there is no question whatever. The going through the companies must have been an arrangement of the corporation itself, and therefore the corporation had the power to alter it. Besides that, the freemen used originally to be admitted in that way, and not through the livery companies. Therefore it was only a restoration of the old law of the corporation. Perhaps this may be a fit opportunity to remove what appeared to me to be an erroneous impression entertained, with respect to Southwark, particularly as it would be connected with the statement I made yesterday. The corporation have been anxious, from time to time, to do all they could to make their jurisdiction in Southwark effective, but they have been prevented by circumstances. It was said that Southwark was the ward of Bridge Without. I believe it is a total misconception and error. There was an attempt to give it that character, but that attempt altogether failed, and shewed that the charter is not effective for the purposes for which it was intended. The Commissioners are aware, perhaps, that the first charter I alluded to yesterday was in the reign of Edward III., granting the City power over the borough of Southwark, as a remedy for the felons and fugatives who escaped from the City, and went into Southwark. It was found that that charter was ineffective for the purpose. Therefore, in the reign of Edward IV., a subsequent charter was granted, giving them larger jurisdiction; but that again being ineffectual, in the reign of Edward VI., a very full and comprehensive charter was granted, giving them, for a valuable consideration, a considerable portion of property, and giving them jurisdiction of the most complete kind that a charter could give. Upon that, the corporation of London attempted to carry it out in the manner in which, I suppose, they presumed it was intended they should do, and they elected an alderman for what is here called Bridge Without. There was some attempt made to elect common councilmen for the same purpose. The alderman was elected, and was placed in the office, and there was an effort towards the inhabitants electing common councilmen, but it all turned out eventually to be abortive. I believe the ground upon which the name of Bridge Without was given, was that there was a sort of tête de pont on the other side of the other, and just the area surrounding that might, in analogy to the other wards, have been called Bridge Without. It was without the common line of the walls and boundaries of the City. But I think it is clear to demonstration that the whole of these proceedings were found to be ineffectual. It was stated to you, upon the authority of a book of Mr Delaune's, that the common councilmen had been elected, and that their names are given there. Upon examining that matter, I think no reliance can be placed upon that statement, because, first of all, the book itself is not one of any authority whatever. Next, the first edition did not contain the passage which I have alluded to, that common councilmen were appointed. In the second edition, where it is contained, there are certain names given, but on referring to the records which we have, which were rather imperfect at that time of day, there is no mention of the common councilmen, and the names which are contained in Delaune, are the names of the common councilmen for Bridge Ward; therefore, I am quite satisfied, from all those circumstances, that in truth there were no common councilmen elected at that time. A list of all the aldermen is given, and all the common councilmen in the wards in the ordinary course, but at the close of it is given the name of Sir John Ayliffe, as alderman of the ward of Bridge Without, but there are no names of common councilmen given. I have here an extract from the repertory, giving an account of Sir John Ayliffe's election. It is in the fourth of Edward VI. "At this court, Sir John Ayliffe, knight and citizen "and barber surgeon of London, was nominated, elected, and chosen by the same court, "alderman of the Bridge Ward Without. And it was ordained and agreed by the said "court, that he, the said Sir John, by that name of alderman of the Bridge Ward Without, "albeit that hitherto there hath not been any such ward or alderman within this city," so that the prior non-existence of such a ward is clearly established upon this very act, which was then done. "And altogether that hereafter shall be aldermen of the same

" ward, shall have the rule, survey, and government, not only of the inhabitants within the " town and borough of Southwark, as other such ward or alderman within this city, the " king's highness's liege people repairing to the same, but also of all the liberties, " franchises, and privileges heretofore given and granted by the king's majesty, and his " most noble progenitors to the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, " within the said town and borough, for the due execution whereof the said Sir John " Ayliffe was presently sworn and admitted." It is quite clear that by such a resolution, or order of the court as this is, they could not have appointed a wardmote, nor did they in point of fact, attempt to appoint a wardmote, nor has any wardmote ever been held for that ward.

4997. Is that an extract from the City records?—It is an extract from one of the repertories.

4998. You stated yesterday, that the total number of charters relating to the corporation of the City was about 120?—Yes; I was then speaking before the list of them had been completed.

4999. Are the Commissioners to understand that all those charters are now in force?—I should say that all of them are now in force. I am not aware that any of them have ever been surrendered. They have been seized by the crown at different times. They were seized under the celebrated Quo-warranto, in the reign of Charles II., but they were restored by Act of Parliament at the beginning of the reign of William III., in the strongest words, and I imagine there is not the slightest question that they are all still in force.

5000. It is possible some of them might have been temporary charters. Charters to be in force only during the reigns of the kings by whom they are granted?—That was seldom the case. I do not remember any instance of that. Some of them may have been granted for temporary purposes, and in the list which I have before me, there are some named which, properly speaking, are not municipal charters. They are special grants. The second charter they have is a grant to a private individual.

5001. Still your belief in general is, that the whole number of 120 is in force?—It is.

5002. The City possesses a considerable property in Southwark, does not it?—It does.

5003. Was the acquisition of that property, by the City, at all connected with Southwark purposes?—I think not. I think there seems to have been a beneficial grant made to the corporation for a money consideration.

5004. Do you know what was the origin of their acquisition of that property?—I can give it you from the Inspeximus. " We have seen also the letters patent of Lord " Edward, late king of England, the sixth, our progenitor, made in these words:—Edward " the sixth, by the grace of God, and so on. To all to whom these present letters shall " come, greeting: Know ye, that for the sum of 647*l.* 2*s.* 1d., of lawful money of England, " paid into the hands of the treasurer of our court of augmentation and revenues of our " crown, to our use, by our well-beloved the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the " City of London, whereof, we acknowledge us to be fully satisfied and paid, and the " mayor and commonalty and citizens, and their successors, to be thereof acquitted and " discharged by these present, and for other causes and considerations, us thereunto " especially moving, have, of our especial grace, and from our certain knowledge and " mere motion, and also with the advice of our council, given and granted, and by these " presents do give and grant, to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the City of " London, all that our messuage or tenement, with the appurtenances, now or late in the " tenure of Simon Sebatson, situate and being next our mansion, late Charles, late Duke " of Suffolk's, in Southwark, in the county of Surrey, and all that our messuage," going on with a long detail of many other properties. After those are so gone through, there is a grant of certain fee farms' rents in Southwark, and also the ordinary general words following the grant, and " all messuages, houses, buildings," and so on.

5005. Do you think it probable that the connection which then existed between the City of London and Southwark was the reason for the Crown granting this property at that time?—I have no doubt but that the citizens of London applied to the Crown and paid this money consideration in order to have the grant of Edward IV. carried out more effectually, by the more extensive powers and jurisdiction given under this charter than existed under the former one; they obtaining also this property.

5006. Was the gift of the property coincident in point of time with the grant of the jurisdiction?—Of the larger jurisdiction; they are both contained in the same charter.

5007. Do you think, in case of the severance of Southwark from London, the citizens of Southwark would have any equitable claim to this property for the benefit of themselves as a corporation?—I cannot think that they would. I see no ground upon which they could make such a claim. There is a money consideration. In the grant of any beneficial property in these charters, there is generally a money consideration paid, and that having been paid in this case, the property vested, I take it, absolutely in the corporation. Whether it may, or may not, be beneficial to the public, that the jurisdiction should be detached from it or not is a question; but, I imagine, considerations of equity would leave the property clearly in the hands of the corporation.

5008. You think no distinction can be drawn between this property and that which the City of London possess in other places?—I think not; I see no reason for supposing that there is any distinction. I was about to speak just now of the charters which have been granted to the City of London. The first charter is that of William the Conqueror, which will be found in Mr. Newton's book, translated, I believe, with great accuracy; great pains having been taken that it should be so. The words are somewhat peculiar, and require a little explanation. The original Saxon is given, and the translation immediately follows: "William the King greet William the Bishop and Godfrey the Portreve, "and all the Burghers within London, French and English, friendly. And I make known "to you that I will, that ye be law-worthy, as ye were in the days of King Edward. "And I will, that each child be his father's heir after his father's days. And I will not "suffer that any man command you any wrong." I particularly draw the attention of the Commissioners to this translation, because here it is translated as it ought to be; but in the other translations it is very inaccurately represented, and particularly that expression "law-worthy." "Law-worthy" means, in point of fact, a legalis homo. The effect was to make them free; and of course it is followed immediately afterwards by the provision, that each man shall be his father's heir. When they were not free, but were slaves of any lord, they had no land to inherit and no power of inheritance, neither was any of them what is called a legalis homo—a person capable of all offices in the state, and bound by duty to perform all offices. I draw the attention of the Commissioners to this as showing that the pre-existing rights and customs of the City of London, before the reign of William, are recognised by him as having existed in the reign of King Edward.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5009. This charter creates no corporation; it is merely a declaration that all citizens of London shall be of free condition, that is to say, they shall not be villains or slaves?—That is the effect of it.

5010. And the king promises them some protection?—Yes; it is the earliest recognition there is in the charters of the general rights of the citizens of London. Perhaps, I may observe, that I believe no words of incorporation, in any charter relating to any borough in this kingdom, are to be met with before the reign of Henry VI., when a charter of that kind was first granted to Kingston-upon-Hull; the record of that is in the Tower. I will not detain the Commissioners at any length upon this subject. There are other authorities in existence which show what the meaning of those words were; for instance, there is this, "Hominis Imperatores bonarum legum digni tenebantur." The next charter to which I will refer is one of Henry I., drawn up in this form: "Henry by the Grace "of God," and so on, "know ye that I have granted to my Citizens of London to hold Middlesex to farm for three hundred pounds."

5011. What is the meaning of granting Middlesex to them to farm?—The king of course had all the counties as well as boroughs in his hands—at least his officers accounted to him for the property—a portion of the profits would go through the hands of the sheriff, a portion through the hands of the escheator, and a portion through the hands of the coroner—all those would belong to the king; but it was the custom by many of those charters to grant to parties those districts, and all the profits resulting from them, the grantee paying to the Crown a sum in consequence of it. That sum has been paid by the corporation ever since the reign of Henry I., and is paid at the present day; it is accounted for by the sheriff to the Crown. Passing over the other provisions of the charter, which relate to Sokes, and so on, it proceeds: "I will cause my Citizens to have "their Lands, Premises, Bonds, and Debts, within the City and without. And I will do "them right, by the law of the City, of the lands of which they shall complain to me, and "if any shall take toll." Then follows that part of the charter which relates to foreign attachment, which I read yesterday to the Commissioners; almost all the succeeding charters have the same language. In the reign of Henry II. the charter gives them the pleas of the Crown; "And of the Pleas of the Crown they may discharge themselves "according to the old usage of the City;" "that all the Citizens shall be free of toll." And it provides also for the holding of the Hustings Court, which is one of the courts I mentioned to the Commissioners before. That court is directed to be held on a Monday, which, in point of fact, has been the case: "And that right be done to the Citizens "according to the City." Even in those early days the kings regarded the convenience and enjoyment of the citizens, because the charter concluded by giving them "their "huntings wheresoever they had the same in the time of King Henry my Grandfather." "These aforesaid customs I do grant unto them all their liberties and free customs which "they had in the time of King Henry my Grandfather;" and it states that they are to hold them by inheritance. The charter of Richard I. also states, "We have granted to "them acquittal of Murther, within the City and in Portsoken, and that none of them "may wage battle, and that they may discharge themselves of the Pleas belonging to the "Crown, according to the ancient custom of the City." "Nobody shall take amercia-"ments from them but according to the law of the City, which they had in the time of "King Henry, Grandfather to Henry, our father; and that there be no miskeming in "any plea within the City, and that the Hustings be kept only once a week." It provides that right shall be done to them according to the customs of the City, with other provisions of the same kind. Furthermore, it grants that the "said Customs, and all other liberties "and free Customs which they had in the time of King Henry, Grandfather to Henry our "Father," they may still enjoy. To the next charter, which is in the 8th of Richard I., I should also wish to draw the attention of the Commissioners, because it bears upon a point which will, on another question, be material. It is granting power to the citizens of London to remove weirs from the Thames. "Know ye all that we for the salvation of

" our soul, and for the soul's salvation of King Henry our Father, and all our Ancester's " souls; and also for the common weal of our City of London, and of all our realm, Have " granted, and stedfastly commanded that all Wears that are in the Thames, be moved " wheresoever they shall be within the Thames, and that no wears be put any way within " the Thames. Also we have clearly quit claimed all that which the Keeper of our Tower " of London was wont yearly to receive of the said Wears. Wherefore we will, and " stedfastly command, that no Keeper of the said Tower at any time hereafter, shall exact " anything of any one, neither molest, or burden, or any demand make of any person by " reason of the said Wears; for it is manifest to us, and by our Right Reverend Father " Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, and other our faithful subjects, it is sufficiently " given us to understand that great detriment and discommodity hath grown to our said " City of London, and also to the whole realm, by occasion of the said Wears." The effect of this is, that the erection of wears, which are acts necessarily connected with the soil of the river, were at this time ordered by the king to be carried out by the citizens of London, and all interference of the officer of the Tower of London, who did from time to time try to encroach upon the rights of the citizens of London, is forbidden. He is directed not to " exact anything of any one, neither molest nor burthen, or any demand " make of any person by reason of the said Wears," from which it certainly would appear that at that time the Crown characterized the demands which had been made by their officer as an exaction, and directed that they should not be persevered in, but the weirs should be removed. That, perhaps, may be a consideration hereafter with respect to another matter, but I thought in passing it was better to draw your attention to it.

5012. That charter proves that certain weirs had been erected by the king's officer?—Yes.

5013. The king grants to the City of London an immunity in respect of those weirs; the charter gives them the power of removing the weirs?—It does.

5014. The power of erecting the weirs being in the king?—That act having been done by the keeper of the Tower.

5015. As the king's officer?—Yes; but by usurpation, as it would seem.

5016. What is there to show that it was by usurpation?—Because it desires that they shall first be removed. It says, "No Keeper of the said Tower at any time hereafter " shall exact anything of any one" with respect to those weirs.

5017. It abandons the right. It gives the City of London the power of removing the king's weirs, but is there anything to show that the right did not previously exist?—It appears to me that this is a direction, that if the weirs shall be removed, the king's officer shall not interfere, he having made previous exactions from the parties with respect to them. However, I thought it was my duty to draw your attention to the subject.

5018. Is there anything to show that the right previously was not in the Crown?—There is nothing beyond this charter. I have read the whole of the charter, and it would seem to me that the inference from it is, that it was an illegal act done—an illegal exaction.

5019. Is not the inference rather this: that this was a voluntary abandonment of the right of the Crown?—It does not appear to me to be so. With respect to the other charters, I am very much disinclined to trouble the Commissioners by going through them; but, I will say, that throughout there are repetitions of the same declaration in all the succeeding charters, that the customs of the City of London were to be upheld and maintained. Such declarations are pertinaciously repeated. There is another charter which relates to the weirs; and with respect to that, inasmuch as the citizens of London were conservators of the River Thames, they would have had the power of removing the weirs as a nuisance.

5020. You mean with reference to the navigation, not with reference to the soil of the river?—Not with reference to the soil of the river.

5021.—If that be so, may not it have been possible, that this direction to the City, to remove the weirs at their pleasure, may have had reference to their character as conservators of the river, rather than to any right in the soil?—It certainly appears to me that that was rather a direction to them to disincumber their own property of the weirs which existed.

5022. Was the grant of the conservancy prior to the statute of Richard the First?—It was; the right was enjoyed before that time. I am not aware that I need trouble the Commissioners further with the charters, except for the purpose of making the general observation that the reference to the customs of London, and to their maintenance, proceeds through them all.

5023. Do the charters generally run in the form, "We grant for us our heirs and suc- " cessors," or only "We grant"?—I think generally the grant is, "For us our heirs and " successors."

5024. Can you state what is the earliest charter which contains the grant of the conservancy?—I do not think it is in an early charter.

5025. There is nothing to show that the City were conservators at the time of the charter of Richard?—There is nothing expressly to show it.

5026. Can you describe to the Commissioners the constituency who vote at the elections in common hall?—The persons who vote in common hall are freemen, with the superadded qualification of being liverymen; the liverymen are a portion of the freemen of each company who have been elected,—that is to say, they have the permission to wear the livery of the company; under a variety of sumptuary laws people were prohibited from giving liveries to their servants, and in one of those statutes there is an exemption of all corporations and guilds. Under that exemption they had the power, and exercised it, of appointing liverymen. Many of the companies have had that power, and have exercised it for a long time. They have it under their charters; others have been granted that power by the Court of Aldermen. I have a list of those which have been granted by the Court of Aldermen, and with those the Court of Aldermen still interfere. Applications are made, from time to time, when they want to appoint new liverymen, and permission is given to them by the Court of Aldermen under certain conditions. I have before me a list of admissions of companies to liveries, and the increases which have been made in the number of the livery of several companies, by orders of the Court of Aldermen, from 1725 to 1820. The following is the enumeration of the companies:—felt-makers, clock-makers, needle-makers, tin-plate-workers, wheel-wrights, gun-makers, wire-drawers, ship-wrights, glovers, silk-throwsters, cord-makers, fan-makers, comb-makers, spectacle-makers, horners.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5027. There are certain companies in which the corporation interfere in the formation of the livery?—Yes. The felt-makers received permission to have a livery upon these conditions:—"No member who is of the clothing of any other company to be called on "the livery before he is translated; constant attendance on Lord Mayor on all public "solemnities; not at any time to exceed sixty; their charter and bye-laws to be en-"rolled." The others are in substance the same.

5028. In order that a person should have a right of voting at common hall, it is necessary that he should be a member of a livery company and a freeman of the City?—Quite so. The truth is, the bye-law I referred to yesterday, instead of allowing the right of election in the hall to the freemen generally, restricted it to that class of freemen who were of the liveries of the companies.

5029. In the ward elections it is sufficient that a person should be a freeman without being a member of a company?—A freeman and a resident in the ward. As far as the franchise is concerned, freedom alone is necessary.

5030. Was there ever a time when the whole constituent body of the City, that is to say, including the voters for the wards, were members of the livery companies?—No, the companies, in point of fact, if I may use the expression, are private companies not connected with the municipal government of the City; they are companies existing under their own charters, and for their own particular purposes, originally for the regulation of trade, but having nothing to do, in point of fact, with the municipal government.

3031. Can you point out any inconvenience or evil which would occur if there were but one single franchise for the municipal purposes of the City of London?—I have no hesitation in answering that question. I see no difficulty in it, and I am speaking the views of the corporation themselves upon that subject, because they have been anxious to effect that object, and have done all in their power for the purpose. The Bill which was brought in in 1849 was with that view, and it was passed into a law; but in the House of Lords such alterations were made as prevented it from having the effect which was intended. It did not operate well, great difficulties arose in carrying it out the moment it was passed. When it came to be applied it was found that in some instances, one of which was mentioned yesterday, the voters were lessened by it instead of increased.

5032. There are certain officers of the corporation who are elected in common hall, there are others elected by the Court of Aldermen, and others by the Court of Common Council, are there not?—Yes.

5033. Can you state any ground, either of charter or enactment or of expediency, upon which that distinction has been made?—No. The answer I should give to the question would be the same as the one I gave yesterday; it has rather grown out of circumstances than otherwise. The election in the common hall of the Mayor, the chamberlain, the sheriffs, the bridge masters, the auditors, and the ale conners, are all directed by a particular charter. They are directed to be chosen by the citizens. The election of the recorder is with the aldermen. I imagine that that is because originally the aldermen exercised almost all the powers of the corporation, particularly those connected with the administration of the law, and therefore they appointed their own officer, who was assessor to the Mayor. The other officers are elected by the Common Council as the representatives of the citizens; the common council, having become the effective representative of the corporation, generally took upon themselves of course the election of all those officers whose offices grew up from time to time.

5034. Can you point out any advantage which arises from the election of such officers, as the chamberlain, being in common hall?—In answer to the question asked me yesterday, I made some observations with respect to the elections of the sheriffs, which of course apply also in the same way to the office of chamberlain, and indeed, the other officers who are elected there. My friend, the Common Sergeant, who will be ready to give you evidence upon the subject, is the person who superintends the elections as the adviser of the sheriffs, and he will be able to tell you whether the impression he has of those elections is the same as the one which I mentioned to you yesterday.

5035. Are you aware of any advantage which arises from the election lasting, and the poll being kept open for several days?—I feel bound, as you have alluded to that subject, to state my opinion upon the point of the duration of the poll for seven days. It is done under the authority of the Act of the 11th of George the First, which was expressly passed for the purpose of shortening the elections. The clause says that the election shall not last more than seven days, but by a most extraordinary construction it has been construed to mean that it must last for seven days. I conceive it to be a total misapprehension of the Act under which that has been done. I think I could suggest the reasons of its being done; it probably was in consequence of a decision in a committee under the election laws with respect to the election at Rochester, in which, though there had been a great number of votes taken, and the poll had lasted a great length of time, and every effort had been made to bring in voters, but they did not seem to come—because it was proved that there was one voter upon the poll who did not come in time to vote, the poll being closed after due notice had been given and every precaution taken, by the advice of counsel that election was set aside. I believe a similar case occurred with respect to the election at Bristol. I imagine that the secondaries of the City of London, being the officers entrusted to take the poll, they thought it was dangerous to adopt any mode of giving notice to stop the poll after the decision of those two cases, and therefore they suffered the election to go on for seven days, though it is known that in many instances almost every vote has been given on the first day of the election, and scarcely any given subsequently.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5036. Do you believe it would be competent to the corporation on their own authothority, without going to Parliament, to shorten the duration of the poll?—I should say that the corporation who hold the election, and the secondaries who advise them, would both of them be justified in closing the poll whenever there was a reasonable ground for assuming that other votes were not forthcoming, taking care to give reasonable notice of the day and the hour at which they would close the poll.

5037. You think they might do that without any Bill being passed by the Common Council?—Yes; I think they might do it, and rely upon that step being upheld by any Court.

5038 Do you think that an enactment on the part of the Common Council would give any additional security to those officers?—I think either an Act of the common council or a resolution of the common council, would be an additional justification to the officers for so acting, though I believe they would be perfectly justified without it.

5039. You think it is desirable that those polls should not last the time they do at present?—There is no doubt about it; and it was the intention of the corporation to carry out a measure for shortening them.

5040. It has been stated to us that corrupt practices have prevailed at some of the City elections to a considerable extent, and that that is partly owing to a prevalent opinion that the same laws with regard to bribery and corrupt practices which exist for the elections of members of Parliament do not apply to the elections of municipal officers. Are you able to make any statement to us upon that point?—None, except that I think that that is quite true. The Acts of Parliament particularly levelled against bribery are confined to Parliamentary elections; but there is the common law, and I imagine such an offence as receiving a bribe with reference to an election which is for any public purpose must be within the reach of the common law.

5041. Do you recollect any person being convicted at common law for such an offence?—No; the elections have generally been elections of members of Parliament, and there the statute applies.

5042. There have been contests for offices of emolument and importance in the City, where there appears too much reason to suppose there has been to a certain extent the prevalence of corrupt practices. Has there ever been any case brought before a court of justice in reference to those practices?—I think not. Recently there have been cases of personation brought before the courts. I believe the persons acquiesced in the judgment against them, and upon expressing their contrition for what they had done they were let off.

5044. Do you mean where there have been instances of personation?—And also I think in cases of bribery; a considerable reward was offered to any person who would come forward and state cases of bribery. Actual instances were found in which there had been both bribery and personation, and both the courts of the City did the best in their power to direct that the matter should be enquired into; because, although it is quite true that a general impression has existed that bribery has been committed on those occasions, the Commissioners must be well aware of the difficulty of proving the cases, and if there has been any abstinence from prosecutions, it has been upon that ground, and not from any reluctance on the part of the Court of Aldermen or the corporation generally, to apply their funds to the prosecution of offences of that description.

5,045. You think the Court of Aldermen do consider it a public duty, as far as they can, to maintain the purity of the City elections for municipal offices?—I assure you, that again and again the strougest possible declarations and denunciations have been uttered by both courts against these proceedings, and it is a thing of which they complain constantly, they feeling themselves injuriously affected by the existence of such practices.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

13th Jan. 1854.

5046. I am afraid those endeavours have not been altogether attended with success? —Far from it; I am sure the solicitor will be able to tell you the difficulty which he has found in collecting evidence upon those subjects.

5047. Do you think those protracted polls have any tendency to increase the expense of elections, and to give rise to bribery and corrupt practices?—I have no doubt that a protracted poll of itself increases the expenses, but I think the poll is, if anything, rather a correction with respect to bribery and corruption, because the bribery and corruption is very often applied to persons who have no right of voting at all, but who are persons who come to the hall and get in improperly, and hold up their hands and conduct themselves as if they were liverymen, not being so; the moment the poll is demanded, all that is put an end to, except in cases of direct personation, where one individual personates another. Then also I ought to say, that perhaps the first and second day of the poll do increase the temptation to bribery. A vote is thought to be more valuable, and then those person who are ready to receive bribes or who are ready to personate other individuals, press themselves upon the candidates. I only meant to qualify my answer so far that the poll generally has a tendency to check the practice, except with that reservation.

5048. Does not it happen in City elections, as is notoriously the case in Borough elections, that the portion of the electors who are disposed to receive bribes, hang back to the last, and then attempt to sell their votes at a high price when the numbers are pretty evenly balanced?—I have no doubt it is the case as was stated by Mr. Scott, the day before yesterday, that there are a certain number of persons who hold back in that way. To such persons the continuance of the poll affords an increased facility, but I think the general effect of a poll is to alarm them, and particularly now the corporation have expressed their dissatisfaction at that which has been brought to their notice distinctly.

5049. If there were one list of electors for all municipal purposes, and that list were carefully revised, would not that have the effect of diminishing personation at all events? —I have no doubt about it.

5050. That system might be altogether put an end to by a proper list being kept?— By vigilance and perseverance, and its being distinctly understood that persons would be punished who committed the offence, I have no doubt that would mitigate the evil.

5051. Is there any authentic register now of the voters, either in common hall or in the wards?—Under the Act of Parliament which I have referred to, there is a provision for making a municipal list, and if that Act had been effective for all its purposes, no doubt the good which the question contemplates, would have been to a certain degree ob tained. This is the provision in the 12th and 13th of Victoria, "Be it enacted, that on "the 1st day of November in every year, the aldermen and common councilmen of "each ward shall make or cause to be made out an alphabetical list of all persons who "shall be entitled to vote as freemen occupiers under this Act;" the previous clauses having specified the qualifications, "such list to be duly signed by the alderman of the "ward; and the ward clerk shall keep a true copy of such list, to be perused by any per- "son, without payment of any fee, at all reasonable hours between the first and fifteenth "days of November in every year, and shall at all times deliver a written or printed copy "of such list to any person requiring the same, on payment of a reasonable price for each "copy; and the said list shall be the list of freemen occupiers entitled to vote, after the "passing of this Act, at any election for aldermen or common councilmen, or ward officers "for any ward." It is obvious that all this taking place under the eye of the inhabitants of the ward where the parties are generally known to each other, personation is not likely to be committed there, nor do I believe that bribery takes place at all. I think you have had that stated in evidence'; if not, it is my duty to state, that at those wardmote elections I believe bribery and personation are very rare; either by the circumstance of the persons attending the wardmote being known in that ward, or by the operation of this Act, I think an entire stop has been put to them in the wards. The same probably would be the case if the qualification were the same for voting at common hall, but I cannot abstain from observing that one of the great difficulties at common hall is, that the liverymen of the different companies are not known to the corporate officers, they are elected in the liveries, many of them living at a distance out of town; those are all ingredients which would give facility both for bribery and personation.

5052. Is there any authentic list of the liverymen who vote at common hall?—None at all in the possession of the corporation; whether there are any lists in the possession of the respective companies I do not know, but I should presume that in all well regulated companies, there are lists.

5053. When a man presents himself and tenders his vote at a contested election at common hall, is there any authentic list to which the poll clerk can refer to ascertain whether he is entitled to vote?—None I believe.

5054. Do you believe that the circumstance of electors living at a distance, having a right to vote at the City elections, has a tendency to increase the expense and the possibility of personation?—I have no doubt it has a tendency to increase the expense, and I have no doubt also it has a tendency to increase the possibility of personation, and it operates as a considerable inducement or opportunity for bribery on the one hand, as on the other to a certain extent it would have a tendency to check bribery; inasmuch as if non-resident voters were brought up in large quantities, the votes of the resident persons who are at all disposed to be bribed, would be neutralized and rendered of less value. Perhaps that is a remote contingency; but it is one.

5055. In the event of one general electoral franchise being adopted for all municipal purposes in the City of London, have you any objection to state any opinion which you may have formed as an individual as to what the electoral franchise ought to be?—I have generally abstained from expressing opinions; but I can have no hesitation in expressing one upon that subject; because the corporation have themselves expressed an opinion in the Bill which they brought in, in 1851.

5056. Will you have the goodness to inform us what were the proceedings of the corporation with respect to the promotion of the Bill of 1851?—For a great length of time, committees of different descriptions had been appointed in the corporation of London to consider this subject, and those committees had made different suggestions; but before this Bill was presented to Parliament there was another committee appointed, and that committee went item by item into everything which had been before suggested to the corporation as the basis of a Bill. In conferences of that kind, some had strong objections to one view of the subject, and some to another. Eventually they agreed in the adoption of a certain number of propositions which are embodied in this Bill.

5057.—The plan of the Bill was adopted by a committee of the council after much consideration?—Yes; I think also with the assistance of a committee of aldermen.

5058. Was the plan ever formally adopted by the common council as a whole or by the court of aldermen?—The Bill was laid before the common council and presented to Parliament with the sanction of the common council.

5059. When the Bill was brought before Parliament it embodied the views of the entire corporation?—No doubt it was the decision of the majority of the body.

5060. Will you have the goodness to state what were the leading provisions of the Bill?—The preamble recites the 11th of George the First, which is the stumbling-block which has always stood in the way; it recites that other Act of Parliament which I have just noticed, the 12th and 13th Victoria, and it recites, "whereas it is expedient that the said Acts should be repealed, except as hereinafter mentioned. And whereas in the City of London a custom has prevailed and bye-laws have been made that no person not being free of the said City shall keep any shop or place for putting to show or sale any or certain wares or merchandize by way of retail or otherwise, or use any or certain trades, occupations, mysteries, or handicrafts for hire, gain, or sale, within the same: And whereas the Mayor, aldermen, and commons of the City of London in common council assembled, considering that the said ancient custom and bye-laws are injurious to occupiers within the said City, not being free of the said City, and are in restraint of trade, are desirous that the said custom and bye-laws shall cease and be repealed: And whereas the Mayor and commonalty and citizens of London are seised of or entitled to tolls on carts and other carriages belonging to non freemen conveying goods into or out of the said City of London, and on carts and other carriages belonging to freemen conveying goods of non freemen into or out of the said City, which are payable or are collected at the several bars of the said City of London, or at the places where such bars formerly stood, and the corporation are willing to give up the same." The first provision is for the repeal of the 11th of George the First. The second is as to the right of voting at elections, "that from and after the passing of this Act every freeman and every male person of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, who shall have occupied within the said City or the liberties thereof for the period of a year and a day next previous to the first day of September in any year, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons, any house, ware-house, counting-house, office, chambers for business, or shop, and shall, in the case of a sole occupation, be rated in respect of such premises, in his own name, on or to an amount of not less than ten pounds per annum, or in case of a joint occupation, be rated in the several names of the occupiers on or to an amount which, when divided by the number of occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than ten pounds per annum for each and every such occupier to the police rate for the City of London, in respect of such premises, shall, whilst continuing to occupy the same, if on the list herein-after directed to be made, be entitled to vote in any election for alderman, or common councilman, or ward officer, in the ward in which such premises shall be situate, and also at any election for Mayor, sheriffs, chamberlain, bridge-masters, auditors of chamberlain's and bridge-masters' accounts, and for any and every other officer now chosen in and for the said City by the livery-men thereof; and it shall not be necessary for any freeman, or for any person entitled to vote as aforesaid, to take up his livery, or to be admitted a livery-man, in order to qualify himself to vote at any such election."

5061. If that Act had passed, there would have been, in fact, but one constituent body for all civic purposes, with the qualification which you have stated?—That is the effect of it.

5062. That electoral franchise is not the same as the one adopted by Parliament for the boroughs of England generally, is it?—I think it is rather more extensive.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

13th Jan. 1854.

5063. Do you believe that it includes more people?—Yes; it would include more people.

5064. It fixes a limit of 10*l.*, does not it?—Yes; I dare say the Commissioners are aware that an occupation of 10*l.* in the City of London is, in fact, no restraint whatever. The commonest room in a house would let for 10*l.* a-year.

5065. If no mention had been made of any sum, but the clause had merely said the constituency should be occupiers, paying rent and taxes, it would have come to the same thing, you think?—Except that it is required that they shall be rated to the police rate; it was found practically that 10*l.* was the lowest sum that would ever be rated to the police rate. The object is to give some ready test whether a man was a proper person to be admitted.

5066. You think except for that purpose the mention of 10*l.* would be mere surplusage?—It is almost that; it is surplusage in effect; a room without a bed or any furniture in it would cost 10*l.* a-year.

5067. Do you mean that the clause introduced into this bill was preferred to the clause in the general Municipal Reform Act, because it extended the franchise more widely?—Yes; that was the intention.

5068. Do you think except for that object there would have been, on the part of the corporation, any objection to the simple adoption of the clause, as it stands in the Municipal Reform Act?—I believe it was considered by a committee after due deliberation that the clause in the general Act hardly applied to the description of persons which they were desirous to include in the franchise in the City of London. The Commissioners must be well aware that one very important class of persons in the City of London consists of those who hold a single room for the purpose of an office or a counting-house; perhaps one single house would be occupied by fifteen or sixteen people, and this clause is rather drawn with reference to that state of things in the City of London, than with reference to the general clause applicable all over the country.

5069. Is there anything in any of those enactments with reference to the distance at which voters may reside?—Residence is not at all mentioned; they must occupy premises, and those must be within the walls, and must be rated to the police-rate. The principle upon which the bill is constructed is, that they shall be at liberty to reside where they will, it being the well-known habit of almost everybody in the city of London to reside out of London and in the suburbs.

5070. Was that distinction adopted with reference to the peculiar nature of the occupancy in the City of London which consists so much of persons who live at a distance, but where business is transacted in the City?—Yes; the clause was drawn certainly with reference to that particular distinction. The object was to increase the constituency; to give the fullest qualification that would be consistent with the habits and every-day transactions of the people in the City.

5071. Have you any notion what the number of the constituency would have been if this bill had passed into a law?—No; I do not think that has been ascertained. I gave in yesterday a list of voters and of householders; but that was made under the Act of Parliament 12th and 13th Victoria.

5072. Was there any other important provision in the bill?—The others may be regarded as subsidiary enactments.

5073. Will you tell us how that Bill came to be defeated?—Really, it is very difficult to say. The cause of its being lost was the active opposition of several of the livery companies. They determined to oppose it, and did so strenuously. All the officers of the corporation who could prove the facts contained in the preamble were called as witnesses, and they stated the difficulties of the election by the liverymen, and all the circumstances connected with it; and matters of that kind were gone into. I must confess I was present all the time, and it did appear to me that the preamble was proved beyond all possible controversy, and therefore, however here might be a question as to the detail of the bill, and the alterations necessary to be made in it, the preamble, I should have thought, was proved; but upon the ordinary process of our being turned out of the room, and called in again, to the astonishment I think of everybody, it was declared that the preamble was not proved.

5074. The result was that the bill, being a private bill, was referred to a select committee of the House of Commons, and that committee found that the preamble was not proved?—Yes.

5075. That was in the session of 1852?—Yes.

5076. Would not this bill have been what is called a hybrid bill, partly public and partly private, or was it altogether a private bill?—It was dealt with I think as a private bill. Notices were given for it as such.

5077. Since that bill was rejected I presume no steps have been taken by the corporation with respect to the constituency?—The corporation were, no doubt, extremely sorry that this bill did not pass. The constituency was so gradually being reduced that they felt they were bound to take some steps to increase it. The course which had been adopted before had been that of obliging people to take up their freedom, and they therefore fell back upon the transactions which had been taken with respect to that measure. They had all the returns of the inquest juries of persons residing in the different wards who were not freemen, and they being brought before them, they desired that a certain portion out of each ward should be selected in order to begin the proceedings, and see whether they would be effectual or not. Such a selection was made with extreme caution, in order to avoid all poor persons, to whom the payment of the small sum now necessary for obtaining freedom might be inconvenient, and more inconvenient than having a vote might be an advantage to them. They were all avoided. Others were selected; two, I think, from each ward, in order that it might be done with perfect indifference, and those persons the chamberlain was directed to summon. He did so. He heard their cases. The moment a person said it was not convenient for him to do it at that moment, or made an excuse of poverty, or any other valid excuse, that was attended to, and eventually, proceedings were taken only against a few, those proceedings being thought to be necessary in order to satisfy the public that there was a right of doing it if it was insisted on. Of the persons against whom those actions were brought, as the commissioners heard the other day, a considerable portion took up their freedom immediately, and others were proceeded against. There was one instance of a person who persevered to the last, and whose property was taken. I believe I should be justified in saying that that individual was rather anxious to be a martyr; he is a person who, I believe, could have paid the money without difficulty; at least, so I am informed, for I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5078. The effect of the bill would have been, to deprive the livery companies of their monopoly of the elections at common hall?—That would have been simply the effect of it.

5079. They would have lost nothing; but others would have been entitled to vote at those elections?—Their votes would have been mingled with those of a larger class of people than they had been before.

5080. Supposing a liveryman happened not to come under the description of the new franchise, he would not then have had a right to vote as a liveryman?—Supposing he resided away from the City, and had no occupation within City, he would have lost his vote.

5081. Do you think there would have been any misfortune in that?—None at all. On the contrary, I should conceive it to be exceedingly difficult for a non-resident liveryman to support his right to vote at all.

5082. You stated that there were only a few persons proceeded against for the purpose of obliging them to take up their freedom. Were not there a great many afterwards proceeded against?—I observe, in the evidence before you, there has been a misapprehension in that respect. A witness spoke of the proceedings against them, and of that step being the first step of the proceeding. It was, in fact, nothing but a summons from the chamberlain for them to come forward and show why they did not take up their freedom.

5083. Do you know what number of threats of this description was issued?—I do not know that they can be called threats, because this is the ordinary mode of proceeding, and is not regarded at all as a threat.

5084. It was a hint, was not it, if not a threat?—It was, no doubt, a hint, and intended to be so. It must always be remembered that persons who are not freemen are, to a certain extent, carrying on their trade to the disparagement of those who are.

5085. Do you know to what extent, in point of number, those notices were issued?—There were a great many.

5086. Do you mean thousands?—I really do not know. I am so little acquainted with the number at this moment, that I should be afraid to mention it, lest I should overstate it or understate it, but there were a great number. The whole case was put in a course of inquiry in what I may call an amicable suit with Mr. Sturt. The Court of Aldermen had previously directed the chamberlain to abstain from summoning them. The Court of Common Council did the same. But when this bill was lost the ordinary course of proceedings was adopted. Of course there had been an arrear of persons who had failed to take up their freedom, and the number presented by the jury was very great. Of course there is a difficulty in making a selection, which would appear to be invidious, except it was on the score of poverty, in which case directions were given to abstain from proceeding further.

5087. I suppose those notices were issued without any distinction being made between rich and poor, were not they?—I imagine they were; but when the committee met together, they had to select some persons to be proceeded against. A common councilman of each ward, who would know them, was placed on the committee. It was said, for instance, John Thomas is a poor man, it will not do to proceed against him; and his name was passed over; and so on.

5088. Do not you think it is rather an objectionable mode of proceeding to constitute yourselves judges whether a man can afford to pay or not?—I can venture to say that it was never done in a single instance in which it was not charitably and beneficially intended. The duty was necessarily cast upon them, but the anxiety of the corporation was not to proceed against such parties.

5089. The object of proceeding against persons to compel them to take up their freedom, after the loss of that bill, was not with a view to raise money, but with a view to increase the constituency?—It is quite clear that it was not for the purpose of raising money. At that very time, all the fines which could be taken off with propriety had been taken off, and what was left was transferred to purposes of charity, and was not suffered to go into the corporate funds.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5090. Still that would not effect the object that the Act was intended to effect, because it would not bring into the constituency a vast number of persons who merely occupied shops, but were not resident?—Quite so; it would not do that. The words of the Act 12th & 13th Vict., were "shall occupy within the said City, or the liberties thereof, either "solely or jointly with any other person or persons, any house, warehouse, counting-"house, office, chambers, or shop."

5091. Without requiring residence?—Being a freeman, the probability is that he would be resident.

5092. If the bill had not been thrown out, but had passed into a law, it would almost have done away with the necessity of any man taking up his freedom?—It would have done away with the necessity of it for the purpose of the franchise, and that was the intention. The corporation were really anxious to do all they could to increase the constituency, and to relieve trade from any supposed interference with it, by requiring persons to be freemen, leaving the question respecting the freemen as open as possible.

5093. Do you suppose that the opposition of the companies did not merely rest upon the object of the bill being to deprive their freemen of the monopoly of the City franchise, but also because it would have operated to take away one inducement to persons to take up their livery, and so diminish their income?—It might be so.

5094. Do not you think that that operated upon their mind quite as strongly as the alteration of the franchise?—I do not really know, and have no inclination to say what were their motives. I dare say that formed an ingredient.

5095. Can you tell us whether that bill would have disfranchised a considerable number of the liverymen; that is to say, are there a considerable number of liverymen who are not occupiers under the description of that bill?—I imagine a great many. I speak with little actual knowledge, but I imagine there are a great many companies, the bulk of whose liverymen live out of London, in all parts of the country.

5096. That bill would have had a double operation upon the livery with respect to the franchise. It would have admitted freemen, not liverymen, to vote at common hall elections, and it would have disfranchised liverymen who were not occupiers?—It would.

5097. Would that bill have affected the Parliamentary constituency of the City in any way?—The Act of 12th & 13th Victoria, I believe, makes the Parliamentary registration necessary; the bill did not do so.

5098. At present the liverymen vote for members of Parliament, do not they, under certain circumstances?—Yes.

5099. Will you state what is the relation of the Parliamentary franchise to the municipal franchise, so far as the livery is concerned?—No doubt it would be a different class of persons, in some few instances, who would vote on the Parliamentary register, from those who would vote on the municipal register.

5100. Can you state what portion of the liverymen of the companies are upon the Parliamentary register?—I cannot state that. I have no means of knowledge. I have before me the Parliamentary register, and it is exceedingly difficult for any one to find out how many voters there actually are. There is a separate return of the householders and of the liverymen in the different companies, but many are both. Some of them have different residences in the different wards, and they are again repeated 5101. Would the disfranchisement of the liverymen for municipal purposes affect the Parliamentary register?—Not at all.

5102. The two are quite distinct, are they?—Quite distinct, except that the Act of 12th and 13th Victoria, certainly made the Parliamentary qualification a portion of the municipal qualification. There is to be a rating "of not less than 10*l.* per annum for each and "every such occupier, to the police or any other rate; and a registry in the register of "voters for the City of London in use at elections for members to serve in Parliament." It was, therefore, necessary that the occupiers specified here should be also upon the Parliamentary register. That was introduced, and it was thought a great disparagement of the Act.

5103. Is there any instance in which the Parliamentary qualification depends upon the municipal qualification?—I imagine none at all. The Parliamentary register does operate upon the municipal register, but I believe there is no operation the other way.

5104. No alteration of the municipal franchise would affect the Parliamentary franchise?—I think I can give a distinct answer to that question; that according to my knowledge it would not.

5105. In dealing with the municipal franchise, we may be sure that we are not affecting the Parliamentary franchise?—I should say certainly you would not affect it in any way, except that if this bill had been passed, instead of the previous Act, the necessity of being upon the Parliamentary register would have been put an end to; and so far the Parliamentary register would have been affected.

5106. It would affect the relation of the Parliamentary register to the municipal franchise, but not the converse?—Quite so.

5107. That bill, if it had passed, would have conferred the franchise upon persons who were occupiers in London, but not freemen?—Quite so.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5108. Is there any other clause in that bill which would have exempted persons, who were carrying on business in London, but were not freemen, from being liable to be sued under the bye-laws for so doing?—Yes; because one of the objects of the bill was, to put an end to those bye-laws. The preamble states "And whereas in the City of London a "custom has prevailed and bye-laws have been made, that no person not being free of the "said city shall keep any shop or place for putting to show or sale any or certain wares "or merchandise, by way of retail or otherwise, or use any or certain trades, occupations, "mysteries, or handicrafts for hire, gain, or sale within the same. And whereas the "mayor, aldermen, and commons of the City of London, in common council assembled, "considering that the said ancient custom and bye-laws are injurious to occupiers within "the said City, not being free of the said City, and are in restraint of trade, are desirous "that the said custom and bye-laws shall cease and be repealed."

5109. The bill would have destroyed the necessity of parties becoming freemen of London altogether?—It would have destroyed the necessity for it. It would have been optional with them to have become so if they thought fit, as many do from other considerations. I ought to state to the Commissioners, that since this has occurred a vexatious proceeding upon another portion of those bye-laws, which required that persons should not employ servants who were not freemen, has taken place. The Court of Common Council immediately interposed, and referred it to a committee. That committee met and reported, and the bye-laws, as far as that part of it is concerned, will be put an end to by an Act of the common council, the bill having been ordered to be prepared.

5110. What will be the effect of that?—It will put an end to all proceedings of that description. The bye-law had been used vexatiously.

5111. You are referring to the case in which some complaint was made to the Commissioners by the butchers?—I am. The cause which led to that complaint will be put an end to by the passing of this bill.

5112. When that bill is passed will it be competent to the butchers or any other tradesmen in the City of London to employ under them any one whom they think fit, even if he is not a freeman?—Certainly; that is the object of it, and also to shield a tradesman so employing him from the penalties which were imposed by that bye-law.

5113. There will, then, remain no power in any company to restrict a tradesman living in the City of London from employing any person whom he may think fit?—I do not know how that is; it depends upon the charters of the different companies, and bye-laws applicable to them. I do not believe that such a power exists, or, if they have it I do not believe it is exercised now at all; however, it would not be in the power of the corporation, nor could they promote or prevent it. The corporation, I believe, have done all they can to remove any cause of complaint which exists.

5114. Can you explain to us the origin of the rights of the city with respect to metage and porterage?—Yes; the right will be found properly described in the Charter of James the First, and it is subsequently repeated in the Charter of Charles, and after that it was confirmed by Parliament. As the right was stated most distinctly in the coal Act, it may be most convenient for me to draw your attention to that Act. This is an Act of Parliament which was passed in the 1st and 2d of William the Fourth, chapter 76, for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in the City of London and Westminster, and in certain parts of the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, Essex, and so on. After many provisions regulating the subject of coals, there is this clause. It should be distinctly understood that the duty which is paid on coals was heretofore a fee, paid to the Corporation of London in consequence of their having the right of measuring all articles within the port.

5115. It was a metage due upon coals originally?—It was a sum paid for the measuring of coals.

5116. It was in the nature of a commutation then?—It was in the nature of a commutation under this Act. The Act provides that there shall be a new market, and it puts an end to the old market, and then it says:—"Be it further enacted, that for the purpose of "defraying the charges and expenses of such market, and of the purchase of the tenements "and hereditaments hereby authorized to be purchased, and of erecting and supporting "convenient buildings thereon, and for defraying the salaries and allowances of the "several clerks and other persons employed in the execution of this Act, and for defraying "the other charges and expenses of carrying the same into execution, and for paying the "compensations hereinafter directed or authorized to be made, and the monies hereinafter "authorized to be borrowed or raised, and the interest thereof, and for creating a fund "for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, it shall be lawful for the said mayor, aldermen, "and commons, in common council assembled, to demand and take, or cause to be "demanded and taken, of and from every master of a ship or vessel laden with coals, "cinders, or culm, or other person having the care or command thereof, arriving at her "moorings within any part of the Port of London at or to the westward of Gravesend, "the sum of one penny per ton."

5117. The effect of that is, to impose a duty upon coals and culm?—For the purpose of establishing that market. That market has been established, and the City of London, upon a recent occasion, when those duties were before Parliament, abandoned their claim to that penny. The expenses of the market had not been quite paid off, but they were in such a situation that the corporation felt themselves justified in abandoning that penny. The Government thought it was expedient to continue the duty, and they now receive it for the purpose of applying it to public improvements. The 60th clause is this: "And whereas, by a charter of His Majesty King James the 1st, bearing date the 20th "day of August, in the third year of his reign, after reciting that the Mayor and commonalty and citizens of London, from all the time whereof the memory of man was not to "the contrary, had had and exercised, and ought and had been accustomed to have and "exercise, the office of bailiff and the conservancy of the water of Thames, to be exercised "and occupied by the Mayor of the City aforesaid for the time being during the time "of his mayoralty or by his sufficient deputies, in, upon, and about the same water of "Thames (to wit) from the bridge of the town of Staines, in the county of Middlesex, "westward to London Bridge, and thence to a certain place called Yendall," and so on "had had and taken, and ought and had been accustomed to have and take, to their own "use, by the Mayor of the City aforesaid for the time being, during the time of his "mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, all the wages, rewards, fees, and profits per-"taining and belonging to the same office of bailiff; and also reciting that the same "Mayor and commonalty and citizens, from all the time aforesaid, had had and "exercised, and ought and had been accustomed to have and exercise the office of "measurer and the measuring of all and singular coals, and grains of every kind, and "also of all kinds of salt, and all kinds of apples, pears, plums, and other fruits whatso-"ever, and of all eatable roots of every kind, and also of onions, and of all other "merchandises, wares, and things whatsoever measurable, and the measuring of the "same whatsoever, landing, conveyed, and brought in or to the port of the said City of "London upon the said water of Thames," and so on "exercising and occupying the "same office of measurer, and the measuring aforesaid by the Mayor of the City afore-"said for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, "and also by all the same time had had and taken, and ought and had been accustomed "to have and take, to their own use by the Mayor of the City aforesaid for the time "being, during the time of his mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, all the wages, "rewards, fees, and profits to the same office of measurer belonging and appertaining, "and nevertheless the same Mayor and commonalty and citizens, then a short time "ago were disturbed therein and were unjustly hindered," and so on. Then it goes on to confirm this prescriptive right to the office of measurer, and the fees resulting from it to be applied to the use of the City itself.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5118. It appears to be quite clear that King James recognized the existence of the right of measuring those different articles?—Yes, as a prescriptive right; and it is equally clear that this Act of Parliament confirms both.

5119. Are the dues charged for metage reasonable?—I imagine that, to a certain extent, they are reasonable. I qualify that by saying to a certain extent, because the matter is now under the consideration of the corn trade on the one hand, and the corporation the other, whether some arrangement may not be made which would have the effect at least of making them more conveniently collected and more simply imposed than they are at present. Of course, being a prescriptive right, it has been exercised in a particular manner by the corporation, and the corporation have been advised, as no doubt is the case, that they cannot make an alteration in that prescriptive right, and be secure as to the receipt of what is due to them for the future, without an Act of Parliament.

5120. Those metage dues are not merely a payment for services performed, I apprehend, but are charged as a tax upon all goods that come within the port of London, whether they are measured or not. Is not that the case?—I think that is not quite a true view of it. I was about to say, that this matter was under the consideration of the corporation and the corn trade, and all other persons interested either have been or will be consulted upon the subject, the view of the corporation being to relieve the trade from any unnecessary embarrassment.

5121. How was the amount of the dues fixed?—The amount of the dues has been fixed, as it necessarily would, be by usage.

5122. Has it ever been regulated by acts of the common council?—I think in some degree it has been regulated by acts of the common council. I was about to state that the dues have varied upon different articles, and they are collected to a different extent upon different articles; so much upon British corn, and so much upon foreign corn. Some of the dues are upon light corn and some upon heavy corn, and there are as many as fifteen different modes of charge which have arisen from the new cargoes which have been brought in and the new arrangement of the dues. The object at present is, to simplify all that, to bring it to one plain charge to be made upon all articles, and to have it paid by the seller, instead of some being paid by the seller and some by the buyer, which leads to great inconvenience. In truth the object is, to put it upon such a footing as that, it will be agreeable to the trade, and moderately remunerative to the corporation.

5123. Do you conceive that this grant was made to the City in order to enable them to raise a revenue, or for convenience to the public, by providing a class of meters whose honesty and accuracy could be relied on?—I have no doubt whatever that the latter was the object, and not the former. It was not intended for the purpose of giving a revenue to the corporation, but the office was given, as all offices of that kind are, by the Crown, in order that the duty which properly belongs to the Crown should devolve upon some individual who would carry it out. I imagine that the principle upon which those grants were at all times made was that the duty should be performed,and of course the expenses connected with the duty met, and also a profitable surplus should be left in the hands of the grantee of the Crown. The grantee of the Crown is an officer substituted to perform duties which otherwise would belong to the Crown. It has been in early times, in almost all countries, the duty of the sovereign to look to the execution of certain offices; that of measuring and weighing is at all times of most essential importance to the public, and was always superintended by the King, through the means of officers doing the act, or in presence of his beam and scale; first, in order that the duties to the King should be correctly ascertained, and, next, that justice should be done between buyer and seller.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5124. You consider that, primarily, this grant was intended for the convenience of the public, but that a reasonable remuneration was given to the City for their trouble in executing the duty?—Yes.

5125. How do you reconcile with that view the claim which the City make to compel persons to submit to the measurement, whether they desire it or not?—Because such a measurement was essential to the interests of the Crown; in the first instance, there being certain duties to be paid, and, next, because in all these matters general rules are laid down which do not except particular cases. The duty attaches to the execution of the office whenever the officer attends to perform his duties and has with him the proper means for discharging those duties, namely, the bushel and the shovel, and so on, and tenders himself to perform them.

5126. There are certain cases where the importer finds it necessary that his goods should be measured; there are certain other cases where it is necessary that the goods should be measured for the use of the Crown, in order that the duty may be imposed; but when goods are imported from another part of the kingdom, and are not subject therefore to duty, and the owner is aware of the quantity of those goods from his own measurement, and does not wish that they should be re-measured, is that a case to which you conceive this general rule ought to apply?—First of all that is a question of law which is now pending, and it would not become me to express my opinion here with respect to a matter pending before a court of law; it is sufficient to say that that question is raised.

5127. That question has been raised by the City itself, has not it?—The City has demanded the toll under such circumstances. In answer to the question, and in order to apply it to the facts, I ought to say that I believe that mode of carrying on trade, is comparatively speaking, of a modern date; almost all corn and grain and articles which came into the port were those which did either, with respect to the duty payable to the Crown, or with respect to the interest of buyer and seller, require to be measured. Of late years persons have made their own arrangements for the facility of their own trade. They have, for instance, either raised their own corn in the country, or bought it in the country, or partly manufactured it into malt, instead of leaving it in its natural state, and they have brought it up to London for their own consumption. It is a new case of that kind which has led to the same question between the City and Messrs. Combe and Delafield; they claim to be exempted from the toll on that ground. The City, on the other hand, say, We have always received this, and it is our duty as far as our constituents are concerned, to maintain our right. But I ought not to allow that to stand without saying that that is one of the very subjects which is under consideration at this moment; and if a new trade of that kind has sprung up and is extensive, and the old law with respect to it seems to be inapplicable to it, I believe, for I have heard the opinion expressed in the corporation, that they are ready to consider that subject, and I believe they will make such arrangements as will be satisfactory to the trade.

5128. In the mean time that case has led to very long and expensive litigation?—It has; almost all those questions do lead to long and expensive litigation.

5129. Do you conceive it is possible to justify the maintenance of any of those exclusive trade privileges, except upon the supposition that they are beneficial to the trade?—I have no doubt of this, that if one were to consider the practical utility of them upon the mere question of expediency, a vast number of rights would be put in peril. But as far as this particular matter is concerned, I am quite sure the corporation are ready to entertain it; and I have no conception that they will insist upon anything which is injurious to trade or generally injurious to the public.

5130. Do not you think it reasonable that those privileges should be considered not as the private property of the corporation, but as a trust for the benefit of the trade, and should be either modified or repealed, as the case may be, according as the interest of trade may seem to suggest?—I fear that that is such a very wide field of inquiry and introduces so many considerations, that one is very likely to be misled by what may be supposed to be the pursuit of reason into doing practical injustice to those who have titles to property. The first thing to be done, I should say, would be, for the person in possession of the right to be appealed to, and for it to be ascertained whether he will consent to such an abandonment of those rights which are inapplicable to the present state of things. I am sure the corporation of London are ready to do that; but they do not feel justified, and I do not think it should be expected of them, that in the first instance they should abandon the right which they have exercised; if the law decides that they have not got it, there is an end of the question. If, on the other hand, a remonstrance is made to them, such as is made at present by the trade upon this subject, I am confident the corporation will entertain the consideration, and will do willingly of themselves that which equity and justice, I may add, almost, reason, may require.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5131. You state that the primary object of granting those privileges to the corporation of London was for the benefit of the trade of London. You said that, at the same time, there was a wish to remunerate the City of London for any functions which were imposed upon them. Do not you think, as the condition of trade alters, it would be reasonable to reconsider the subject, and to take as the rule, and as the only rule, in making regulations in these matters for the future, what should be the interest of that trade of the metropolis which the corporation is bound to protect and encourage?—I have stated what I believe to be the impression of the corporation of London; but, holding the office that I do, and representing to a certain degree the rights of the City, I do not feel myself justified in making an admission that there is any right whatsoever to take away this privilege from the corporation of London, without making ample compensation to them for it. That would be the the proper view of the subject. If the King has at any time granted an office to individuals, and the execution of that office is found to be practically injurious to the public, and Parliament, in its wisdom should think fit to interfere with it, it has been an invariable practice at all times to give compensation for such an interference with vested rights. But I wish to add to that observation, that that which could not be effected by right, without compensation might be easily conceded by the City; and I say, again, I am sure I know so far the feelings of the corporation as to affirm that the moment a reasonable and equitable case is made out to them, their claim of compensation will not be that upon which they will stand as a matter of right, but they will yield to that which may be thought to be for the benefit of the public.

5132. Putting aside the question of compensation to individuals whose personal or private interests might be affected by any alteration, are you disposed to put the pecuniary right of a corporation to emoluments derived from the exercise of a function of this description, which was given to that corporation for the benefit of trade, upon the same footing upon which you would put their right to any estate which they might possess?—I must confess that I can see no possible distinction; it either is a right or it is not a right. If it is a right, it is as much a right in the corporation as it would be in the hands of anybody else. There are a vast number of offices all over the kingdom, which are granted in the same way. I should not regard this as a thing granted to the corporation only for the benefit of trade. I hold it is a duty to be performed by the Crown, entrusted to particular individuals to execute, and they have to discharge the duty and take from it the profit, whatever it may be. There are many rights of a similar description belonging to corporations as well as individuals, which are exactly in the same predicament.

5133. Are these not privileges in the nature of public trusts?—I must confess I cannot so consider them.

5134. Can you state the extent of the right of metage according to the construction which has been put upon the grant of James. It speaks of coals, and grain, of whatsoever kind; and all kinds of salt; all kinds of apples; plums and fruit of every kind. Is all fruit held to be subject to it?—Yes.

5135. And also all kinds of roots, eatable; and onions?—Yes.

5136. And, "all other merchandizes, wares, and things, whatsoever, measurable." Those words will apply to wares of all kinds?—That is the case.

5137. Is that the practice in the City?—Yes; I believe it goes to the full extent. This matter having been inquired into by the fruit meters and the persons engaged in that trade, and in the corn trade, they are themselves anxious that the system should be continued. They are desirous that there should be sworn meters, and that those sworn meters should perform the measurements; and as a proof of how this matter would be regarded by the public if it were res integra, and quite a new question, I believe the sound judgment of the trade would be that the sworn meters should be continued. At the railroads out of the City of London, where the jurisdiction does not extend, they have voluntarily sent themselves and desired that the City meters should go and measure the corn. The same observation is applied also to the porterage. It is a very sound and general opinion, that the sworn porters are also very serviceable with respect to the trade, the only difficulty being to arrange for what sum it should be done. My strong impression is, that a satisfactory arrangement to all parties will be come to.

5138. The desire of the public to have respectable meters would be satisfied, would not it, if there were officers whose services it was optional to the public to employ, without its being compulsory upon them?—I believe I can give information to the Commissioners upon that subject. It is one of great difficulty. If it were optional, the probability is, that you would hardly be able to keep up such a staff of persons as would have the power to execute it. I believe there are some of the most respectable persons in the corn trade, who would prefer that it should not be optional. I think I shall not be doing wrong by stating what is contemplated in that respect. It is thought it would be desirable, at all events upon all foreign corn imported into this country, that the metage should be obligatory, and it is also thought that upon many other articles it should be so; but in this case of Combe, Delafield, and Co., where they desire their corn to be carried to their own granary, or other cases connected with the granaries, I think it very probable it should be optional. It is imagined that that would secure the public on the one hand, and be satisfactory to the trade on the other.

5139. Is there a negociation now going on between the corporation and the trade upon t his subject?—There is.

5140. Have you any objection to mention who are the persons conducting the negotiation on each side?—I have no hesitation in stating that, because I appear before the Commissioners to state everything which may be demanded of me when there is not a sufficient reason to the contrary. The matter stands thus:—Applications having been made to the Common Council upon the subject, the matter was referred to a committee of the Common Council. That committee took evidence on 34 days; 67 witnesses, from all branches of the trade, were examined before it. In the meantime there were two meetings of the corn trade. They met and discussed the matter among themselves. They came to certain resolutions, and those resolutions were communicated to that committee. Mr. Hales was in a great degree the organ of the trade; the Lord Mayor being the governor of the fellowship porters, and one of the deputies of the Common Council being the deputy-governor. The Lord Mayor was pleased to call the trade together to meet him at the Mansion House. They met at the Mansion House. Certain resolutions had been come to by that committee. The resolutions were read to the corn trade; many of them attended there. They sanctioned many of the resolutions, and they added others of their own. It was necessary, of course, that pains should be taken that nobody was left out in the consideration of this matter, who ought to have been taken into it; and therefore the matter has stood over, in order that other branches of the trade may be consulted. But there was such an unanimous feeling among all parties on that occasion, that I feel myself quite justified in saying that I think it will result in an agreement that a bill should be brought into Parliament, with the consent of all parties, and which therefore will be an unopposed bill. The resolutions which they have entered into being thus carried into effect.

5141. I observe in those resolutions the committee of merchants and corn factors state, that if the present system of metage were simplified, and a proper charge made, a large proportion of the grain delivered from the granaries in the Port of London and from the railway termini, which now pays nothing, would be metered by sworn meters and paid for at a fair labour price, and that great advantage would accrue to the public?—You will perceive that the statement, which I made just now of the intention of the corporation, fully carries out the whole of that. It is proposed that the charge should be one and simple; that there should be no expense in collection, but that it should be paid by one person, namely, by the seller, and not the buyer. The other arrangement is, that as far as the granaries go the metage should be optional.

5142. If this anticipation were realized, would not it be the case that there would be such a large business transacted by the sworn meters of the City of London, that it would not be at all necessary, in order to keep up the establishment, to render their employment compulsory, but that, for the advantage of the trade they would be employed so extensively that the establishment could easily be supported?—I believe that the contrary of that would be the fact. It is just possible; and it is held out by some persons, that if these alterations were made, the increase of the metage would be very great; that is purely a speculation however.

5143. It is the speculation of very intelligent and competent persons, is not it?—I do not think they are prepared to say that the matters I am now about to mention have been duly considered by them. First of all, the duty of metage is one which affects the health most considerably. It is notorious in the trade that the meters are subject to particular disorders, especially asthma and other disorders of that kind, which render them in a very short time incapacitated for work. Metage requires a good deal of personal exertion to carry on and complete, and is a work of considerable difficulty; therefore a superannuation fund is essentially necessary, in order that the public may be supplied with efficient meters; and they have established a fund of that kind themselves, and put into it occasionally certain sums of money; the result of all this is, that their remuneration at present is hardly sufficient to support them. My notion is, that some increase of their pay would absolutely be necessary. I do not, therefore, imagine that even when it is put under this new arrangement there will be any surplus fund which would be more than sufficient to pay the meters' establishment, and give to the corporation a portion of that remuneration to which they conceive themselves strictly entitled.

5144. Can you you state who has taken the most active part in this negociation on the part of the City?—The Lord Mayor, the chairman of the General Purposes Committee, and the gentleman of that committee who have attended during the whole investigation.

5145. Who is the chairman of the General Purposes Committee?—Mr. Perkins. The former chairman was Mr. Towse; he was there, and so were also some intelligent members of the committee on the part of the City. Mr. Alderman Muggeridge has taken a very active part in this matter, as well as Mr. Rathbone, who is in the trade; they are both members of the Common Council, and they presented, I think, the petitions of the corn trade when they complained upon the subject. They were immediately put upon the committee that they might be present themselves to see what was done upon thet petition, and might offer their own suggestions. Mr. Alderman Muggeridge attended there most constantly, and at last gave in to the committee a statement of what alterations he would suggest. That report of his to the committee was thoroughly considered.

by them clause by clause; and he attended the other day at the Mansion House during the whole of the time and took a part in the negotiation; and I should say was undoubtedly as active in anticipating an amicable result as any person who was present at the meeting.

5146. Will you now tell us the origin of the right of porterage?—The right of porterage also is a prescriptive right; it is traced back as far as our documents will go. The notion has arisen that it was particularly sanctioned at some late period; that is not so; it was pre-existing, and those are only new regulations made with respect to it. It always has been considered, and I believe it is capable of proof, that that is also a prescriptive right.

5147. Is that mentioned in any of the charters?—I believe it has been made the subject of acts of the Common Council, which from time to time have passed, and which have made minute regulations on the subject.

5148. Unless it is mentioned in some of the charters it would be a usage resting upon prescription?—It would rather be a prescription proved by usage.

5149. Would not the necessary limits of a prescriptive right of that sort be the limits of the City itself?—That would also depend upon the usage; the prescriptive right would be defined in all its parts by the usage upon it.

5150. Are there any usages of that description which extend beyond the limits of the City proper?—Yes; upon the river their duties extend beyond the City proper and that is one of the difficulties they have to contend with; because as they are obliged to be ready at all times, the meters to do the meterage, and the porters to give their assistance, they are sometimes called to a great distance from the City. They may be called up to Staines or down to Yantlet, to measure and to do the porterage connected with the meterage, in the case of only a very small quantity which will not at all remunerate them.

5151. The right of porterage is held to be co-extensive with the right of meterage?—It is so held to be.

5152. The metage appears to be defined by the grant of James I.?—Yes.

5153. There is no mention of porterage in that grant?—No. I have a strong impression that I have seen it in the charters, but I will be prepared to answer that question upon a future day.

5154. What is the ground upon which the right of porterage has been held to be co-extensive with the right of metage, and to reach from Yantlet Creek to Staines?—Because it has been so exercised within those limits, and because it is found in the entries of the corporation to go as far back as the entries themselves.

5155. It is a right, resting upon usage, and you consider that usage to be good though it extends to places lying out of the limits of the City?—The places lying within the jurisdiction of the City though beyond the actual limits of the City. It is quite fit, I think, that I should here state to the Commissioners what is the peculiar position of the porters; there seems to be rather a peculiarity in the Port of London with respect to them. The charter-parties for the delivery of the freight out of ships generally contain a provision that the person who is the owner of the ship should deliver the goods; consequently that would seem by general words, to include the porterage necessary for handing the article out. If that be so the crew do it, but I believe it is the universal practice in London that it should not be so; the crews do not do it, but the porters go and perform the duty. Of course the persons who object to that, say on the one hand it is very wrong that this article of the charter-party is not carried out, and that the crew do not do it; to which the answer would be, that general words in a charter-party of that description would, like general words in a lease or otherwise, be construed by the usage and custom of the country, as it is called, with respect to leases as they would here by the usage and practice of the port; therefore those words would not appear necessarily to require that they should do it; and it is very probable that good reasons may be found why in the Port of London, the crews are not held to discharge this duty. It must be notorious probably to the commissioners that it is an essential point in the Port of London, to discharge the crews as speedily as possible; it is very expensive of course to keep them while the ship is being unloaded; besides which they are then more readily applicable for other purposes connected with their immediate occupation as sailors, for which they are very fit, instead of being employed in doing porterage duty.

5156. That observation can only apply to those ships which belong to the port of London as it were; a foreign ship coming here does not wish to get rid of its crew?—Certainly not. I am giving this as the argument which is constantly brought forward, that this duty ought to be done by the crews. Mr. Alderman Muggeridge, I know, has a strong feeling of that kind; but, on the other hand, there are persons who think it would be introducing a great alteration in the Port of London if it were done away with.

5157. Would not it be reasonable to leave it to the option of the captain, and the owner of the ship to do it by means of the crew, or to employ other persons, as they think best?—Then arises the other difficulty, that if you do that you will not have this body of men ready to discharge the duty, and I believe a very considerable portion of the trade think it is most essential that they should have at all times ready for them porters to discharge the duty, and that there should be a class of persons acting under regulation and under oath who would not be likely by any strike or combination among themselves to leave those ships in a difficulty when they came into a port.

5158. Do not you think if there is a considerable portion of the ships engaged in trade in such a port as London, which require the service of men to act as porters in the discharge of their cargoes by the common operation of the laws of the labour market, they are quite certain to obtain such persons?—As far as I can collect the opinion of the corn trade there is a very great doubt of that. Of course all these institutions have about them some difficulties which render them more or less inapplicable as time advances, but which are capable of modification. It is supposed that the establishment of porters, at present, is rather expensive. It is the earnest wish of the Lord Mayor, as the governor, and of the deputy-governor, that all that should be put upon a reasonable footing, and that the expenses should be lessened and the superannuation funds so increased that active and really efficient porters shall at all times be ready to be employed. At present there is a great evil existing, which is contrary to the regulations that have been made for the discharge of the duty by the corporation, that there are a great number of persons who do not live in London at all and never discharge any part of the duty. The consequence is, that there is an application made by the trade that a larger number of porters should be provided.

5159. Do you mean that those are porters who do not live in London?—Yes; they are members of the fellowship entitled to come and vote upon particular occasions, and who, with regard to their vote and the consequences which follow upon a contested election, are then glad to come and represent themselves as porters, but who, in point of fact, do not contribute to the available labour of the port.

5160. Do you happen to know how this question of porterage is managed in Liverpool?—I do not. The committee, feeling that there was a frequent reference to other ports, thought it necessary to send a competent gentleman into the country to ascertain the charges in all the ports throughout the kingdom; they have received his report, but I do not think it touches upon the subject of porterage, further than as showing what the charges here and there in different ports are for porterage, mixed up with meterage. The result at which I have arrived from looking over the documents, and considering them fully, is, that there is no analogy which can be adopted usefully between other ports of England and the Port of London.

5161. Should you have any objection to communicate this document to the commission?—Not the least in the world. I hold myself bound to produce before you any document which you may please to call for.

5162. Will you have the goodness to refer to page 525 in Mr. Norton's book?—There is there an allusion to a charter of the 16th of Charles I. "This charter," it is said, "in "consideration of the sum of 4,200*l.* creates and constitutes the office of package of all sorts "of merchandise, with the survey of the measure, number, and weight of such merchandise, "and the survey of customable goods imported and exported, and also the office of carriage "and porterage of all such goods from the river to the houses of aliens, and from their "houses to the river, with all fees for the execution of such respective offices of package "and of porterage, as expressed in two schedules annexed to the charter; and it grants "these offices and appointment of officers for the execution of them to the citizens, without "forfeiture, by reason of not packing goods upon notice of their being ready; and it "provides that no porters not appointed by the citizens shall intrude into these "employments; and that the City porters shall receive fees for their labour, according to "the schedule annexed." Does it not seem that this grant is limited to the City and does not extend to the Port of London from Yantlet Creek to Staines?—I have not looked at that charter with a view to the question which has been just asked of me, but I will make a point of doing so.

5163. This charter has no connection with the metage, but it is a grant of porterage limited to the City proper?—There are two or three classes of porters in the City of London. There are those porters who go with the meters, who are called the fellowship porters; besides which there are porters who used to attend at the places where the beams were, who were called tackle porters; there is also another set of porters who are called ticket porters. I believe it will be found that the clause which you have referred to in this charter, applies either to tackle porters or to ticket porters; it appears to me, from the allusion to carrying to the houses of aliens, that must be the nature of it, and that it does not refer to those porters who are engaged with the meters. It is necessary that the commissioners should understand the manner in which the metage is performed, and they will then see the necessary connection between the porters and the meters. The metage is performed by a different number of porters, according to the circumstances of the ship, such as its being a ship with a deep hold, or a less deep hold, and the weight of the corn, and a variety of considerations of that kind. Sometimes a meter and six or seven porters are necessary, but ordinarily speaking, a meter and four porters would be sufficient. The mode of transacting the business is, that the moment the ship arrives and is reported the information is sent to the meter's office. A meter is appointed for the particular duty, and that is afterwards communicated to the placeman, as I think they call him, of the porters; he orders a gang to go with the meter to discharge the particular ship. When they go on board the ship one of the porters holds up the sack, another of the porters dips the bushel into the corn, and then it is turned up, and it will require a little more to fill it. I am assured that that filling is rather an important part of the metage. Supposing the corn were taken from the lower part of the heap where the lighter corn would be the heavier corn, having sunk to the bottom, injury might be done in that respect. And so, also, as to the mode of putting in the additional corn; but that is done by the meter. The bushel having been partly filled by being thrust into the heap, the meter then fills it up to its proper height, and then the porter, standing by in the presence of the meter, strikes the bushel. That is the operation; so that it will be seen that the meter performs the general supervision, and that part of the duty of filling the bushel and keeping a tally of the quantity. It would therefore appear that there is this natural sort of affinity and union of the two bodies, that it is not to be wondered at that there is a provision that no meter shall employ any but one of the fellowship porters.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5164. It is quite conceivable that there may be a class of services which it is necessary to perform in connection with the metage; but it does not necessarily follow that the City should have the monopoly of those services, does it?—I ought to say that the City have nothing to do with the monopoly; it does not belong to them further than that they superintend it for the public good. The fellowship porters are a distinct body. They are incorporated, and have a certain number of rulers, and assistants, and officers, for the discharge of their duties and the collection of their funds.

5165. You do not consider the porterage as a City right?—No, certainly not. It is not dealt with by them in any respect except in the way of superintendence. When they have any difficulty they come to the Common Council to legislate for them, and they have sometimes done so. The alderman for the ward of Billingsgate is vertute officii governor of that society, and the deputy of the ward the deputy governor.

5166. If the privilege of the fellowship porters were abolished, what would be the consequence?—I am not likely to be very well acquainted with the subject; but the consequence, I imagine, would be a very precarious supply of persons to discharge the duty in the river, and that those persons would not be under oath; the opinion having been expressed by many of the trade that it is a source of great satisfaction to them that the duty should be performed by sworn porters, under those restrictions. Every porter being amenable to the court of rulers for his conduct, complaints may be made against them. One of the rulers sits every day in readiness to receive the complaints which may be made; and if the ruler cannot dispose of them to the satisfaction of the parties, reference is then made to the deputy governor, and occasionally to the governor. All those restraints operate upon the men. If they were to be removed, and the porters were to be merely persons to be caught up at the moment, I imagine, and I ought not to use a stronger term, considerable inconvenience would be produced to the trade by that precarious supply of precarious labour.

5167. Does the City derive any revenue from the fellowship porters?—I believe none at all. Whether there is any fee paid when an act of the Common Council is passed or not, I am not sure; but it is no part of the establishment that the corporation should derive any benefit from it. I believe they have no more cannection with it than I have stated.

5168. In the prosecution which is going on, for instance, by the City against Messrs. Combe and Delafield, do not the City prosecute for porterage as well as metage?—I think I have heard that there are two bills pending; that the porters applied to the corporation, and the corporation agreed to make them parties to one of the bills with reference to porterage; and that the other is a bill in equity, solely with reference to metage.

5169. Have the charges of the fellowship porters been reduced lately by the Common Council?—They have by their own body.

5170. Is not there some dissatisfaction expressed by the porters themselves upon that subject? Is there not a dispute going on?—There is, I believe, no dispute going on. They complain, and complain bitterly, because they describe themselves as persons in a starving condition, which I believe is very much the case.

5171. Are those questions of compensation to the porters entertained by the City? We were told that when the docks were established, a system of compensation to the porters was caried out?—That would not come to the City. I was not cognizant of the fact, but they have so little connection with it, that it would have been monstrous for the City to have asked for compensation for the loss of that in which they had so little interest.

5172. There is a fund belonging to the fellowship porters, is not there?—Yes.

5173. How is that fund created?—By voluntary subscription amongst themselves; it is with a view to superannuation, and I believe there is a considerable amount in their hands. There is some dissatisfaction among them, I believe, as to the administration of it.

5174. They form a sort of benefit society?—It is a society of that nature.

5175. What are the rules now followed by the corporation with respect to preventing persons exercising a retail trade in the City who are not freemen?—They are bye-laws; one passed, I think, in the reign of James I., and the other in the reign of Queen Anne.

5176. What is their effect?—That no person shall carry on trade within the City (and all modes of evading it are tried to be met) unless he is free.

5177. By trade is meant retail trade, is not it?—I individually think that is not the meaning of it; I think it means trade generally.

5178. According to that view the wholesale trader would come within that bye-law?—I think so. I think the distinction between wholesale and retail trade was with reference to merchandise. Formerly a merchant who came in was obliged to sell all his cargo without breaking bulk; such a person was not bound to become free, nor was he allowed to become free; but, as was stated to the commissioners yesterday, he was not allowed to reside more than forty days in the City, and was obliged to be at a hostel, express provisions being made against his selling any of his articles in the inns. When they went to their hostels they were prohibited from selling their articles. Those bye-laws appear to me to have sprung out of that state of things. But with respect to Manchester warehousemen who come to London, certainly not acting merely in the way described, of cutting a piece of goods out for the accommodation of a particular customer, but almost substantially dealing in a retail manner, I cannot think but they are within the bye-law.

5179. Would a merchant carrying on a wholesale trade in the City, according to your view, come within the bye-law?—I am very much inclined to think that he would not. The laws prohibiting his residence are obsolete, but according to the general law of the City, he would be compelled to be enrolled as a freeman.

5180. What is the construction which is acted on at present?—A great number of the bankers in Lombard Street and those places are not proceeded against; and a number of professional men in Doctors Commons are not proceeded against; that is the practice at present. A great deal has been said about the bankers, and so on, not becoming freemen. I cannot help thinking myself but that is rather to be attributed to their disinclination to give up their valuable time to corporate purposes, and, I must add, to public duties.

5181. What is the reason why the City do not enforce their bye-law against them with respect to their carrying on trade?—Because, inasmuch as their proceedings would seem to come still less than those of wholesale dealers within the bye-law, the corporation have never tried to carry it out against them.

5182. Is it because they are powerful and rich?—Not at all; there is no feeling of that kind at all. I am quite confident, if the other circumstances made it necessary for the corporation to proceed against any gentleman, they would as soon proceed against the first merchant in the City as against the humblest individual.

5183. I am not speaking of what the present corporation would do; this is a construction which has been acted on for a great many years. Do you think that reason may have actuated the corporation in former times, and that the present corporation merely follow the rule which they find in existence?—I do not think any feeling of that kind has existed. I think the real feeling has been, that their time, engaged as they are in such extensive concerns, is too valuable for them to give up their services to the public. I must say, myself, that I think that is a great dereliction of public duty. I do not think they regard it so themselves. It does not occur to them; their minds are so engaged with the business before them, that they overlook the obligations of public duty.

5184. Does a person give up his time to the public by being made a freeman?—They are afraid of being by that means made officers of the corporation; as, for instance, sheriffs. It did appear to me, when I first came into the City, an extraordinary thing that persons of great property, making large fortunes in the City, should live there, make those fortunes there, go to Temple Bar, shake the dust off their feet, and have no more to do with the City. I therefore made it my business to call upon several of the considerable bankers to put that case before them. I think, almost invariably, the answer I received was, "You know how badly the corporation have behaved by making gentlemen sheriffs, in order to get their fines out of them." I said, "It is improper; it was a "disgraceful proceeding, but I think it will never be attempted again. I am sure you may "rely upon it that will not be the case." I told them I knew the corporation were going to enforce this for certainty; when I first entered the office it was the intention that the bye-laws of the corporation should be enforced. I said, "Will not it be more agreeable to you to do it yourselves rather than that it should be enforced upon you." I went to the bankers in Fleet Street, and to a few of the bankers in Lombard Street, and to the credit of all those gentlemen I never had a single refusal from any of them. They said it had not occurred to them in that new point of view, but they would be pleased to take up their freedom. At that time a committee was appointed to inquire into those bye-laws, and what should be done with respect to them, and the corporation did not seem inclined to enforce the matter. I therefore felt that I had no right to go any further to any gentleman and point out to them that the corporation were intending to enforce them, as it did not seem to me that they were, and there the matter dropped; but that is my thorough conviction as to what has produced the present state of the City of London.

5185. Can an alien become a freeman of the City?—Only the son of an alien (British born), with the assent of the Common Council.

5186. If an alien were to attempt to set up a shop in the City of London he would be prevented, unless he were able to take out his freedom, would he?—No; he would not be prevented, because aliens are all over London carrying on their trades. I am not aware of any proceeding being ever taken against an alien.

Mr. Sergeant. Merewether, D.C.L.

13th Jan. 1854

5187. Practically, aliens are allowed to exercise a retail trade in the City?—Quite so; I am not aware of any restriction being put upon them at all.

5188. The City derives a considerable revenue from Billingsgate market, does not it?—Yes; and from their other markets.

5189. In what way is their revenue derived from Billingsgate?—By small tolls paid upon all articles bought and sold in the market, like market tolls elsewhere all over the kingdom. I do not know that there is anything particular.

5190. Under what title does the exaction of those tolls rest?—The grant of all the markets.

5191. Does not it rest upon any Act of Parliament at all?—Yes? there has been an Act of Parliament connected with Billingsgate market recently. All the markets are under the supervision of the comptroller. All I know about the markets I recollect from the business which is ordinarily going on before the Common Council.

5192. Are you acquainted with the provisions of that Act?—I am not.

5193. Who can give the Commissioners authentic information upon the subject?—The Comptroller. Perhaps the Commissioners may be aware that recently great additions have been made to that market, and the accommodation to the public is wonderfully increased; that has been done by the application of the City cash, to be repaid by the tolls, without interest. The work has been executed by the architect of the corporation, and the funds applied by the Markets' Committee.

5194. Was there no provision in that Act by which the market was declared to be a free and open market?—I do not think there was, but I believe now, in fact, it is a free and open market?

5195. Certain tolls are exacted?—Yes; I am quite confident that there is no provision that it should be a free and open market, in the sense of its being exempt from the ordinary market tolls.

5196. What is the nature of the inspection on the part of the City over sworn brokers?—The jurisdiction of the City over sworn brokers has been, I believe, another of the immemorial enjoyments of the City of London. It is chiefly the admission of the brokers, and the superintendence over them after they are admitted which forms the connection of the City of London with them. They are admitted—they pay a certain fee on admission—and they enter into bonds for the due execution of their duties, and provide sureties also for the same object.

5197. It was a right created by Act of Parliament in the reign of George II., was not it?—I do not think it was created at that time.

5198. The fee was imposed by an Act passed about the middle of the last century?—It was fixed.

5199. In lieu of a suppressed office?—I am not quite aware of the facts. I am chiefly aware of the jurisdiction which is exercised by the Court of Aldermen over those brokers.

5200. What is the extent of the jurisdiction?—Having taken a bond of them, and sureties for their good behaviour, the Court of Aldermen are open to petitions from any person who is injured by the proceedings of a broker. Upon a petition of that kind being presented to the Court of Aldermen, a direction is given that the party charged shall be summoned at the next court, that he shall be called on to give his answer in writing to the complaint made against him, and that he shall produce his brokers' book and the documents required by the bond to be kept, in which the real nature of the transaction between him and the complaining party ought to be entered. Upon that matter being discussed, such steps are taken as the Court of Aldermen shall think fit, frequently resulting in the bond being directed to be put in force against the party himself and his sureties, if the court so decide. If his conduct were sufficient to justify it, he would be discharged as a broker by the Court of Aldermen.

5201. Are complaints, such as you describe, against brokers of frequent occurrence?—I cannot say that they are very frequent; since I have been in office there may have been twenty or thirty instances.

5202. One or two a year?—One or two a year. Sometimes they are more numerous; lately there seem to have been great delinquencies among the brokers, and the consequence is that many complaints have been made, particularly against one broker. They have been much more numerous within the last two months than they were before; indeed, I should say of late years they have been more numerous in consequence of the court taking considerable pains upon the subject of brokers. The times of speculation produced a class of persons whom it was very necessary to keep in order, and the court and the officers connected with the brokers have taken greater pains to prevent misconduct.

5203. Is it your belief that an efficient protection has been given to the public by the Court of Aldermen in the cases of complaints which have been made?—It is very difficult to say it has been sufficient. I must say that I think upon the whole the jurisdiction which they exercise over the brokers is very beneficial; and if it is not more extensively applied, it is because parties do not make their complaint to the Court of Aldermen; but from recent circumstances that have occurred, it is more than probable, I think, that the complaints will be more general than they have been. Perhaps I may take the opportunity of saying that it has appeared to me in the course of the investigations which take place upon this subject, that it is of great importance that there should be in the court of aldermen gentlemen connected with the business of brokers in London. I have seen practical benefits result from it.

5204. What power has the court of aldermen in cases of this kind?—Only the power of admission and rejection.

5205. Can they strike a pension off the roll of brokers?—Yes, and they do so. They keep a roll of brokers; that roll is stuck up on the outside of the Guildhall; so that if any person, not duly admitted as a broker, acts as such, anybody may ascertain whether he is a broker or not.

5206. In case of a complaint against a sworn broker, what redress can the Court give?—It is referred to the solicitor to put the bond in force against him and his sureties.

5207. Are the sureties, generally speaking, responsible persons?—Great pains is taken in that respect. I should think, in all probability, the bond is ordinarily effective. The common crier, one of the officers of the corporation, is specially entrusted with the duty of making inquiry into the sufficiency of the sureties; and a broker is never admitted without the positive certificate of the common crier that he has made due inquiries, and that the sureties are responsible.

5208. Is the number of brokers limited, or is any person who can satisfy the Court of his respectability admitted as a matter of right?—Any person who is a freeman, and who can satisfy the Court of his respectability, is admitted. Admissions pass through my office. The form is this:—a person comes and makes his application; his documents are looked to; his sureties are ascertained, and then his name will be put down, as will be seen from the paper I have given in to-day in a summons to the court of aldermen; he is called to the bar of the court; the documents are read in open court; he is examined by the Lord Mayor whether he has been in business; if he has been, of course inquiry is made whether he has been a bankrupt, or so unsuccessful as to be under any liabilities which would disqualify him from being a broker. Upon his answering in the negative that he has not been in business before, and has not been a bankrupt, it is then put to the vote of the court of aldermen that he be admitted.

5209. What is the expense to the party of admission?—I am told about 18*l.* including the freedom.

5210. Is there any annual expense besides?—Yes. He pays a rent of 5*l.* a year.

5211. Is the amount of the bond the same in all cases?—I believe it is. The amount of the bond of the broker himself is 1,000*l.*, the sureties 250*l.* each, and a further bond in the sum of 50*l.* to ensure the annual payment.

5212. A witness well acquainted with the business of a broker has expressed the opinion that the superintendence of the City over the brokers is wholly worthless, and that no protection whatever is afforded to the public by it. Is that an opinion which you consider to be mistaken?—I think decidedly mistaken as going to that extent. Whether it could be made more serviceable than it is at present I will not take upon myself to say. The court of aldermen have from time to time considered this subject very much. A committee was appointed to investigate the matter; there was some difficulty in the commencement of the proceedings, and it has not advanced; but the present Lord Mayor is quite determined that the matter shall be further inquired into; and my impression is that alterations will be made. Of course from time to time it is found that there are defects in the form of the bond, which cases that arise may lead to the correction of. I think some alterations may be made in that respect. The bonds of both the principal and the sureties may be made more stringent or more explanatory than they are, but the intention certainly is to make the supervision effective, and I imagine it is so to a considerable extent.

5213. But for the payments to the City do you think it would be desirable to perpetuate the jurisdiction?—I think it would be desirable to perpetuate the jurisdiction, and I am not quite clear whether some payment or other is not necessary for the purpose of ensuring the respectability of the party applying. I do not imagine if anybody could for asking be permitted to be enrolled as a broker it would be otherwise than injurious. I am reminded that a short time ago the subject of these brokers was before the Court of Queen's Bench; they are occasionally brought before the Court, and serious questions have arisen respecting them; but upon the subject being brought before the Court, the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Campbell) expressed his approval of the system, and that it was expedient it should be continued.

5214. Did Lord Campbell express his approbation of the system, or of the conduct of the court of aldermen, in some particular instance?—I just recollect hearing what passed. My idea is that it was a general observation of Lord Campbell's.

5215. The tolls which are taken upon carts upon their entrance into the City have been objected to?—They have. I read the preamble of a Bill, in which the corporation have themselves expressed their willingness to give them up. Those tolls have been mortgaged heretofore, for public improvements; one was connected with the continuation of Farringdon Street. That money is either paid off, or it very soon will be; and whenever it is so, before any inquiry of this kind was suggested, it was the wish and intention of the corporation to get rid of it. The Commissioners are, no doubt aware of the nature of the toll. It is a toll traverse, and has existed from time immemorial, and is not peculiar to London, but is common in other places. The freemen of the places in which the toll is demanded are generally exempted from it, and that is the case in London; but stangers coming in are subject to it. I believe it has been found by the corporation that though it is a source of considerable revenue to them, a collection of so small a toll as it is in the streets is accompanied with inconvenience, and sometimes with dissatisfaction, which leads to unpleasant disputes; and on the whole, whatever he sacrifice may be, the corporation of London have declared their willingness to give it up.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5216. Do you recollect what the average amount of the toll is?—About 5,000*l.* a year.

5218. Must not that make the toll in London more oppressive than it is in such places; there being a vast population which has grown up outside the City; if a man is coming from Hackney with his cart to Covent Garden, he cannot come through the City without paying?—That is so; and it is a consideration of all these circumstances which has induced the corporation to think that they ought to give it up.

5219. That sort of inconvenience would hardly arise in such a town as Manchester where the whole place is under one jurisdiction?—Certainly not. I think the of Cambridge underwent a long investigation.

5220. The ordinary case of tolls taken by boroughs is, that they are taken upon veh cles entering the town?—Yes.

5221. In this case, from the accident that the City is now only a small portion of the metropolis, the tolls are taken in the centre of the town; in what is, in fact, a long continuous line of streets?—The tolls are taken at the limits of the City,—London Wall, Aldersgate Street, and other places of the same description. I spoke just now of Farringdon Street. Formerly, as the Commissioners are aware, Farringdon Market used to be held in the middle of the public street. It was removed from thence, leaving the wide street unoccupied; and money was raised for that purpose, under the City's seal, and charged upon the street tolls.

5222. Is there any connexion between the Waterman's Company and the corporation?—The master and warden are sworn before the court of aldermen, and the court of aldermen have the approval of the bye-laws, under which they act. I was asked yesterday, with respect to the accounts of the sheriffs. I beg to put in the following return upon that subject.

The same was delivered in.

The rent of the galleries at the Old Bailey went towards paying the wages of the Sheriff's Yeomen and Door-keepers, for attendance at the Old Bailey, but was not sufficient; the Under-Sheriff has a balance still owing by the Sheriffs. This account may be obtained from Mr. Under-Sheriff Stokes; it is unsettled, on account of the Lord Mayor claiming one half.

The Green-Wax Fines and Fees Account, received from the Secondaries, is sent herewith: after the City Solicitor has taken his share, it is expected that the balance will be divided between the Ex-Sheriffs.

UNDER SHERIFFS.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

13th Jan. 1854.

Return of Messrs. STOKES and SANDELL, Under-Sheriffs, 1833-4.

The emoluments attaching to the office of under-sheriff are derived from the proceedings which pass through the Sheriffs' office for the county of Middlesex, such as executions, fees on writs of inquiry, and other process, naming special juries, &c. The business of this office is under the management of Messrs. Burchell, and from the accounts furnished by these gentlemen to Messrs. Stokes and Sandell, the respective under-sheriffs of Aldermen Wilson and Harmer, the receipts of the office during their sheriffalty amounted altogether to the sum of - - - - - - 2,395 6 11

From which Messrs. Burchell deducted (for Justices' wages, apprehending felons, commission, &c.) - - - - - 1,311 8 11

Leaving a balance of - - - - - - £1,383 18 0

for division between the under-sheriffs, and which is all they have as yet received.

The deductions for Justices' wages and apprehending felons amount to 692*l.*, which is to be repaid by the Treasury; and, when the same shall be received, the emoluments of each under-sheriff will be 1,038*l.*

The expenses attendant on the office consist principally of the hire of carriage and horses for the year, extra servants and liveries, taxes for carriage, horses, and servants, court-dress and the appendage, gratuities to charities, &c.

The emoluments received by Messrs. Pearson and Hardwick, under-sheriffs to Alexander Raphael, Esq. and John Illidge, Esq. in the year 1834-5, were as follows:—

Emoluments of office in Middlesex - - - -	1,792	9	8
Bill of cravings - - - - - - - - -	509	6	10
From Chamber, amount of allowances after deducting payments chargeable thereon, as per agreement with the sheriffs - - -	472	0	2
Supposed balance of uncollected poundage - - - -	200	0	0
	3,053	16	8

Each under sheriff is entitled to one moiety of the above sum of 3,053*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* subject to indispensable expenses of 605*l.* each, and subject to such losses as may be sustained by the sheriffs from actions now pending, or which may hereafter be brought against them, from which they are indemnified by the under sheriffs.

Sir, Guildhall Yard, January 16, 1836.

The fees and emoluments, as under-sheriff of London and Middlesex during the shrievalty of Messrs. Raphael and Illidge, which have been received by me from our agents, amount to the sum of 896*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, out of which I have had to pay 605*l.* as the indispensable expenses of my office. By my arrangement with Mr. Sheriff Raphael I am entitled receive the half of 472*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* the balance of the allowances from the chamberlain's office and also the moiety of the bill of cravings, which has been made out at 509*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*

The amount which the treasury may allow out of the latter sum is uncertain; accounts are seldom audited and paid till two or three years after the expiration of the sheriff's year of office, and the deductions made are so uncertain, that no calculation can be fairly made of the amount which this branch of the emoluments of office will really yield.

I am also entitled to a moiety of the fines and forfeitures received under the process of the Green Wax; this is estimated by Mr. Newman, the City's bailiff, to amount to 80*l.* per annum; some years it being considerably more, and some less.

I shall likewise be entitled to receive a moiety of uncollected poundage, still outstanding and uncollected in Middlesex: these may amount to about 200*l.* The sum is uncertain, as is the time of its payment; it is retained by the agents to meet any demands that may be made upon the late sheriffs from the defaults of their officers. Verdicts have already been recovered against the sheriffs in two actions, for amounts greater than the balance of poundage, and other actions are pending to a considerable amount. The under-sheriffs take securities from the officers, and they indemnify the sheriffs from all losses; till all these matters are settled, it is impossible to say what are the net profits of office. It is possible, though not probable, that these losses may exceed the whole of the profits. I would cheerfully have given 10*l.* per cent. premium upon the gross receipts as an insurance against these losses.

This return should have been made at a much earlier period, but that we did not receive our last account from Messrs. Burchell till the end of December, and we could not make up our accounts till we had received it.

I have the honour to be your most obedient servant,

CHARLES PEARSON

The Chairman of the Revenue Committee.

Henry Alworth Merewether, Esquire, D.C.L., Serjeant-at-Law, Town Clerk, further examined.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

7th Jan. 1854.

5223. Are there any points with regard to the evidence you have already given, to which you are desirous of further calling the attention of the Commissioners?—On a former day, I spoke of the number of charters. I have since had the list which I made of them corrected, and I believe this which I can now deliver in will be an accurate list of the whole of them.

The same was delivered in.

5224. Are all those in the custody of the City?—No; some of them are in the Tower of London, but this list is a complete one.

5225. Have you copies of those charters, of which the originals are not in your custody?—Yes; a great many of them. There are some of which we have not copies. Mr Hardy, as I stated the other day, did not entirely complete the work he was engaged in. But those charters are chiefly repetitions of former charters. I have also an account of the sums which were paid for each of the charters, which is not long, and probably I had better read it. In 1139, in the reign of King Stephen, one hundred marks of silver were paid by the corporation, to have the privilege of chosing their sheriffs for one year. In 1158, the fourth of Henry II., 1,043*l.* was given as a donum. In 1159, the fifth of Henry II., 1000 marks was also given as a donum. In 1170, the sixteenth of Henry II., 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was given; and in 1172, two years afterwards, the nineteenth of Henry II., a similar sum was also given. In 1197, the 14th of July, the eighth of Richard I., 1,500 marks were given. In 1150, the 12th of June, the thirty-fifth of Henry III., 600 marks. In 1256, the fortieth of Henry III., 3000 marks. In 1267, the 26th of March, the fifty-second of Henry III., 20,000 marks. In 1270, the 21st of June, the fifty-fourth of Henry III., 100 marks, and subsequently, the sum of 500 marks. In 1307, the first of Edward II., 1,700 marks, and 1,000 marks. In 1314, the eighth of Edward II., 600 marks. In 1319, the twelfth of Edward II., 1,000 marks. In 1322, the fifteenth of Edward II., 2,000 marks. In 1339, the twelfth of Edward III., 20,000 marks. In 1371, the forty-fourth of Edward III., 4,601*l.* In 1383, the seventh of Richard II., 4,000 marks. In 1378, the eighteenth of Edward IV., the charter granted package carriage, portage, garbelling, and gauging, and coroner, in consequence of the City realising a debt due from the crown, of 7000*l.* Another charter, respecting mortmain, in consequence of the City realising a further debt. In the sixteenth Charles I., 1640, there was a charter respecting porterage, for which the sum of 4,200*l.* was paid. Upon the subject of sewers also, it would be very material that I should lay before the Commissioners a plan of the sewers of the City of London, because, at a glance of the eye, the Commissioners will see that every person in the City of London may have an opportunity of ascertaining how near a drain comes to his house. There is no person in the city of London, who may not know where he can get immediate access to a drain.

5226. When was this plan made?—That plan was made in 1841. Of course, the sewers are from time to time lengthened, and a fresh plan was completed in 1847. This is now made up to the year 1853. This report (producing the same), which I referred to the other day, is the report of Mr Walker, Mr William Cubitt, and Mr Brunel, upon the subject of the sewers. It will at once bring the subject to the attention of the Commissioners if I read this passage, explaining the mode in which individuals, wishing to have drains, are dealt with. It is in a report by the engineer of the Commissioners, page 17. "House Drainage Plans.—The registration of the houses drained is now made upon "a more comprehensive system than it hitherto had been. Upon the 17th of June last, "I had the honour of submitting to you a report upon this subject, which at once received "your acquiescence, and in accordance therewith, I immediately organized, and commenced "the system which has since been carried out. It is as follows:—Immediately after "application is made at the Sewers Office, for a drain to a house, the application is referred "to the surveyor, for his estimate of the cost of the construction of that portion which "will be beneath the public way; a plan of the premises to be drained is there taken, and

" laid down in his office, upon which is marked the course, size, inclination of the drain, " and its various inlets. A tracing is then made, and placed in the hands of the inspector " of the district at the same time that the estimate of the cost is transmitted to the clerk. " Upon payment of the cost the drain is built, and the internal works entirely constructed " under the supervision of the inspector, who has for that purpose general rules and in- " structions issued him for his guidance. When the works are completed, the inspector " marks upon the plans any deviation or alteration that may have been made, fills in upon " the required form the date of the completion of the works, and his signature, as verifica- " tion that the works have been properly constructed, and returns it to the surveyor, who " registers and keeps it in his office for future reference. During the six months, ending " Christmas, 1851, 109 house drainage plans have been made, comprehending the plans of " 159 houses. They form the nucleus of a large amount of information that, through the " commission, may be made of much future value to the public, who can at all times have " reference to the plans when it may be necessary." All of this, I should add also, is done without fee of any kind, so that any person wishing to have a drain communicating with the drains specified in this map, has only to pay the cost of the drain to his own house, minus the cost of making it under the public ways. He has a plan thus recorded in the office, and all without fee of any kind. I was examined the other day, upon the subject of traders' freedom, In the year 1844, a very elaborate inquiry was made into the entries in the corporation books, with reference to freedom, tracing it up from the earliest time, explaining who were, and who ought to be, citizens, and extracts were made, to show their different characters, and how they were, from time to time, admitted. I think probably this may be a document material for the Commissioners to see; but I do not propose to trouble you further with it than to draw you attention to page 74, where a minute account is given of the fees which were then payable, which, contrasted with the fees which are now payable, as I stated the other day, will point out to you the gradual reduction of them. At the close of this report, there are conclusions drawn from the facts previously stated, and at the end of them there are suggestions for proceedings which led to some of the proceedings which were enumerated the other day.

5227. Is that the report of a committee to the common council?—It is. I believe it really contains all that is to be found in the books on the subject. I think it was the wish of the Commissioners that I should go next to the question of the soil and bed of the river, and the suit which has been instituted respecting it. I hold in my hand a report which was drawn up in the year 1842, made by Mr Walker, the engineer employed by the government in different works, by Captain Bullock, with the permission of the admiralty, he also having been lately employed by the admiralty and the officers of the corporation, the water bailiff, the engineer of the navigation committee, and other subordinate officers. This report goes at great length into the question of the management of the stream of the river, and to describe it generally. I should say it is founded on the assured necessity of giving to the stream as direct a channel as possible, with a view of keeping it at a constant depth, in order that a uniform depth may, as far as practicable, be preserved throughout the whole length of the stream. It is quite obvious that all the projecting banks, or wharves, or irregular projections of any kind, on the side of the river, must have a strong tendency to interfere with that operation of the stream. The scour is materially interfered with by those projections, and the uniform force of the stream is lessened. It will probably also be quite obvious to the Commissioners, that it would be impossible, from the greatness of the expense, to carry out a plan of the uniform embankment of the sides of the river. As the Commissioners may be aware, Sir Frederick French, at one time, meditated a beautiful plan for the regulation of the banks of the Thames, but that which only extended from Westminster Bridge to London Bridge, would have cost so much, that it would have been quite impracticable that it could be carried out. This, which goes still further, both higher up the stream and lower down the stream, would have involved the expenditure of a much larger amount. It was, therefore assured, and I believe justly, that to do it as a whole and at the same time, was a thing which was absolutely impracticable, but to bring it about by degrees, by getting a certain frontage, wherever any alteration was wanted to be made, and by maintaining that frontage, inexorable from time to time, thereby gradually increasing the bank of the river, which should be properly embanked, was a feasible plan, and Mr. Walker recommended that it should be done.

5228. What are the limits, within which Mr. Walker's plan was proposed to be effected?—Mr. Walker's plan went up to the first lock upon the Thames, at Teddington, and from thence down to a considerable distance below Gravesend. The line laid down by Mr. Walker, which can be seen in either of these plans, is denoted by a blue line.

5229. Is there any estimate given by Mr. Walker, of what would be the ultimate expense of effectually embanking the river for that distance?—I do not think he gives the amount, but he speaks of it as so large, that it was quite impossible to be contemplated.

5230. He probably then did not go very accurately into the details of the estimate?—No; because the engineer arrived at the conclusion, that it could not be done, as one act, but it might be done by degrees, by persevering in the line. That line, the navigation committee to whom is entrusted by the Lord Mayor, under the Common Council, that portion of the duty, have endeavoured, as far as they possibly could, inexorably to enforce, never allowing, where they could avoid it, anything either to be within or without the line laid down by Mr. Walker. By that means, they have effected a great deal of the good which was contemplated in different parts of the river. In carrying out that plan, the committee, of course, were too glad to adopt any opportunity which occurred of having as long a space of embankment made by any person as they could, and therefore they have granted to Mr Parke to make a considerable embankment, a little above Battersea; and they have granted to Mr. Cubitt, down by the Isle of Dogs, a license to make an embankment for nearly a mile, involving a very material part of the Isle of Dogs, where the banks being of a soft kind, are liable to be washed away. The banks are not only rendered insecure themselves, but likely to fall into the river, and with the matter washed away, of course accumulations are made in other parts of the channel. It was, therefore, very material to carry out the plan in that part of the river. All those embankments are required to be made, either upon piles, or of solid materials, so that there shall be no washing away of the banks. That has become of much more importance since the frequent use of steam-boats, because the motion of the steam-boats, the current they produce, and the action upon the water, have a strong tendency to wash down the banks of the river. The corporation, therefore, very gladly availed themselves of the arrangement with Mr. Cubitt, and they did the same with the Atlas Insurance Company, they made a considerable grant to them of an embankment. Those grants having been made, then began the proceedings against the corporation. The disposition to put the matter into a course of legal investigation arose to a certain degree out of a bill which was pending in Parliament for a pier at Greenwich. The hospital, I believe, were much interested in that pier, and it has been the practice of the Navigation Committee not to take any payment with respect to any government, or any public works. I believe the Ordnance at Woolwich and at the Tower have had grants made to them from time to time, without any sum being paid. The Greenwich Pier Bill was brought in in the year 1837. I was in hopes that I had with me the clauses which were proposed to be introduced at that time into the bill. A considerable discussion took place with the government upon the subject, and the government law officers were seen. Mr. John Tyrrell, the very celebrated conveyancer, was advised with by the corporation on the subject of the clauses, and an appointment was made for him to meet the attorney-general of that day in consultation; a clause was introduced by the crown, reciting the right to the soil of the river. That clause was strenuously objected to, and was eventually determined to be struck out; but clauses of other kinds were discussed with the attorney-general, and at last the bill was agreed on. There was a letter from Mr. Pemberton to Mr. Tyrrell, and the answer of Mr. Edward Tyrrell, the brother of Mr. John Tyrrell, to it as to the alterations. Eventually it became a matter of arrangement, but this, coupled with the grants which I have alluded to, seems to have made an impression upon the government, and they consequently filed an information in the Court of Chancery a year or two afterwards, for the purpose of having the point decided. In the evidence which has been given by Mr. Pemberton, he seemed rather to make complaints against the corporation of London. Mr Pemberton's evidence certainly had a tendency to cast censure upon the conduct of the corporation in that case. The fact is, the corporation feel most strongly, that they have grounds of complaint as to the manner in which that suit was commenced. Of course, there would be a disinclination to go much into that matter, it being, in point of fact, before the court to be decided; but I know I am justified in saying, that the course which was adopted, was one, I believe, of entire novelty, It was novel, in some respects, from necessity, because the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer having been superseded, the proceedings, instead of being in the Exchequer, where informations by the king were usually filed, were transferred into the Court of Chancery. It was contended thoughout by the corporation of London (a substantial ground of complaint, as it would seem), that this proceeding was very unusual, and particularly so, inasmuch as it tried to cast upon the corporation the vindication of their title, instead of the question being raised as to the title of the Crown. Nevertheless, the information began with the positive allegation of the general title of the Crown to all the sea-shores. This is an extract from the information. "By the royal prerogative, the ground and soil of the coast and shores of the "sea round this kingdom, and the ground and soil of every port, haven, and arm of the "sea, creek, pool, and navigable river thereof, into which the sea ebbs and flows, and also "the shore lying between high water mark and low water mark, belonging to Her "Majesty." I am sure I need not say that that is a strong, and rather startling proposition, which involves and claims the right to actual property, at the lowest computation, in about 700,000 acres of land. I would not state that to the Commissioners hastily, without pains having been taken to ascertain it. It was measured as well as it could be, from the ordnance map, taking care always to make the calculation rather under than over the mark; and I have no conception, if it were measured all over the kingdom, but that it would considerably exceed the quantity I have mentioned. Probably the Commissioners will recollect the immense tracts of sands in Lancashire, between Lancaster and the opposite coast.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5231. The claim of the Crown does not by any means exclude any right which any subjects of the Crown might have to that space between high and low water mark, either by grant or by prescription?—I should think it would be difficult to set up the right of prescription; no doubt a grant might be set up.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5232. If it be assumed that the assertion in the information of the general right of the Crown be correct, then, of course, it would lie upon the corporation of London, who claim the right of the soil between high and low water mark in the Thames to show by what title they have it?—No doubt.

5233. And that was the object probably?—I presume that was the object; the information sets out with the assumption that the title was in the Crown. If that is conceded, of course anybody who claims the above must show it to be in him.

5234. Do the corporation contest that maxim of law, that the soil between high and low-water mark is in the Crown?—They most certainly do, thus far. The information was against me as the officer of the corporation, and I have denied it. I denied it before the chancellor. I tried to support the doctrine which I set up, by an address which I made to the chancellor, of which I have a copy here, which I only refer to for the purpose of satisfying the Commissioners that I have not taken up the opinion slightly; of course it is not my intention to detain you upon the subject, but I do feel justified in saying this, that in the abundant stores of historical and legal information which there are in this country, there is no trace whatever in any of the early records of a right so extensive and so pervading the whole kingdom as this which is here claimed.

5235. What is the doctrine maintained by the City with respect to soil so situated?—The doctrine maintained by the City is, that this proposition cannot be supported by the Crown, if it seeks to take the river out of the possession of the City, which they clearly have, by acts of possession exercised for years upon it. They say it must be done in the ordinary course by a process of intrusion; the Crown would then have to establish its right, instead of beginning with an assumption of the title of the Crown, and calling upon the City to shew that it is out of the Crown.

5236. What the Crown maintains is this, that the City having been conservators of the river, have, by necessity, been forced to do certain acts in reference to the shores of the river, which may be considered as having some resemblance to acts of ownership and authority over the soil between high and low-water mark; that such acts however, have only such resemblance, and that no acts of possession of that soil have in fact been exercised by the City, how is that met by the City?—First of all by the fact that possession has been exercised over and over again; acts of ownership and of interference with the soil have been done. Then again, it is impossible for anything to be more distinct than the claim of jurisdiction, which would give them jurisdiction as conservators, and any act done interfering with the soil. Acts interfering with the soil must be attributed to the ownership of the soil; an act of conservancy would be attributable to the jurisdiction which is given. I must confess therefore, that I look upon that as a mere abstract proposition, which cannot at all be tenable, when the facts as to the acts of ownership be looked into. It is quite out of the question for any party to turn round and say, those are acts of ownership, but we attribute them to the jurisdiction.

5237. What description of acts of possession have the City exercised, as distinct from acts involved, as consequences of their right of conservancy?—They place and regulate the steps for the use of the river in all parts of it. They had altercations with the Crown in the reign of Henry the Eighth, when a grant was made of a particular spot by the Crown; it was resisted by the City, and abandoned by the Crown. They established the well-known water works at London Bridge for the supply of London with water.

5238. Does that appear to be an act of the ownership of the soil?—The machinery was placed upon the soil.

5239. Was there no Act of Parliament authorizing them to make the water works?—None at all; but a grant was made by the City to a particular individual, that he should erect his machinery there, which he did. I have some reluctance to go into that description of facts, because they are facts in controversy between the Crown and the City, and I do not feel justified, in the position I at present stand in, in asserting the facts upon which the City would rely on the one hand, or disputing those on which the Crown would rely on the other. I am only at present saying that as far as I can judge there are most distinct acts of ownership to be shown. Looking to the record of Doomsday Book, which is a record giving all the property in the country in minute detail, beginning always with property which belongs to the King, there is no trace throughout Doomsday Book of any terra regis of this kind on the sea shore; but on the contrary, there is an instance of a mill at Dover, on the sea shore, which belongs, I think, to the Bishop of Bayeux.

5240. If the Crown have the general ownership of all lands between high and low-water mark, it would not be specifically mentioned in Doomsday Book, would it, that the Crown was the owner of the soil of the Thames so situated?—I think it would, because there are properties of that kind mentioned in Doomsday Book. I may refer to one particularly, the salt pans all round the kingdom.

5241. Has the City any grant or charter affecting the origin of the right to the soil of the river?—None. I am of course sent here to answer any questions which the Commissioners may ask me. But I think in any statement of this kind, I ought to feel disinclined to answer any questions which might in any degree prejudice the rights of the corporation at present.

5242. What do the City consider to be the origin of their right to the soil of the river?—I could suggest an origin, but I really would rather not, because I should be affecting those rights pendente lite.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5243. This is a public right, which may be the subject of legislation, may it not, as well as of a judicial inquiry? Is not it important, that the public should know what is the origin of a right of that extent affecting the whole bed of the Thames?—I imagine it can only be a matter of legislation, subject to the ordinary rules of compensation to those who are in possession.

5244. Still it may be a matter for legislation, subject to any conditions which Parliament may impose?—That previous condition always being performed by compensation, I should be doing wrong if I were to contend that a public river of such extreme importance to the trade of the country as the Thames, could not be the subject of legislative enactment, because it has been so, and may be so again. But that is altogether distinct from the question of property in the soil and bed of it; and if that question is gone into, then the persons who are in possession would claim according to the ordinary practice of Parliament compensation; but the Crown stepped in and said, Now let us dispute this point, and settle first of all the title to the river before any other step is taken; to which the City say, We have no objection to your doing that, only proceed in the ordinary course, proceed by a Writ of Intrusion, and we are ready to meet you, and will give every facility for putting the question in issue as soon as ever you like; we will do it in the cheapest and readiest manner that can be proposed. But this information began with the extraordinary allegation which we think is not of a nature to be found in many proceedings. When there was a charter granted upon the assumed right of the Crown in the Isle of Wight, it was resisted, and never has been put in force.

5245. You consider that, in legislation, Parliament would proceed upon the ordinary ground of giving compensation to any persons who may be affected by the proceedings in question, but of course the right to that compensation you consider should be tried by the ordinary courts?—Yes; and that the City of London are desirous of.

5246. An inquiry by the Commissioners as to your mode of supporting your title in those ordinary courts, might, you think, prejudice the case of the corporation?—Yes; I must confess that I am very much astonished that Mr. Pemberton, a lawyer, and other gentlemen who are lawyers, in the case of Delafield and Company, should have come before the Commissioners in the way they have done.

5247. This is not the first time the question has been raised, is it?—It is not the first time that the right of property to particular spots in the river has been raised, but it is the first time this general allegation has been introduced. This claim to the soil between high and low-water mark I believe to be new. I do not believe such a doctrine has ever been maintained before.

5248. Was it not raised in a suit in the eighth of Charles First, about some premises at Wapping?—Yes; it was, I think; but that was not upon a general claim of this kind, but upon a claim to a particular spot.

5249. As being between high and low-water mark?—Yes; I think it was. There is no doubt that there are cases in which the soil between high and low water may belong to a particular individual, independently of such a general claim as this on the part of the Crown.

5250. In the suit with regard to Wapping, was not the question between the Crown and the City?—I do not at this moment recollect whether it was so or not; I rather believe it was.

5251. If that suit were decided in favour of the Crown, on the ground that the spot in question was between high and low-water mark, I suppose you would contend that it was a wrong decision?—I am quite prepared to contend that, and I think the circumstances connected with the suit would not give it much weight in a court of law. All I confine myself to at present is the observation, that tracing through the statutes, through the cases, and through the year books, and the immense mass of information which is to be obtained upon that description of rights, there is no mention whatever of a general right of this description. There are two celebrated cases of Sir John and Sir Henry Constable in the year book, which are in my judgment directly against it; and a recent case has been tried also, in which the late Duke of Beaufort was a party against the corporation of Swansea, in which, according to my reading of the case, the same point was decided.

5252. We do not of course wish to ask you for any specific evidence as to the title of the Crown or the title of the City in the case which is now in dispute, but it is material that the Commissioners should ask you generally what is the nature of the claim which the City make to the soil and the bed of the Thames. Do they claim to hold it by prescription, or by grant, or any other general description of right?—By prescription indicated by successive acts of ownerships from a very early period.

5253. Has your attention been called to the complaints made by Mr. Matthews of the conduct of the City, in the character of conservators of the river Thames, with regard to obstructions?—I have been a party in point of fact to some of those discussions, and I believe I am particularly competent to give a general answer, which will cover that case and others. The Master of the Rolls directed that the Navigation Committee of London and the corporation should do no act at all interfering with the river without sending notice of it to the Woods and Forests. That notice has ever since been sent, many hundred embankments and accommodations have been granted upon the river, and there has been no complaint whatever made to the Master of the Rolls with respect to any one of those grants.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5254. The complaint of Mr. Matthews, on the part of his client, was that an obstruction was made in the river to his prejudice, that he complained of it, and that he called upon the City, in their character of conservators of the river, to remove the obstruction; that delays took place, and that he has not been able even now to get the City to remove this, which he represents as injurious to him, though the City claim to be conservators of the river, and receive a revenue in that capacity?—I am perfectly acquainted with the whole of the case. It was a case of this description. Two persons adjoining to each other quarrelled about a small inlet; there was an indent in the shore which had been used from time to time by one party for the purpose of depositing timber, and other parties had also used it for boats. Those parties were in conflict one with the other; it must be obvious to the Commissioners that the conservators of the river Thames have only a jurisdiction over it. The jury of the conservancy go from time to time to all those places, and if parties have a complaint to make, which they can substantiate, they would go to the jury, and they would present it to the court. I do not believe there was any presentment of that kind. There was a complaint to the committee, but after due inquiry, they thought they could not with propriety interfere. I believe that there never was a case about which more pains were taken than that one, and no case in which the corporation had less interest to mislead their judgment.

5255. The statement of Mr. Matthews is that the City, in this particular case, do not deny that the obstruction is improper and ought to be removed, but they will not remove it?—I am confident the case does not rest in that way at all.

5256. Mr. Matthews says: "What I complain of is that the City do nothing where a "difficulty arises. They are very polite and kind, but when a case comes before them "like this, where two parties cannot agree, and which is incapable of compromise, and "the City are called on to exercise their power, nothing is done."—I ought to say with respect to the revenue, which it is said the corporation receives, that in point of fact they derive no benefit from any right of that kind, the revenue they receive is applied for the benefit of the river.

5257. Do not the corporation receive any revenue in respect of the ownership which they claim in the soil of the river?—That would involve a question, which was put to me before, whether the acts are attributable to the ownership or the conservancy.

5258. Do they receive any revenue from the relation which they sustain to the river?—No.

5259. How then could any question of compensation arise, in case it was thought fit to deprive them of that relation?—That would be in reference to the soil; they keep a separate account of the funds which they receive, and apply them to the improvement of the river.

5260. From this power, in respect of the conservancy of the river, or the ownership of the soil of the river, if they possess it, they derive no revenue?—With respect to the right of the soil, there are some rents which they receive in fact, however—they are all carried to an account for the benefit of the river; the amount is very small.

5261. Less than 1,000*l.* a year?—£1,100 a year, I think, was the statement of it. Whatever the amount is, the revenue is applied to the benefit of the river, and so, I presume, it would be if it were to get into the hands of the Crown.

5262. It is a question of jurisdiction, not of property?—That is the view I take of it. If the right were to-morrow in the hands of the Government they would have a very onerous and very distasteful duty to perform without any actual benefit, a sort of duty that I am quite sure could not be performed by any body with so little dissatisfaction as by the members of the corporation, who are supposed to be so well acquainted with the facts that whatever they do is acquiesced in by those who come before them.

5263. The complaint which has been made against the City in this respect is, that they are inert, and do not really exercise their jurisdiction to the extent which would be desirable for the public interest?—I do not believe they are at all liable to that charge. I have no doubt in the world but that there is a great difficulty in putting their powers of conservancy into due operation. I had the occasion once to see whether the decision of a petty jury could be obtained or not. The grand juries meet every year, and receive presentments. There was one case in which there was a question of fact. I rather think Mr. Matthews was the attorney in the case on one side or the other. A petty jury was empanelled for the purpose of trying it; when it came to a prospect of a trial the matter was settled between the parties; and I ought to say that generally speaking, though presentments of all kinds are made of steam-boat piers, of piles put in and of wrecks left, they are almost always obviated in some way or other. The parties are remonstrated with and they yield. In this case which Mr Matthews speaks of the parties on both sides were very firm and resolute. I might be justified in using another word, and saying they were obstinate on both sides, and in the mean time they wished to throw the burden of the litigation on the corporation. That however is not in my department; that will be with the solicitor, who, I have no doubt, will explain it to your satisfaction.

5264. Does not it seem somewhat natural that a body like the corporation, in the exercise of those rights which are of an onerous and invidious kind and appear to bring to them no profit, should be rather unwilling to act with vigour?—I assure you they do act with vigour, and wherever they think they are justified in doing it they do it, and abide all the consequences. There is a small channel which runs round an island lower down the river where stakes and posts were put up improperly, and the Lord Mayor went with the strong hand and removed them. And so I could mention many other occasions of the same kind. I do not believe they are in any degree reluctant to put their powers in force when they think they are called on to do so, and public opinion will go along with them, but they are certainly very tenacious of not making their power vexatiously injurious to persons who are brought before them.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5265. When there are two litigant parties brought before them who will not agree, one or other of those parties is probably in the right, and if his rights are not protected, it is a denial of justice, is it not?—I assure you in that case I believe nothing could be more uncertain than with whom the right was. I know a good deal of the circumstances of the case, but in order to put it beyond all doubt, I think you had better have before you from the solicitor the real circumstances of that particular case.

5266. How many of the members of the Navigation committee are practically acquainted with the matters concerning which they have to determine connected with the state of the river or harbour?—Having been frequently present there, I should say that the bulk of them have a certain degree of knowledge on the subject; some of them are most intimately acquainted with it, probably no persons in the country more so.

5267. Will you name some of those members whom you consider to be intimately acquainted with such matters?—I will take care that the information shall be given to the Commissioners.

5268. The harbour master is universally acknowledged to be a very competent officer?—I believe he is. I am quite sure the committee expect that all their officers shall be competent and effective. Mr. Saunders is the water bailiff; Mr. Leach is the engineer, a most skilful person, who receives constantly the approbation of the committee.

5269. Do you think those visits of inspection which the committee occasionally make to places upon the river can be considered as anything else but the performance of a nominal duty?—I fancy that they are. When I first came into office, I made a point myself of going with them from Windsor down to Kew Bridge, and I am quite sure that the investigation which we made was practically useful.

5270. What kind of points did you investigate?—Wherever there was a shoal accumulating, Mr. Leach, who was with them, pointed it out. Wherever there was a bank washed away, and injury likely to be done, it was pointed out. Whenever piles were put out further than they ought to be it was noticed; and where they have, down the course of the river, posts put out to denote the extent of their property, if they were interfered with, it was looked into. There are certain preserves of fish, and it was inquired whether they had been encroached on.

5271. Do you think gentlemen engaged in commercial pursuits could really arrive at any satisfactory decision upon such points from a cursory inspection of that kind. Must they not necessarily have been compelled to rely upon the advice of their officers?—I have no doubt the object of their going on such visits of inspection is that they should not be altogether under the control of their officers. Throughout the corporation there is a strong, not I think misplaced, but reasonable jealousy of all their officers, and they choose to judge for themselves. Of course I do not go upon those inspections generally, but I went on this occasion to see what was done, and I came away with the idea that the investigation was practically useful.

5272. Is it your belief that the powers of conservancy are exercised by the corporation in an efficient manner, and in a manner to give satisfaction to the public?—I believe that they are. I do not of course mean by that answer to preclude the consideration of further improvements, but it is the expectation of the corporation that their officers will not volunteer any suggestion as to what alterations may be thought of, they rather hope that the Commissioners will be satisfied with that being left till after they have vindicated themselves from any supposed misconduct. The corporation undoubtedly mean to be prepared to make such suggestions as may occur to them.

5273. Do you mean that the Commissioners are to expect from the corporation a paper similar to that which has already been put in suggesting certain improvements which they themselves think desirable, or do you mean that separate officers of the corporation may be prepared to make suggestions of that kind?—I really must speak with the greatest hesitation, but I know it was not thought to be expedient, till the corporation was relieved from imputation, to make any suggestions for the future, but if you have any suggestions made to you, I fully expect it will be from the corporation generally.

5274. As a body?—Yes, either from the committee which at present represents the corporation, or from the Common Council themselves.

5275. Has the Admiralty any claim with regard to the river which comes into collision with the claim of the City?—None at all. The question was settled years ago. I believe in the reign of Henry the Eighth there was an effort made by the Lord High Admiral to interfere with the City authorities, which attempt was unsuccessful.

5276. The only claim which the Crown has in reference to the river is represented by the Woods and Forests?—That is all.

5277. Is there no claim by the Admiralty with regard to ballast?—With respect to ballast there is a sort of jurisdiction claimed by the Admiralty. That more particularly refers to the Trinity House.

5278. The Admiralty is the general conservator of tidal harbours in this country, is not it?—As far as jurisdiction goes.

5279. Has the Admiralty any jurisdiction, or does it claim any jurisdiction on the Thames in that respect?—None; there the conservancy of the City would override the Admiralty authority.

5280. That is acknowledged by the Admiralty, is it?—I believe so. Since I have been in office I have had no communication to a contrary effect. At present I believe the Admiralty are calling for some returns with respect to the river.

5281. The property of the City with respect to the conservancy is tolerably well ascertained and undisputed; is not that so?—Yes, the conservancy of the river is beyond all dispute in the corporation. In the reign of James the First, I think, there was a question pending, and the Attorney-general for the Crown admitted that the corporation of London were the conservators of the river by prescription.

5282. The controversy which has arisen with the Crown has been limited exclusively to the property in the bed and soil of the river, has not it?—Quite so, under this allegation that the property of the bed and soil of the river Thames is claimed by the Crown by virtue of the general proposition that the Crown is entitled to the soil in all ports and harbours between high and low water mark.

5283. To what extent has the corporation been concerned in the construction of bridges over the Thames?—I believe the City of London have nothing to do whatever with Westminster Bridge. The City of London have to do with Blackfriar's Bridge, and in point of fact they built it. I am not very familiar with the dates, but a gentleman who will be called before you with respect to the bridges will be able to give you every possible information upon that subject. There are reports as to Blackfriar's Bridge, of the original cost of it, and the cost which has since been incurred in modifying the bridge and in repairs. At this moment the Commissioners are probably aware that there is an inquiry going on with respect to the bridge, and with respect to another bridge being erected if the exigencies of the public should seem to require it.

5284. London Bridge also was built out of the revenues of the Bridge House estates?—The revenues of the Bridge House estates and some other properties, in one way or another, by money raised by the City, as well for the purpose of building the bridge as making the approaches to it.

5285. Southwark Bridge abuts upon the City, does not it?—One abutment is in the City proper, and the other abutment is in Southwark; that bridge, as the Commissioners may be aware, was built by a private company. Some questions have of late arisen between that company and the City as to the expediency of its being purchased by the City, and thrown open to the public. I believe the great difficulty between them is the sum for which it is to be sold, the proprietors of the bridge thinking it is a valuable possession, at least that it would require a considerable sum to be paid for it, and the City thinking that it is not so valuable. The difference between them is so considerable as to have impeded the purchase.

5286. What was the origin of the separate police for the City?—When the scheme for the establishment of a police was adopted, it became a question whether the police established by Sir Robert Peel should extend over the whole of London or not. The citizens of London, who always had the care and custody of their city by train bands, by the watch and ward, which was a part of the old law, and by their own watchmen both night and day before that took place, thought themselves justified in requiring a separate police; they thought it of the most essential importance to them that they should have it, and in that respect they made a strenuous opposition to being included in the general measure, and succeeded in obtaining an Act of Parliament to give them a separate police. I believe I may say with confidence that nothing can work better than the police does within the City of London. I speak with respect to its efficiency, which is carried out in an excellent manner by Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, who is the commissioner, there being a greater number of policemen upon a given area than there possibly can be in the Metropolitan Police, and which is a most essential point. I believe it is well carried out with respect to economy, for I believe, though they have a larger amount of property under their care than the other police, and are obliged to have a greater number of policemen upon a given area, the cost to the City of London is not more than it is in the metropolitan district. I believe the rate is the same, 7*d.* in the pound in both cases; it is an out and out 7*d.* in the City, but I believe it is clogged with some other matters in the metropolis.

5287. Is not it the case that 7*d.* in the rest of the metropolis pays the whole expenses of the police, whereas in the City an additional sum is voted out of the City estate towards the maintenance of the police?—I imagine they are pretty nearly in the same situation in that respect; in the county at large I believe the government pay a portion of the expense. It certainly was a stipulation in the City of London that the City should pay a considerable portion, and they do so, very much to the relief of the inhabitants.

5288. Is the proportion which is paid out of the corporation funds in the City the same proportion of the entire expense of the police in the City which the government subsidy bears to the money levied by rate in the rest of the metropolis?—I believe so; it is one fourth in the City, and I think it is the same out of the City. This I am sure, that one was formed very much upon the model of the other.

5289. The City obtains no portion of the government grant?—None. There are so many individuals in the City who do not contribute to the corporate funds, that the corporate funds are charged in a larger proportion for some of the items than any county fund would be. For instance, for prisons and the administration of justice, the money all comes out of the corporate funds, and not out of the pockets of the general inhabitants. Till a county rate becomes necessary, the persons who reside in the City and make their fortunes there, have all the advantage of a lower charge upon them, than those in the country at large.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

17th Jan. 1854.

5290. Estimating the expenses of a police upon the footing of a charge upon property, the City is as cheaply watched as the rest of the metropolis?—I believe fully so, and I think with a greater probability of a reduction than there is in the other case.

5291. Measuring it upon the principle of area, probably the result would be different?—I dare say in point of area it would be, because the proportion of valuable property upon any given spot in the City of London, is so much greater than it is likely to be out of London, that they have in point of fact a larger number of policemen to take care of those properties than they have in the country. I believe it very often happens, indeed in my official employment it has come under my notice, that bankers and others occasionally finding that there are a number of bad characters associating in a particular place, make application to the Commissioners to have a larger number of police in attendance; it is granted and so the evil is prevented.

5292. A complaint was made to us as to the way in which the police in the City is conducted, which involves a legal point. It has been stated that the City police do not watch the banks of the river, which is between high and low water mark, neither do the Thames police, nor the metropolitan police. The consequence is that it is altogether unattended to, and becomes the resort of thieves and vagabonds?—I never heard of the complaint till I saw it in the evidence. I do not think the complaint can have assumed any very tangible shape before the corporation.

5293. Is there anything in the state of the law which you think would give rise to difficulty in that respect?—I must confess it astonishes me that there is any difficulty, because I should suppose the same sort of difficulty would arise all over the country. When the land is covered with water it is under one jurisdiction; when it is uncovered with water it is under another.

5294. When it is usually covered by water but occasionally dry, which is the case with the portion of land we are speaking of, it seems that in the rest of the metropolis, the metropolitan police watch it, but it was stated to us that in the City they do not watch it?—I think that the witness was speaking of a particular case; it was some place near Blackfriars Bridge. I believe the omission to watch it really turned upon other circumstances; I believe it was because it was private ground, and the police did not think themselves justified in entering it. I think upon further inquiry it will be found that in point of fact the City do watch the shore between high and low water mark, so far as it is accessible.

5295. Will you state the grounds upon which the City desired to have a separate police of their own, at the time when the metropolitan police was established?—Just that which I have already stated, that as far back as history goes, the care and custody of the police of the City of London has always been in the hands of the citizens, either through the medium of the train bands, through the watch and ward, or otherwise.

5296. In the rest of the metropolis it had usually been in the hands of the parishes, had it not?—It had.

5297. When the general system was established for the rest of the metropolis under the control of the Commissioners appointed by the Crown, what was the reason why the City wished to be made an exception to that system?—They thought they could do it better themselves.

5298. Do you think experience has confirmed that anticipation?—Indeed I do. I hear of course, how this matter goes on. There is a police committee; that police committee is under the presidency of one of the most practical men in the corporation, Mr. Alderman Lawrence, and I fancy that nothing could be carried on more satisfactorily than it has, with no more dispute than ordinarily in cases of that kind. There has been in one or two wards a little dispute about the rate; it has been referred to the surveyors, and in every instance, I think, it has been settled to the satisfaction of all parties.

5299. Is the Temple included in the jurisdiction of the City police?—There is a particular clause to include all places of that kind; the Temple, I believe, pays its police rate in an aggregate sum; it is not taken upon each set of chambers.

5300. Before the City Police Act was passed, how was the watching in the City done; was it by parish watchmen?—By the ward watchmen; there was a particular rate in each ward for the purpose.

5301. Was there a day watch at that time?—Yes, there was. There had been always something like a watch in London in the day I believe, but a short time before the police Act was passed, the City of London established both a day and a night watch.

5302. If they were parish watchmen, the Temple, being extra parochial, contributed nothing?—They watched for themselves; they were not, practically speaking, included in any ward.

5303. By the City Police Act the rate is made upon all the houses in the City, is it not?—Yes.

5304. And among them upon the chambers in the Temple?—Yes.

5305. Therefore they now pay a very large sum, but they choose to preserve their own watchmen, is it not so?—The city police are ready to go into the Temple, but they do not.

5306. Do you know what the police of the Temple costs them, besides the sum which they pay to the City?—I do not, there are many parishes in London still which keep up their old watchmen.

5307. Am I right in supposing that the effect of the Police Act, as far as the Temple is concerned, has been to saddle them with a very large police rate, to which they did not contribute before, whereas they do not as yet derive any benefit from it?—They do not, but they might if they pleased; it is by a particular clause in the Act of Parliament that the Temple and many other places are included within the Police Act.

5308. Do the inhabitants of any of those other places to which you have referred protect their own premises by their own private police, at the same time that they contribute to the City police fund?—I do not know how that is. My impression is that St. Bartholomew's closes its gates, and so far keeps the police out.

5309. It would be fair if that is the case, in estimating the cost of the City police, to add whatever expense the maintenance of the Temple police throws upon that society to the charge of the City police, would not it?—Perhaps it might, but I do not think that has ever been suggested.

5310. If the Temple wished to have had nothing to do with the City police, you imagine that they ought to have watched the bill, and applied to have a clause inserted to exempt them?—I am rather inclined to think that they were vigilant in that respect, and made some effort of the kind, but were unsuccessful.

5311. The remembrancer, probably, had the conduct of the bill?—He had.

5312. What was the ground for having a separate commission of sewers in the City?—It was very much of the same kind as the ground for having a separate police, they thought they could do the business better for themselves, and they have had a very strong opinion that in point of fact they do so. Their sewers, rate is low, I believe, and a further reduction is now meditated. They certainly do believe that scarcely anything could be more perfect than their sewerage is at present—a few improvements still remain to be carried out. The object has been to improve it to perfection, and they still are trying to do it at as small an expense as possible. Inasmuch as part of the corporation have the regulation of that department, it may be assumed that the object of all of them is to keep the expenses as low as they possibly can, consistently with an efficient system.

5313. Are not both the police and the sewers managed by commissioners appointed under the corporation?—The sewers are managed by a commission which is appointed every year.

5314. Under the seal of the common council?—Yes; it is passed in common council, there being clauses in the Act of Parliament which require that a certain class of the corporation should be commissioners, the deputies of the different wards for instance, one deputy from each ward is always included.

5315. Is the police governed by a commission?—The police is not governed by a commission, but is managed by a committee which is sanctioned by an Act of Parliament.

5316. Instead of the police and the sewers being governed by the corporation, or by portions of the corporation, they are so governed that the accounts are kept distinct from those of the corporation, are not they?—Perfectly so. As it was stated to you the other day, the object of the system of the chamberlain's office, as far as I understand it, has always been to keep all those accounts separate and distinct in order to avoid confusion.

5317. What has been the object of breaking up the business of the City into various departments and placing them under separate commissions and committees, rather than under the corporation as one body, or under officers of the corporation and so bringing them into one account?—I think the only answer to that is that the system has gradually grown up as usage and the result of experience, and I am very much inclined to think now that any dispassionate looker on at the proceedings of the corporation would say, that the several duties are better performed by those committees, than they could possibly be by any other body. Whether the number of the committees, which, generally speaking, arise out of some circumstance existing at a particular time, is too great or not, is a matter which probably may be considered hereafter.

5318. You think the system of dividing the branches of business as much as possible and placing them under separate commissions, and keeping the accounts as separate and distinct accounts, is one which it is desirable to continue?—My experience, as far as I hear of the proceedings of the different committees, would certainly justify that conclusion.

5319. Do you believe the burden of local taxation, taken as a whole, to be higher or lower in the City than in other portions of the metropolis?—I believe it will be shown that in point of fact it is lower. I think the unity of action, as it were, of the corporation, and the unity of interest of those who have the administration of the funds, would both have a tendency to produce that effect.

5320. The conduct of prosecutions which are instituted by the City is directed by the court of aldermen, is it not?—That is to say, whenever an occasion arises when they think they ought to institute a prosecution, that is done by the court of aldermen.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5321. Does that occasion often happen?—Not very often.

5322. What are the cases in which they interfere, in order to conduct prosecutions?—I think it is generally where the parties who have been injured are so poor that they think it ought to be done; or where the enormity of the offence is such that they think it ought to be done; or where it is a particular case of fraud, which seems likely to spread and become general. It is upon considerations of that kind that they interfere; and I am justified in saying that it is always watched with great jealousy. They are disinclined in the first instance to appear as prosecutors, where their appearance could not be perfectly justified. They try to keep as much as possible in accordance with the feeling of the public upon that point.

5323. The corporation of London have certain powers with regard to the constitution of some of the municipalities in the north of Ireland, have they not—They have.

5324. Will you have the goodness to state to us exactly what those powers are?—The connection between the corporation of London and the Irish society is not very intimate; it is a separate establishment in point of fact, but some of the members of the corporation form the governor and assistants of the Irish society; the recorder being one, and the common serjeant another; and certain portions of the aldermen and common council.

5325. Before we enter upon the relation of the corporation to Ireland as the owners of property or as the managers of property there, I wish to refer to certain powers which I understand the corporation of London to have over the municipalities of Londonderry and some other towns. Have not they some jurisdiction over the corporations of those towns?—I do not think any is exercised. I know, a short time ago, there was a petition from some parties in Londonderry to the court of common council. It was considered, as all petitions which are sent to them are, but I think it was followed by no result; they were not able to do anything.

5326. What was that petition about?—I really forget at this moment, but I can of course lay it before you.

5327. Is not it necessary that any bye-law passed by the corporation of Londonderry should be confirmed by the corporation of London?—I have never known such a power exercised. I do not think there is any such authority in actual use. The petition which I refer to would seem to imply a doubt whether the City of London had not jurisdiction with respect to it; but in that instance I know the jurisdiction was not exercised; whether it was because they had not the power, or because the occasion did not seem to justify the interpretation I cannot at this moment recollect.

5328. You cannot recollect to what that petition referred?—I remember it was a long petition. My impression is that there was a particular party at Londonderry who wanted their interposition for some purpose of their own. I will have the petition produced to you.

5329. Has your attention never been directed to any powers or privileges which the corporation of London possesses with reference to those other corporations in Ireland?—Never further than that. I remember that occasion because I saw the parties. They corresponded with me, and I wrote to them.

5330. What is the relation of the Irish Society to the corporation?—I hold in my hand a complete statement of the charters, and of what has been done in respect to the Irish Society, which I obtained from the secretary of the Irish Society, for the purpose of laying before you. But I think, if I may be allowed to say so, anything respecting the Irish Society will come much better from the society itself, than from me. We have really very little to do with it. I have this book here, which contains, amongst other things, Lord Lyndhurst's judgment upon the case which was before the House of Lords a short time ago, which created a great interest; and I have also the accounts which are, from time to time, delivered by the Irish Society to the corporation of London, and are printed and circulated every year.

5331. Will you have the goodness to explain to us the nature of the Gresham fund?—The nature of Sir Thomas Gresham's will is to give the property mentioned, between the corporation of London and the Mercers' Company; both those bodies appoint committees, who act together, and, occasionally, separately; they each have their particular department. Under their care the Royal Exchange of London was rebuilt after the Fire of London; and again, after its destruction by fire, in the year 1835. There has been an elaborate report made with respect to the building of that establishment; but I do not know whether it would communicate any particular information to the commissioners. The City's moiety of the last rebuilding, to the 31st December, 1846, was 84,267*l.* 3*s.* There have also been one or two reports made by the committee of the corporation of London, which I endeavoured to obtain this morning, but I was unsuccessful, which would give you all the information respecting it which you can desire. The Commissioners are probably aware that there are a certain number of professors appointed under this will, who give their lectures at Gresham College. Those lectures used, many years ago, to be given in one of the rooms of the old Exchange; but upon the rebuilding of the present Exchange, it was thought expedient to detach them from the place of business, and keep the college by itself. It has therefore been rebuilt as a separate building, at the corner of Basinghall Street, and there the professors during certain terms give their lectures. This was done during the years 1842, 1843, and 1844, at a cost to the City for their moiety of 6,955*l.* 15*s.*

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

17th Jan. 1854.

5332. How many professors are there?—The Rev. Henry John Parker is the professor of divinity; the Rev. Joseph Pullen is the professor of astronomy; the professor of music is Mr. Edward Taylor; of geometry, Mr. Robert Pitt Edkins. These are appointed by the Gresham committee of the corporation. The others are appointed by the Mercer's Company. They are: civil law, Mr. William Palmer; rhetoric, the Rev. Edward Owen; physic, Dr. Henry Herbert Soutey.

5333. Are their lectures well attended?—I believe not, with the exception of one or two, which are rather more attractive than the rest. The music lecture, I believe, is very well attended; certainly, occasionally it is so.

5334. Are the lectures gratuitous?—The lectures are quite gratuitous; they are usually in the morning; but Mr. Taylor was enabled to make some arrangement that his should be in the evening, when people are more disengaged, and that seems to have been successful in making his lectures more frequented. I know that many of the professors very much regret that their lectures are not more attended, and they would make any effort in their power for that purpose.

5335. Can it be considered that Gresham College is at all efficient as a place of education?—I am not prepared to say that; the great difficulty is getting people to attend the lectures. As far as I can learn from the professors, I believe the deficiency arises from the great occupation of everybody in the course of the day, which leads to their not being better attended.

5336. The City have spent more money in building the Exchange than they have derived from the Gresham estate, is not that so?—Yes, there is a considerable debt.

5337. The Gresham fund is in debt to the corporation?—Yes; I believe it has been applied and managed as well as it possibly could be, and the corporation have not hesitated to advance their money for what was necessary. The building of the Exchange necessarily caused a great outlay, and particularly the approaches to it The value of ground in that particular neighbourhood is so great, as to make anything like the provision for sufficient area for the frequenters of the Royal Exchange involve a very considerable expense.

5338. There seems to be a difference of opinion about the state of the law on the subject of the customs of the City, as to whether legal and valid customs of the City can be repealed by the general words of an Act of Parliament?—That has been, and is still, a point in dispute. That was, to a certain degree, brought under the consideration of the court in the application for a mandamus by persons to be admitted into the Mayor's Court, to which I have already referred. The provision being express in the Act of Parliament, that in all inferior courts, any person duly admitted in the superior courts should be allowed to practice, it became one of the ingredients in the argument against the application of that Act to the Mayor's Court in the City of London, that the Mayor's Court of London existed by the custom of London; and a general Act of Parliament, with only general words, would not override that custom. I believe that argument was put before the court by the late recorder, Mr. Law. Inasmuch as there was a peremptory mandamus in that case, the decision of the Queen's Bench was against that view; they decided that the Act did apply, and therefore ordered that the attorney should be admitted. There was an appeal from thence to the Court of Exchequer chamber; and there the proceedings upon the mandamus were stopped, by a defect pointed out in the return to the mandamus.

5339. So far as the opinion of the Court of King's Bench went, it was given in such a manner as to show that they did not admit the doctrine, that the general words of an Act of Parliament would not defeat the customs of the City?—It involved a denial of that proposition.

5340. Still the point has never been decided by the highest courts?—I believe it has never been decided by the highest courts. I am not aware of any case which has decided either the negative or the affirmative. I ought to say that the question was involved in a little more doubt, because, I believe, in the course of the argument, some of the judges in the Court of Exchequer chamber expressed an opinion upon the subject; the others declined to state any opinion, but confined themselves to that which was necessary to enable them to come to a decision upon the case.

5341. So far as the point may be considered as resting upon decisions now, the view of the courts would be that the general words in an Act of Parliament do override the customs of the City?—I should think a proposition of that kind would involve many distinctions. In some cases it might be so, and in some it might not. I think it would be very difficult to extract from the cases a general proposition either one way or the other.

5342. The question would very much depend upon the wording of the particular Act, and the nature of the particular custom?—Precisely so.

5343. It would be open to argument in each case as it arose?—Yes.

5344. Every member of the livery of a company who takes out his freedom is entitled to vote at an election in Common Hall, but do you consider that the circumstance in any way constitutes the companies a portion of the corporation?—That really is a very difficult point. Whether the companies are so connected with the corporation that they may be said to be a part or an adjunct of the corporation, is a point which I never have been able to satisfy myself convincingly upon. Considering that all the institutions of

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

London have more or less connexion with trade, and that those companies were originally established for the regulation of particular trades, one can hardly suppose that they were entirely separate and distinct from the corporation. And again, inasmuch as the corporation have from time to time granted liveries, and otherwise dealt with the companies, and have enrolled some of their charters in their books, it would seem to indicate the existence of a connexion between them, but, in point of fact, there is very little control exercised over them. Those companies who have resorted to the corporation still seem to keep up a sort of allegiance to the corporation, and from time to time resolutions are passed with respect to them by the Court of Aldermen, and ordinances are made in relation to them, but the instances are rare, and I should think it difficult to say that the corporation was connected with the substantial constitution of the companies. They manage their own funds, and elect their own rulers, and, in every respect, act almost wholly independently of the corporation.

5345. The companies, for the most, have no connexion with the trades whose names they bear, have they?—With the exception of the Goldsmiths' company, the Stationers' company, and the Apothecaries' company, I believe that is the case. Those three companies do substantial service in their respective trades. The goldsmiths in assaying, the stationers in superintending the publication of books, and keeping copies of all books, and the apothecaries, I believe, in the regulation of drugs and of some of the practitioners. The Vintners' company have also some control in respect to the licensed victuallers; but it does seem to me that it would be a very easy thing, and, I should think, a desirable thing for the public, if some of those companies did interfere with their trades, at least in the way of inspecting articles which are matters of sale, and putting a mark upon them by voluntary interposition.

5346. If the companies are not largely connected with the corporation of London, suppose all the companies were dissolved, where would be your Court of Common Hall?—If all the companies were dissolved, the elections under the 11th George I. could not take place.

5347. The Common Hall would be, in fact, dissolved; the constituency of the Common Hall being the liverymen?—So it has been conceived.

5348. The constituency, in truth, consists of the liverymen, does not it?—Supposing the liverymen were removed, the operation of the Act of the 11th George I. would be limited, but I think no one would be quite prepared to say that there would not, nevertheless, be a Common Hall of the City of London.

5349. Consisting of whom?—Of the freemen.

5350. That would be contrary to the present constitution of the Common Hall?—They would not have a right of election. The right of election is regulated by that statute of George I., but I do not see how that could possibly prevent the whole body of citizens from being an existing body, though the liverymen should all be destroyed.

5351. Does the Common Hall ever assemble for any purposes except those of elections?—Yes; they assemble for other purposes, and, in point of practice, the livery, I believe, only attend there; but that was not the original constitution of London. All the citizens, no doubt, formed the Common Hall, but they used to meet in so large a number as to be inconvenient, and that body, which was repeatedly called immense multitudes, were prohibited from attending. Then the inquests from the wardmotes attended for a time. Then there came a bye law, which directed that the liverymen should attend.

5352. Is that restriction to the liverymen confined entirely to those elections?—It is not, in point of practice. If the Lord Mayor thinks fit to call a Common Hall for any purpose, the liverymen alone attend there.

5353. Supposing a man who was not a liveryman, but a freeman of the City of London, and a freeman of a company also, were to insist upon attending a Common Hall so called by the Lord Mayor, would he be entitled to be there or not?—Of course, I have difficulty in answering that question, but, according to my impression, I should think he would be entitled to be there. I know of nothing to exclude him but that Act of Parliament.

5354. Is not it the fact, that, taking the practice and the bye laws which had been made before the 11th George I., and that Act of Parliament of the 11th George I. together, there could not be now any elections in Common Hall if there were no companies?—Certainly, as long as that Act of Parliament subsists.

5355. So far, therefore, they are connected with the corporation?—Yes. But I dare say the anomaly strikes your mind of only that class of freemen being allowed to act who are selected by other people not immediately connected with the corporation.

5356. Does not that very circumstance bring those companies into connexion with the corporation, as far as those elections go?—Certainly; and there are regulations of the corporation to secure the attendance of the liverymen, and nobody but the liverymen.

5357. Is there anything which you wish to add to your previous evidence?—There is one point to which I should wish to refer—it is with respect to the forty feet way upon which evidence was taken by you at some length. After the fire of London there was a clause introduced into an Act of Parliament which required that a passage or way of forty feet should be continued from the Temple to London Bridge. It was the other day made a ground of complaint against the corporation of London that they had not maintained that forty feet way. In the clause is the exception that certain buildings may be continued there, and such other buildings as His Majesty should license. Now as that power appeared to be in the Crown of licensing houses to be built there, I must confess it does not appear to me how it can be made a subject of complaint against the corporation of London that houses have been built there. They were not, directly or indirectly, trusted with the guardianship of that ground, and it would seem more than probable that the ground had been built on by individuals from time to time as connected with their own property; but, in point of fact, some persons in the City were very desirous that this way should be kept open, and there was a considerable agitation continued for some time, to insist upon its being kept open. That to a certain degree, I believe, alarmed Mr. Calvert, whose extensive brewery is upon the line, and he applied to Parliament for a bill to repeal that clause in the Act. The City of London, though not called on to keep this forty feet way clear, thought, nevertheless, that it was not quite justifiable to repeal that clause in the Act of Charles II., and, accordingly, they opposed as strongly as they could the bill of Mr. Calvert. On the 22d of February, 1821, "The Remembrancer, " attending, stated to the court that on Wednesday, the 21st instant, Mr. Charles Calvert, " one of the members for the Borough of Southwark, gave notice in the House of Commons " that on Monday next he would move for leave to bring in a bill to repeal that point of " the Act of Charles II., chap. 11, passed after the rebuilding of London, which restricts " any proprietor of wharves between London Bridge and the Temple from building or " creating any walls of a particular description on that line of quay." It was resolved, " That it be referred to the committee for letting the City lands to consider the com- " munication of Mr. Remembrancer, and take such immediate steps as may be necessary " thereon, and to report thereon to this court." In consequence of that direction the City of London opposed the bill to their utmost strength, but were not successful. Therefore it is undoubtedly clear that no blame can be attached to the corporation of London for submitting to that which the legislature thought proper to enact. There was a point which I deposed to before, with respect to the duties of the aldermen. There was one which was so far prominent that I could easily have laid it before you, but, I am sorry to say, the book has not been brought here this morning. Perhaps you will permit me to describe the book, and have it produced before you another day. It is with respect to the proceedings of the aldermen in the Guildhall. There is a meeting every Saturday for the purpose of taking cab cases, omnibus cases, and cases more or less connected with the police and the weights and measures. There is an elaborate return kept by them constantly of the cases which are brought before them.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

5358. By whom is that meeting attended?—The meeting is attended by Mr. Wood, the clerk of the magistrates.

5359. How many magistrates attend?—One only, when the cases are fit for the determination of one magistrate, and two where two are required. The number of police cases heard by the City magistrates sitting at the Guildhall on Saturday of each week has been 2,553 per annum, on the average of the last five years, or forty-nine cases at each sitting. The result of them all is drawn out every quarter, and the fact certainly appears distinctly from them, bearing upon the evidence which was given before you as to the character of the magistracy of the City of London being likely to lead to different decisions, that there is a striking correspondence in the decisions made by one alderman and another, almost to the very sums which are imposed as penalties.

5360. They are all advised by the same legal officer, are they not?—They are.

E. Tyrrell, Esq.

17th Jan. 1854.

Edward Tyrrell, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows:

5361. What office do you hold in connection with the corporation of London?—I hold the office of City remembrancer.

5362. How long have you held that office?—I was appointed in the year 1832.

5363. Did you hold any office connected with the City of London before that time?—I held the office of deputy remembrancer from the year 1827.

5364. Who was remembrancer before you?—My father.

5365. How long did he hold that office?—He had held the office, I think, from the year 1793.

5366. What is the amount of the salary and emoluments attached to the office you hold?—The emoluments are derived from two sources—one is a certain annual payment of 1,000*l.* a-year from the corporation of London, and 250*l.* for office expenses. That includes the payment for all business done for the corporation, which is paid out of the corporate case. I am also entitled by the terms of my appointment to charge for parliamentary business done for funds under Acts of Parliament, or otherwise not chargeable upon the City cash, the amount of which for the year 1852 will give the average of the previous five years, about 700*l.*

5367. If there were any business done by you for the police fund, or for the sewers fund, there would be a separate charge?—There would.

5368. The amount of the receipts under that head varies probably in proportion to the quantity of parliamentary business which happens to be transacted within the year?—Some years there is scarcely any, and in others there is a large proportion of business done.

E Tyrrell, Esq.

5369. Would there be anything objectionable in point of principle, in your opinion, in the whole of the emoluments belonging to your office consisting in a salary, and the system of payment by fees being altogether abolished?—I think, on the contrary, it would be desirable.

5370. It would be more satisfactory to yourself probably?—It would.

5371. At present you receive a certain sum in the form of salary, and the amount of your receipts upon parliamentary business varies from year to year?—Yes.

5372. There are certain outgoings, are there not?—Yes, the annual expenses of my office have exceeded the allowance of 250*l.* by about 300*l.* a-year; therefore, in order to obtain a correct estimate of what the value of the office has been, about 300*l.* should be deducted from the 1,700*l.*, leaving a net income of about 1,400 a-year. The corporation allow 1,000*l.*, and 250*l* for office charges; the office charges are about 300*l.* beyond that sum of 250*l.*; therefore, that forms a charge against the other part of the income.

5373. Have you any patronage?—No.

5374. Will you have the goodness to proceed to describe the duties of your office?—The principal duty is that of parliamentary solicitor for the corporation in the two houses of Parliament. That includes a daily attendance, and also an inspection of all the proceedings of both houses. The corporation consider that I am responsible for everything that passes there which affects them, and they expect me to report to them anything which appears to me to affect their interest in any manner.

5375. Have you any other duties?—I am expected also to attend on Courts of Common Council, and all Courts of Aldermen, the presentation of addresses to the Crown, and the business of the corporation at the government offices, are in my department.

5376. You are a solicitor, of course?—I am.

5377. Is that the whole catalogue of your duties?—There are a variety of other duties, but they are all defined in the report of the royal commissioners, which you have before you, at page 88. If there is any question upon them, I shall be happy to answer it.

5378. Perhaps you will have the kindness briefly to enumerate them all?—"The duties "of the office of remembrancer may be generally stated to be those of solicitor for the "corporation in Parliament and at the council and treasury boards. He gives a daily "attendance at the houses of Parliament during every session, to examine all bills and "proceedings of the houses of Lords and Commons, and to report on such as may be likely "to affect the interest or privileges of the City." "In this capacity he has to watch "from 100 to 200 bills every year." As the quantity has now very considerably increased, I should say I have to watch from 400 to 500 bills every year, "and there are few years "in which the corporation have not at least one bill of their own in progress."

5379. Do you mean that there are now between 400 and 500 bills every session of Parliament which more or less affect the City of London?—No; but the whole of the bills brought before Parliament amount to that number.

5380. I suppose with respect to the vast majority of those bills, when you first see them you know at once that it is impossible that they can affect the City of London?—That is so as to a very large proportion of them.

5381. Can you at all state to us what is about the number of bills which usually have, either directly or indirectly, some relation to the City?—Last year, the number was 50.

5382. Was that an unusually large number?—It was rather a larger number than usual.

5383. Those were private bills, were they?—Some of them private and some public. "His duty is further to take the necessary steps to procure the presentation of all "addresses and resolutions of the corporation to the King and Queen, and all the branches "of the royal family. To make copies of the addresses, and deliver the same and to "attend the sheriffs when the appointment is made to receive the address or resolution, "and the corporation when the same is presented. To engross all petitions of the corporation to be presented to either house of Parliament. To make copies of the petition, "and deliver the same, and to attend when the petitions are presented. If the petition "be to the house of Lords, the remembrancer, with the sheriffs, waits on some peer of "Parliament and requests him to present it." He had to make application for obtaining the City impost for duties on wine. That I have not now to do, as the payment has not been made for some years. "It is the duty of the remembrancer to make an appoint "ment with the cursitor baron, for the presentation of the sheriffs elect, to him in the "Court of Exchequer, at Westminster, to give notice to the necessary parties of the "appointment, and to attend with the sheriffs where they are presented. To make applications for, and obtain, the summer and winter venison warrants, and to deliver the "same to the parties entitled thereto, when received. To obtain an appointment from "the Lord Chancellor for the presentation of the Lord Mayor elect, for his Majesty's "approbation. To give notice to the necessary parties of the appointment, and to attend "the Lord Mayor elect when he is presented. To attend and assist the committee "appointed by the Lord Mayor elect and the sheriffs for conducting the entertainment at Guildhall, on Lord Mayor's day. To attend and assist all committees appointed "in respect to public entertainments given to royal and illustrious personages, and on "other public occasions in the Guildhall. To take the necessary measures on the demise "of the Crown with respect to the accession and the proclamation of the successor. On "public thanksgivings at St. Paul's Cathedral, and public funerals, he has to take the "requisite measures for preserving the privileges of the corporation, and obtaining their

" due precedence in the processions and in the cathedral. To attend the court of claims " appointed at coronations, and support the claims of the Lord Mayor and citizens. To " obtain the allowance and orders in relation thereto, and to preserve their rights on " such occasions. The remembrancer has to attend at all Courts of Aldermen and Courts " of Common Council, and on the committees of those courts when the attendance of the " remembrancer is required in any of the previous matters."

5384. In short, your duties seem to be comprised mainly under two heads; one the conduct of Parliamentary business, which affects the City of London, and the other attending to all points of form and ceremony?—Exactly so.

5385. What may be called the remainder of the legal business of the City of London is transacted by their solicitor I presume, and not by you?—And by their Comptroller. The common law, chancery, and other legal matters are conducted by the solicitor, and the conveying by the Comptroller. When I was appointed to the office, a very considerable reduction was made in the emoluments. The former remembrancer received 700*l.* a-year for his official duties, and was entitled to charge for all his Parliamentary business besides. Under those circumstances the emoluments would now amount to at least 3,000*l.* per annum. I have also since I have been in office been enabled to effect a considerable saving to the corporation. In the year 1835 the House of Commons made an order that the clerks of the House should no longer be employed as Parliamentary Agents. Up to that period the City remembrancer had always employed a parliamentary agent. While the clerks of the House were the parliamentary agents, there was decidedly a great advantage to the corporation in doing so. I felt after that I could transact the business for them I have since that time acted as their parliamentary agent, and I calculate that it has effected a saving to the corporation of from three to five hundred pounds a-year.

5386. You mean if there were no officer holding the situation you hold, the City would still be obliged to incur great expense in Parliamentary business;—Yes. Parliamentary business is generally divided into two heads; there is the solicitor and the parliamentary agent. The great majority of solicitors who are engaged in Parliamentary proceedings employ a parliamentary agent, who makes a charge in addition to their own. I do not do so; I do the whole of the business.

5387. In watching a Bill which affects the City, if you have occasion to take some important decision in regard to the course which ought to be adopted, do you exercise your own discretion, or refer to any parties connected with the corporation as your guides in the course which you should adopt?—My usual course is, at an early period of the session of parliament, to report to the common council any Bill which I think likely to affect their interest. Their practice is, to refer that Bill to one of their committees, in whose department it may happen to be. If any proceeding takes place upon those Bills, I immediately put myself in communication with the chairman of the committee; he either acts upon it with his own individual authority, or, if he thinks it of importance, calls the committee together, who give me instructions what to do. In case any proceeding should arise in Parliament, of which I have not apprised the Court before, I then apply to the Lord Mayor, and act upon his orders.

5388. Take the contest with respect to Smithfield market, which is perhaps the most important contest on the part of the City which has rececently taken place; what steps were taken with respect to that bill?—The course pursued on that bill was, that immediately I knew there was to be such a bill brought forward, I reported it to the Court of Common Council, and they referred it to the Markets Improvement committee.

5389. We have heard that in that instance, there was an extraordinary expenditure incurred by the City in opposing the Bill; had you anything to do with the control of that expenditure, or the management of it?—The management of it was generally in my hands: that is to say, I knew from time to time what was going on, and everything was done in a great degree under my authority.

5390. Take that part of it which may be called the irregular expenditure in that case; had you the management of that?—I had the management, so far as receiving the money and paying it to Mr. Scott, who paid it over to the parties.

5391. Do you mean that you were not the party who determined how the money should be spent?—In some degree I was, because there was no very large outlay incurred, without a communication between me and Mr. Scott with respect to it.

5392. What was the total amount of that outlay?—2,750*l.*

5393. Mr. Scott stated to us, that out of that sum of 2,750*l.*, professional gentlemen were employed who did not appear before the committee of either house?—I believe there were.

5394. Were any of those professional gentlemen retained or employed by you?—I think not.

5395. By whom were they employed?—I am not sure that I know the names of the parties; it was represented to me that it would be desirable to have the aid of some literary gentlemen, and I gave my sanction to some small sums of money being applied for that purpose.

5396. It was only 100*l.*, was it?—That was all.

5397. How was the rest of the money spent?—The main part of it went to the parties who got up petitions. I believe, as far as my memory will carry me, that about 2,200*l.* was spent in that way.

5398. Did you apprise the court of that expenditure?—In a certain degree I did

E. Tyrrell, Esq.

17th Jan. 1854.

Whenever any considerable amount was paid, the bill was brought to me, and when I was informed that the money in hand had been expended, I applied to the committee, who drew warrants from time to time for the money required.

5399. You probably selected the agents whom you thought best able to carry your purpose into effect?—I did not personally select the agent, though I gave my sanction to his being employed.

5400. Was it an unusual occurrence to devote a certain sum of money to an object of that kind in conducting parliamentary business, or is it a common occurrence, when any important parliamentary question affecting the interests of the City of London comes forward?—It was a most uncommon occurrence. There have been, I think, upon two other occasions small sums expended, but I may call it altogether an uncommon occurrence. It was a very uncommon proceeding altogether.

5401. You can state to us, can you, from your knowledge of parliamentary business, that it is not a usual thing for the City of London to devote a considerable sum of money to what may be called private modes of opposing a bill in parliament?—Certainly.

5402. What was the total sum expended by the corporation of the City in opposing that measure?—There was the sum of 2,750*l.*, which I have named to you; and then there was a sum of 3,169*l.* 11*s.*, which was the amount paid by me for council, witnesses, and the other usual legal charges.

5403. Those two items constituted the entire expenditure on that occasion?—Yes; I believe from what I have observed of the parliamentary proceedings, it is rather under the sum which was paid by the Government for the same purpose.

5404. Did you select the counsel whom you thought it expedient to employ?—I did.

5405. Is it your habit to do so?—When I think counsel ought to be employed, I inform the committees, and I name the counsel. If the committee approve, I engage them.

5406. The bill of the solicitor employed by the Government was printed by parliament was not it? and every item was set out at length?—I never saw it. The corporation, it should be observed, have, under the terms of my engagement, the whole of my time without any charge.

5407. Are the accounts of the expenditure incurred by parliamentary business laid fully and in detail before the court?—Every one.

5408. Are they published?—No. As soon as any parliamentary matter is over, I prepare a detailed account of all the expenses, and lay it before the committee, under whose order and direction the proceedings have been conducted. The account is examined by the committee and chairman, and if the business charged for has been ordered by them, the bill is signed by the chairman. When the bill is so signed, it is laid before the Court of Common Council; and it is referred by the court to the Law Bills' committee, composed of the legal gentlemen of the court, with a few others. The bill is then referred by the Law Bills' committee to one or two of their members, who are legal men. They go through it, they see all the vouchers and all the papers, and they either sanction the bill generally, or they sanction the bill with some charges taken off. When they report again to the Law Bills' committee, if that committee is satisfied with the report, a warrant is ordered, and the bill is paid by the chamberlain.

5409. How does it appear in the City accounts?—It appears in the City accounts in a single item in general, as money paid to the City Remembrancer for his account of disbursements.

5410. Does it specify the particular measure in respect of which the charges have been incurred?—Yes.

5411. Should you see any objection to those accounts being laid before the corporation in extenso, and in detail?—None in the least.

5412. You think there would be no objection?—None at all.

5413. Were you remembrancer at the time when the recent Police Act was passed?—I was.

5414. Is the description which one of the witnesses, Mr. Rogers, gave of the manner in which that operation was conducted, borne out by your own recollection. He says, "In that case the minister of the day, Lord Melbourne, brought in a Bill to unite the City police to the metropolitan police. It was objected to by the corporation; they petitioned the House of Commons; they saw that the minister was determined; they then addressed the Crown, and a gracious answer was given; but they understood its nature. The minister was still determined, and they then acted on the French maxim, 'Help thyself, and heaven will help thee.' They immediately fixed their town clerk in New Palace Yard; they gave him a large body of assistants, and instructed him to communicate with every corporation in the United Kingdom. The consequence was, by the influence of those country corporations, the minister found that his support fell like a rope of sand?"—I should say that that is an overcharged description of what took place. There was a committee of the corporation to whom the Bill was referred, and they engaged a room in Palace Yard. I believe there were communications made to some portions of the country; but I am enabled to inform you what the whole of the charges were upon that occasion. For that part of the business they were 306*l.*

5415. Do you mean that 306*l.* included the charge for rooms and for communications?—Yes, and everything of that description.

5416. Were there any literary gentlemen engaged on that occasion?—I think not; it was a very rare occasion when they were employed, an occasion of the confiscation of the property of the corporation.

5417. Will you explain, as you are competent to do, what are the principles laid down by the City in respect of what they consider the confiscation of their property, and their claim for compensation under such circumstances. What do you consider to be the meaning of the term property as applied to the revenues of the City?—I imagine they consider that their property in the markets, which was the property then in dispute, belongs to them, and is exercised by them for the benefit of the citizens at large.

5418. They consider the tolls of the markets in the same light as the rents of land?—Yes.

5419. And as strictly falling within the designation of property?—Yes.

5420. Any measure which took away the tolls of a market without compensation from some public fund, they would consider in the light of confiscation, and contrary to justice?—They would; they would act like any other parties who have property.

5421. Would they apply that doctrine to the tolls upon carts now levied on their entrance into the City?—I am enabled to say that they do not apply that doctrine to those tolls now, because, in an application to Parliament in the year 1852, it was part of their plan to give up those tolls.

5422. That would have been a voluntary surrender?—Yes.

5423. Supposing they were not consenting, would that be a portion of their revenue to which you would apply the term property?—Certainly.

5424. How would it be in respect to the tonnage dues?—That is a different thing. They are dues established by virtue of an Act of Parliament, and granted to them for a particular purpose. They might probably object to the management of those dues being taken away from them; but I apprehend in that case there would be no claim of property.

5425. How would it be with respect to the 4d. coal duty?—That is decidedly property.

5426. You consider that the 4d. coal duty is property, and that in case of a repeal or a reduction of the duty, the City would be entitled to compensation?—I should say so: in support of which I would bring forward a case which occurred some years ago,—the charge for coals payable to the Richmond family. That was a grant to the Richmond family of 1s. on every chaldron. Parliament thought it ought not to be continued, and they passed an Act to abolish it; but gave a fair compensation to the parties entitled to it.

5427. You put the right of the City to the coal duty on precisely the same footing as the grant to an individual out of a duty?—It appears to me very much to rest upon the same principle.

5428. Do you consider the metage duties as property?—I should equally consider them to be so.

5429. In case of any one of those duties being either abolished or reduced, from what fund do you consider the compensation ought to come?—That would be a question very much to be considered by the parties who proposed to abolish or reduce them.

5430. Is there any other fund than the consolidated fund available for the purpose?—I do not know of any other fund. When the docks were established in the port of London, there was a very large claim for compensation, made by the wharfingers, the lightermen, and the warehousemen. It was ultimately decided that those parties should receive compensation, and that they should be paid out of the consolidated fund; and they were so paid.

5431. You do not think it would be an equitable compensation if the corporation came upon the rate-payers of the City?—I think that would be no compensation. It would be giving them the power of obtaining money in some other way in lieu of the money which had been taken away from them. I am very much afraid if the money were left to be raised from the rate-payers for public improvements, there would be a very small sum raised.

5432. Do you think any distinction could be drawn between the right to levy dues of this description conferred upon a public corporation for public purposes and a similar right given to any individual for his private benefit?—It would depend upon the terms of the grant. If the grant was to the corporation for public purposes, the dues must be so applied, but otherwise the dues would form part of the general funds of the corporation, as any other property which they possess.

5433. Is not every right and every property enjoyed by a corporation necessarily one belonging to them for public purposes, and not for private purposes?—It belongs to them for the purposes of the corporation.

5434. Do you mean for the benefit of the individual members who compose the corporation or for the benefit of the community in so far as the corporation represents that community?—I should say that it was for the benefit of the parties by whom they were chosen.

5435. At the time when this 4*d.* duty was granted to the corporation of London, the corporation of London represented the entire metropolis, did not it?—Exactly the same metropolis, or that part of it which they do now.

E. Tyrrell, Esq.

5436. That is to say the whole of London was then comprised pretty much within the boundaries of the City?—There was not so large a portion outside the walls then as there is now.

5437. Do you think it probable, if London in those days had been as large as it is now, that the right of levying a duty of this sort on the consumption of coal by the inhabitants of this great metropolis would have been granted to so small a portion as is now contained within the walls of the City of London?—That is a question which I can hardly answer; it would very much depend upon the peculiar circumstances of the case.

5438. Is not it reasonable to conceive when a right of levying a duty of this description on the coal consumed by the inhabitants of the metropolis was granted to the City of London, knowing as we do, that at that time the City of London was really the whole metropolis, or almost so, that it was granted to it because it was the metropolis, and that it would scarcely have been granted to it in perpetuity, if it had been anticipated that it would become so much less a portion of the metropolis than it was then?—That is impossible to say. I believe that when the coal duty was first granted there was no idea that the buildings outside the walls would become so numerous as they are, but the coal duty has for some time been employed for the general advantage not only of the City of London property, so called, but of all that part of the metropolis which surrounds it.

5439. I distinguish the 4*d.* duty from the rest of the City fund. I believe the City holds that the 4*d.* duty is to be considered as their own particular property?—It has always formed part of what they call their general funds.

5440. Yet that 4*d.* duty is contributed by the whole metropolis and the country round it?—It is.

5441. With reference to the principle which you would follow in watching Parliamentary business in the House of Commons, I think the general principle which you adopt is to insist upon the exemption of the City from the operation of any Act of Parliament which you think would control and interfere with the rights and privileges enjoyed by the corporation?—We have done so.

5442. You adopt that principle with regard to the Charity Trusts' Act, did not you?—No; I think the course taken by the corporation of London was in no way injurious to the passing of that Bill, but the contrary. The statement that I, as the officer of the corporation, applied for the insertion of any clause in that Bill, is wholly unfounded. I have here the Bill as brought in by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, and in section 38 it contains the clause which has been complained of. That clause was inserted in the Bill without the smallest communication with, or suggestion from, the corporation of the City of London. When that Bill was brought in, I laid it before the Common Council, and they referred it to the parliamentary committee. They asked me what course I recommended the corporation to take. My advice was: The Bill is so much improved compared with the former Bills, you had better not oppose it. The committee thought it was a matter of so much importance that they ought to have other advice, and they referred it to the town clerk, myself, and Mr. Scott, to peruse the Bill, and to report to them respecting it. I have in my hand a copy of our report on the 25th of July, 1853, "To the worshipful the parliamentary committee—Gentlemen, in pursuance of your "resolution of the 11th day of May last, whereby it was referred to us to consider the "Charitable Trusts Bill, and to report to you our opinion thereon, we have considered "the same, and beg to state that in our opinion the present Bill, by charging the "expenses of the Charity Commissioners upon the Consolidated Fund, instead of the "funds of the charities, is a material improvement upon the former Bills, and obviates "many of the objections entertained against them. That, although the delivery of the "annual accounts of the income and expenditure of each charity, and the other clauses, "giving the Charity Commissioners and their officers power to enquire into the conduct "and management of charities may be unnecessary with respect to the charities under the "management of the corporation of London and other great public bodies, yet in many "places they will be found useful and beneficial. We do not, therefore, recommend that "the said Bill should be opposed." There was no objection on the part of the City. Several of the parties who had opposed the former Bills applied to me as the officer of the corporation; finding that the City of London did not oppose, they did not oppose, and in consequence, the Bill passed in the very quiet way in which it did.

5443. Does the bill now include in its operation, the charities of the City of London?—Every one of them.

5444. Is there any difference with regard to the jurisdiction?—The Lord Chancellor has not applied the same process to charities, the incomes of which are under 30*l.* in the City of London, as he hae to charities outside the City of London. In charities outside the City of London, the resort is to the judge of the County Court. The charities of the City of London, the incomes of which are under 30*l.*, do not go to the judge of the County Court, but to the Court of Chancery in the ordinary way.

5445. Was that difference acceptable to the City. Did they prefer the clause as it stands in the Act to the general law?—They would have been perfectly satisfied with the reference of those charities to the judge of the County Court of the City of London.

5446. There never was any exemption clause in this bill?—No; not for the City of London.

5447. It was not in the bill when it was referred to you?—No.

5448. The distinction of jurisdiction, with regard to charities in the City of London and charities elsewhere, was not put in at the instance of the City?—Not in any respect, nor desired by them.

5449. You do not think it was ascertained beforehand, that such a clause would be acceptable to the City, and that it was put in in consequence of their wishes?—I have no knowledge of any such circumstance.

5450. When a bill is introduced into Parliament, on behalf of the corporation itself, is it part of the duty of the remembrancer to draw up that bill?—It is.

5451. In the Police Act, the 2d. and 3d. Victoria, chapter 94, local and personal section 59, it is enacted that "All precincts and places within the City of London, or the "liberties thereof, or adjoining thereto, not included in the limits of the metro-"politan police district, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be parts of the "City of London, and of the wards which the same respectively adjoin." Was not the effect of that to make the Temple a part of the adjoining ward?—It was.

5452. And so to bring them within the Police Act, whereas before they were extra-parochial and watched themselves?—Yes. The Commissioners will probably like to know how those words were inserted in the Act. The clause is not as drawn in the first instance, that part of the clause was inserted by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. It was not at our request that it was so done. Finding that the clause was put in, I drew the attention of our late recorder, Mr. Law, to the clause, he being a bencher of the Temple at the time, and having done so, I thought I had discharged my duty.

5453. There was no direct communication with them?—No.

5454. Another Act of Parliament was brought to our notice the other day, the City County Court Act, in which there is the word "employment" inserted, creating a difference between that and the general County Court Act, in which there is no such word. It has been represented that great inconvenience arises from that circumstance, by reason of parties not being able to ascertain whether any particular individual has any employment in the City of London, though they might be able to ascertain very well whether he generally carried on business in London?—Those words were introduced into the clause at a consultation between Mr. Russell Gurney, the judge of the court, and Mr. Ogle, of the Queen's Bench Bar. The facts which were brought before them were, that there were a great many persons in the employment of the Bank of England, the Excise, the Custom House, and other large public establishments, who did not carry on business within the City of London, and a legal decision of the Courts had been given, that a person so employed as clerk did not come within the meaning of a person carrying on business. In order to meet those cases, amounting to some thousands in number, the words "or having employment" were introduced.

5455. Do you know whether that has occasioned any inconvenience?—We have had no complaints about it at Guildhall, and I have not heard that it has occasioned any inconvenience.

5456. It has been suggested that that would embrace many persons besides those who are employed in establishments like that of the Bank of England, and that there is great difficulty in ascertaining whether a man is or is not in employment in the City of London; the plaintiff being liable to the severe penalty of the loss of costs if he sued him elsewhere, though he had no means of ascertaining the fact?—We have not heard of any inconvenience arising from that circumstance.

5457. In case the corporation should instruct you to oppose any private bill, probably you take the ordinary course of opposing it before a select committee of the House of Commons?—Yes.

5458. If you fail before the House of Commons, you then go before the House of Lords?—Yes.

5459. Would your practice differ in any respect from the practice of any other public body opposing a private bill?—In no respect whatever.

5460. Supposing on the other hand the corporation instruct you to oppose a public bill, what is the course you then adopt?—The same course as would be taken by other parties. They would endeavour to see members of the House of Commons. They would prepare statements to be circulated among members, and endeavour to procure petitions to be presented either for or against the bill, as the case may be.

5461. Does either the practice of the house, or the habits of the door-keepers, or of the officers of the house, give you as remembrancer any peculiar faculties of access or any advantage for opposing Parliamentary bills?—None, except that by virtue of the office of remembrancer, I am entitled to a seat behind the Serjeant-at-Arms in the House, which gives me the means of access to Members of Parliament in a very convenient way.

5462. Is that an ancient privilege of your office?—It is.

5463. What are the maxims which the City follow in deciding to oppose either private or public bills? What do they consider to be an interference with their interests or their privileges?—The general principle would be if any bill proposed to take from them that which they possessed they would oppose it.

5464. Do not they go a good deal further than that?—I think not.

5465. Would they not oppose a bill, for instance, which made any alteration in any custom of the City, which was not in the nature of a possession and did not give them any pecuniary advantage?—They would not, unless they thought the repeal of it would be injurious to the City of London.

E. Tyrrell, Esq.
17th Jan. 1854.

5466. Take for example any bill making an alteration in the law of debt or the remedies against debtors, interfering with the custom of foreign attachment. Would they oppose a bill of that sort?—I think they would, and with a great deal of justice. It is a very valuable law for the inhabitants of the City of London, and a law which a great many merchants and bankers would be very sorry to see abolished.

5467. Are not they in the habit often of procuring the insertion of clauses excepting them from the operation of general Acts of Parliament?—They are not in the general habit of doing it; the clauses of that sort, which have occurred in my time, are very few.

5468. Will you mention to us the cases, so far as you remember them, in which clauses have been inserted in general Acts of Parliament, shewing the peculiar customs, or privileges, or rights of the City?—I have an account for the last ten years. The first instance is the Small Debts Act, which has been mentioned. In 1848 there was a general exception of the whole of the metropolis from the Health of Towns Act.

5469. What was the ground on which those exceptions were made?—The ground for applying to Parliament was that the bill proposed to interfere with a vast number of sanitary arrangements, which belonged to the Commissioners of Sewers and were exercised by them. At that time a bill was before Parliament for the Commission of Sewers which, probably, led the way for the Health of Towns Bill, because it appeared when that bill was printed a great many of the clauses of the Commissioners of Sewers Bill, or similar clauses were inserted in it. The objection to that bill was that general powers should be given out of the City of London for purposes which it was thought ought to be exercised and could be advantageously exercised by the Commissioners of Sewers within the City. The next instance is the Metropolitan Sewers Act. That was opposed because it proposed to deprive the corporation of London of the management of their own sewers, which had been carried on in the manner which has been laid before you by the town clerk. The next instance was the Common Lodging-House Act. We procured an exception of the City from that, because more stringent powers were contained in the City Sewers Act for the same purpose.

5470. That Act has been considered and found to be a very beneficial Act, has not it?—Yes; stronger powers were contained in the City Sewers Act, which have been exercise for some considerable time before the Common Lodging-House was brought in, and which are now exercised. The next instance was the Smoke Prevention Act of last year. That Act will not come into operation till August next. We have much stronger powers in our Sewers Act for the same purpose, and we obtained a clause to be inserted in the bill of last year that the Act shall not interfere with the powers in the Sewers Act. Those are the whole of the cases which occur to me in the last ten years. Therefore the charge of continually, and in all cases, slipping in clauses exempting the City of London is not true, nor has it any foundation in fact.

5471. Have there been any clauses of exemption in private Acts?—No clauses of exemption. There have been a good many clauses inserted in private acts, as far as the navigation is concerned, that the parties shall carry out works in the Thames according to a plan seen and approved by the corporation. There have been a good many Acts in which clauses have been introduced that pipes shall be laid down in the City of London as the Commissioners of Sewers shall direct.

5472. Have there been clauses inserted in Dock Acts and Railway Acts with regard to the privileges of the City?—Yes. There have been clauses in some of the Dock Acts with regard to the metage dues; and there have been clauses in some of the Railway Acts with regard to the coal duties.

5473. Those clauses have not gone beyond the preservation of the existing rights of the City?—No. That is the general principle upon which such clauses have been inserted.

5474. Will you state whether there has been any disposition on the part of the corporation to create a separate system of legislation in the City, and to exempt it from Acts of general operation?—There has been no such feeling or disposition on the part of the corporation of London. What they have been anxious to do, is to preserve within themselves the management of that which they have managed for years, and which they believe has been carried on for the advantage of the citizens of London.

5475. You state with great confidence to the commissioners, being aware of the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen, and the Court of Common Council, that in instructing you to oppose public Bills they have not been influenced by any general view of that kind?—I am quite sure they have not.

5476. Are there any other points which you would wish to bring before the commissioners?—The commissioners were desirous of having the cost of the entertainment on Lord Mayor's day, and the cost of the procession. I find, upon looking back, the average cost of the entertainment on Lord Mayor's day has been 2,000*l.*; and a sum of 200*l.* beyond that has been paid by the corporation of London. Therefore that makes an average of 2,200*l.*

5477. In what proportion is that defrayed?—This sum of 2,000 is defrayed in equal moieties by the Lord Mayor and by the two sheriffs. The usual cost of the procession has been under 200*l*. Last year, when there was a revival of the ancient show, it cost a good deal more. It cost 490*l*., but the general average has been under 200*l* 5478. Who paid the extra expense of the procession last year?—It was paid between the Lord Mayor and Mr. Sheriff Wire.

E. Tyrell, Esq.

17th Jan. 1854.

5479. Are the expenses of the procession divided into equal shares, the Lord Mayor paying one share and the sheriffs paying the other share?—They are.

5480. Was what used to be called in former times the Lord Mayor's pageant a distinct thing from the procession on Lord Mayor's day?—It was something in the style of the show last year, but it was carried still further. There were generally actors there who had a part to perform. Some of the early pageants were written by Peele, Webster, and others of our early dramatists.

5481. In those days the City had a regular poet laureate, had not they?—Yes, for some years; but there was a person usually engaged from year to year for the purpose of composing those pageants.

5482. They had no regular share in the establishment?—No.

5483. Is there any other point to which you wish to advert?—In answer to Questions 1221 and 1222. it was stated that on the occasion of the opposition to the Smithfield Market Removal Bill, large sums of money were spent by the corporation in entertaining members of Parliament. I beg leave to say that that was not the case. No such sums were spent. The only sum expended in entertainments on that occasion was the sum of 14*l*. 17*s*., which is about the usual sum expended at the House of Commons for the sheriffs when they go down to present a petition there.

5484. Is there anything which you desire to state respecting the conservancy?—Only that the corporation have been very anxious for the public interests to have the matter arranged with the Government. There are many improvements which they are anxious to carry out. There are shoals which they are anxious to have removed, but they feel that while the matter remains in its present uncertain state they cannot proceed to do so.

5485. There is no contest with the Government with respect to the conservancy; it all relates to the property of the corporation, does not it?—Several improvements which are contemplated would relate to the bed and soil of the river as well as to the conservancy.

Adjourned to to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Wednesday, 18th January 1854.

The Right Hon. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

18th Jan. 1854.

The Right Hon. James Archibald Stuart Wortley, M.P., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

5486. You are recorder of the City of London?—I am.

5487. How long have you held that office?—I have held it since the autumn of 1850. I was elected in September 1850.

5488. What is the salary attached to your office?—3,000*l*. a year.

5489. Are there any fees and emoluments?—There are some trifling fees. I receive six guineas annually from the sheriffs for presenting them to the cursitor baron in the Court of Exchequer. I receive 2*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. as fees for attending the Conservancy Courts. The salary I understand to include all legal advice given to the corporation on questions within itself, but if I meet foreign counsel, as we may term them, that is counsel not connected with the corporation, in consultation it is considered that I am entitled to fees, and I have received fees in that manner. I have made a return of the amount of those fees to the town clerk, which will be laid before the commission.

5490. Can you state what the amount was?—The amount in the year 1852 for which I was called on to give it, was, as far as I recollect, 150 guineas, but that would not be a fair criterion of the fees in general, for in 1851 I received but sixteen guineas, and in the year 1853 I received but fifteen guineas. In fact, it is only occasionally that there are any questions out of the corporation in which we are called on to consult with other counsel. There are also some deductions from the emoluments of my office. I have to pay a salary to my clerk and to keep chambers, which, together, cost me at present about, 85*l*.

5491. Are you debarred, in accepting the office of recorder, from private practice?—I am not, and I am not aware, inasmuch as I was elected in my absence, whether there was any general understanding upon that subject; practically, however, I am debarred in effect from practising in Westminster Hall by the nature of my duties, and the constant employment I have in my office. I have practised to a certain degree since I took office. At the time I was appointed I had been retained in more than one peerage case in the House of Lords; very heavy cases, in which it was important that the counsel who were already acquainted with the case should continue to act, and I have continued to attend the House of Lords in those cases. But with those exceptions and arbitrations, which I have accepted also, I have not practised at all in Westminster Hall.

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

5491*a*. What are the duties of the office of recorder?—The commissioners will have observed in the written statement which was handed in, that it is said to be the practice of the corporation whenever any office becomes vacant, to refer it to a committee to ascertain whether it is desirable that the office should be continued or abolished, whether it should be modified and improved, or whether the emoluments of the office should be reduced, increased, or otherwise. Upon the vacancy on the occurrence of which I was appointed, that course was taken. I thought I had brought with me two reports, one of the committee of the Court of Aldermen, and another of the committee of the Court of Common Council, with the intention of laying them before the commissioners, but I find I have omitted to do it. I can furnish the commissioners with those two reports, which will state exactly what my duties are and what is expected of me. I may say, generally, that I am the chief legal adviser of the corporation. I am expected to give them advice without fee upon all matters strictly within the corporation, all corporate matters. I attend the corporation upon all state occasions. I read addresses to the Crown, and you have an instance in this inquiry, where I was requested, though it was not in my ordinary duty, to act as the mouth piece of the corporation, in laying their case before this commission. I also sit at the right hand of the Lord Mayor in the Court of Aldermen and in the Court of Common Council. I put the question for him, and assist and advise him in deciding matters of order.

5492. It is laid down in Mr. Pulling's book that the recorder exercises most of the functions of speaker in the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council?—That is a graceful form of putting it. It is hardly that, however, because I have not the decision in my hands. I advise the Lord Mayor; he is the responsible officer who decides questions of order. I execute the formal part of the speaker's duty in putting the question, and I put the question in the form which I think right, unless I am corrected by the court. Besides that, the commissioners are aware that I am one of the commissioners under the Central Criminal Court Act, and I am considered, I believe the chief judge connected with that court, except of course, Her Majesty's judges, who only come occasionally. In that character I am expected at the commencement of every session, and there are twelve in the year, to charge the grand jury. Besides that, I have to attend as assessor to the magistrates at quarter sessions, both in London and Southwark; the latter, however, is a mere matter of form; the jurisdiction has become effete there, and that is a mere attendance.

5493. Are there any appeals at the quarter sessions in London?—There are a certain number, but not many. A good many are entered every quarter. Generally, consent is given that they shall be heard before me without the attendance of the aldermen. An adjourment day is fixed for the purpose, and on that subsequent day I try half a dozen or eight appeals probably. The first time I sat I tried between twenty and thirty, but I found afterwards that those were partly arrears, in consequence of the illness of my predecessor. The sort of business we have at the sessions is of a character which it is desirable should not go to the Central Criminal Court; but it is a matter for consideration whether it is worth while to maintain the separate jurisdiction of the quarter sessions, and call a great number of gentlemen as jurymen and grand jurymen together so frequently, and for so little purpose. The greater number of the cases which come before us at the sessions are indictments for nuisances, disorderly houses, and things of that description, of trivial character, and, occasionally, common assaults. Generally speaking, all the serious offences are sent to the Central Criminal Court. Besides that, I have the nominal duty of attending the Court of Hustings; but that court has almost become obsolete; it is still continued, but, as far as I am concerned, I have never been called on to attend it. Then there is a court which does require frequent attendance, viz., the Lord Mayor's Court. That sits every month in the year, except one. There is one month which, as far as the sitting of the court are concerned, is considered a vacation. With that exception, it sits every month. Upon the constitution of that court, and the improvements which have been introduced into it, I should be glad to have an opportunity at a future time of giving the commission some information. I should be glad on this occasion to confine my observations to what appears upon the written statement that was handed in; and at a future period, when I have had better opportunity of communicating with the deputy-registrar, I can supply the commission with statistics, and can give information which will show the improvements which have been made in the present operation of that court, and also with respect to the peculiar custom administered in that court, the custom of foreign attachment. Besides these duties, I am a justice of the peace within the City, but, practically, I am not applied to, except upon some urgent occasions. I am an ex officio member of some of the bodies connected with the corporation. I am ex officio a member of the Irish Society, but being merely ex officio I have not thought it right to interfere. The same with respect to the commission of sewers. The use of the recorder being an ex officio commissioner in the one case, and an ex officio member of the society in the other, being, that in case any difficulty in point of law arises, or they want any advice in regard to the law, or any subject connected with it, they should have the opportunity of confidentially consulting him. I have not attended those bodies, except two or three times, for the purpose of asserting my right to be there, and expressing my readiness to give them any assistance which they might desire.

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

18th Jan. 1854.

5494. Have you any general control over the management of the legal business of the City of London?—None.

5495. You do not communicate with or direct the solicitor in his management of law proceedings connected with the City of London?—Not at all; speaking generally. It sometimes happens that a resolution of the Court of Aldermen or the Court of Common Council is passed, that the matter be referred to the solicitor and to the recorder. Then it is the duty of the solicitor to consult me, either in a formal manner or in a confidential manner. On those occasions, of course, I give him the best assistance I can.

5496. Unless there is that special reference, you do not consider it part of your duty?—No; I do not interfere unless specially called on.

5497. The commissioners have been informed that the aldermen sitting at the Central Criminal Court assist the judges there, and consult with them in the same manner as the judges themselves consult in the Court of Queen's Bench. Is that the case, according to your experience?—It is not. I have never known the aldermen interfere in the trial of a case, nor volunteer to interfere in the question of what the sentence to be passed should be, but I freely confess that I have very frequently derived great comfort and great assistance in consulting the aldermen who have been sitting on the bench with me, as to the extent of punishment I should inflict. If it be a commercial fraud, the nature of that fraud has been sometimes more perfectly elucidated to my mind by consulting the aldermen occasionally in the course of the trial, as well as in passing sentence. With these exceptions, they never interfered, and certainly, if it has ever been stated that they improperly interfere, I think that a gross misrepresentation.

5498. It has been stated that they sit there as judges. Is it the course in the Court of Queen's Bench, when an argument takes place upon a civil matter, and the judges decide it at once, that the decision is given by one judge, or by all of them, one after another, as they think fit?—By all of them, one after another. If time is taken to consider, one generally delivers the judgment.

5499. In criminal cases the sentence is passed by one judge?—The sentence is passed by one judge; the senior puisne, after consultation with his colleagues.

5500. One of the duties of the recorder is. to certify the customs of the City by word of mouth, is it not?—It is.

5501. Can you explain to us how that rule operates?—The manner in which it is carried into effect is this: I have had two recent instances, one in which I have had to certify the custom of the City of London in the Rolls Court before the master of rolls, and another still more recently in the Court of Queen's Bench. A certiorari is issued from the court in which the cause is pending, and in which an issue has been raised as to the existence of a certain custom in the City of London. The certiorari is directed to the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, and calls upon them to certify to that court what the custom is, and whether such and such a custom as stated in the certiorari exists within the City. It is brought before the Court of Aldermen as the executive body of the corporation, and they refer it by a resolution to the recorder to report. It is then my duty to consult the other officers, if I require it, and to search the precedents, and get the officers to assist me in so doing; and if there is no doubt about the point in question, then to make a report to the Court of Aldermen, of what I believe to be the custom. If there is any doubt about it which I entertain myself, or which is suggested by the parties, then it is the practice to name a day which suits the convenience of the parties, when I am attended by counsel, and hear arguments from them (they having on the part of each litigant ample and full access to all the records in the custody of the corporation), what precedents on each side they rely on, and what construction they put upon those precedents. In a recent case which came from the Rolls Court, involving a very difficult point upon the distribution of a freeman's property under the customary distribution of London, which differs from the statutory distribution, an argument was held before me by three counsel on one side and two on the other, which lasted the whole of one day and part of another. That case involved a mixed question of law and fact, the difficulty being to put a construction upon a former certificate of the custom of London made by one of my predecessors. In that instance, I certified by word of mouth, in the Rolls Court. In the other case I certified by word of mouth in the Court of Queen's Bench. The mode in which I have done this was analogous to that which I have seen adopted in the House of Commons by the Speaker, when he reports to the House of Commons by word of mouth Her Majesty's Speech, and when he says "For convenience I have obtained a copy." Accordingly I read the substance of my certificate aloud, at the same time handing in the parchment record and saying, "For convenience I have put it into writing."

5502. In fact, the certificate by word of mouth involves the preparation of a written statement of the custom, which is given to the court by the recorder himself?—That is the way in which it is practically done. He claims, of course, his right to certify it, ore tenus, and he does it formally in that way; but he hands in a written document for security.

5503. Is any record kept in the City of those certificates which are made by the recorder from time to time?—I think there is; I am not cognizant of the fact, but when

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

18th Jan. 1854.

I have made up my mind I inform the officers at the town clerk's office, and I give them the rough draft, a copy of which they, or the deputy registrar of my court, prepare for me on parchment.

5504. Have they been published in a complete form?—No; but many of them have been published in treatises upon the customs of London.

5505. Do you see any objection to allowing the public free access to the charters and documents and other records in the City, with a view of ascertaining what are the customs and what is the law in the City upon any question?—I see no objection to giving the fullest liberty to the public to have access for ordinary purposes to the records of the corporation. I could hardly go so far as to say that I can see no objection to admitting the public to the charters and title deeds of the corporation upon a subject which is in actual litigation at the time in the courts. That is a very grave question, which I observe the commissioners have pressed upon every witness connected with the City, and I should be sorry to give any very definite opinion upon the subject. There is no doubt that it might be in some cases a ground of complaint if every facility was not given to litigants contending with the City, to ascertain what the grounds of the claims of the City are. But, on the other hand, it deserves great consideration whether they would be justified in giving access to the very documents themselves upon which their title depends. In that respect, I apprehend, the corporation of London is in no different position from a corporation which manages any trust. It is contended by some that they may consider their property as strictly private property. Without going so far as that, they have, at any rate, as high a position as, and rightly as sacred as, those of the trustees of a charity. If one of the great hospitals had been in the habit of receiving certain dues by prescription, or charter, or otherwise, and if suddenly, after centuries of possession of this right, some person were to rise to dispute it, I think it would be a matter of very grave consideration whether that corporation would be justified in admitting the opposite party to a sight of the documents themselves in the first instance, in order that he might, if he chose, take technical objections to their form or effect, and so defeat that right. If they intend to rely upon them, they must produce them in a court; if they are not stamped, if there is no seal, or if there be any informality upon the face of them, they must take the consequences. But, if I remember right,—the Commissioners will correct me if I am wrong,—there was a case of some great town in which the corporation became involved in a suit in chancery, and produced voluntarily their title deeds and lost their property; and Lord Eldon rebuked them strongly for having taken that course. (See 8 Vesey jun. 141. Cock v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Chatham.)

5506. Does not the difficulty arise in this case from the very high position of the City of London in respect to its rights? Its position is certainly as high, and its rights as sacred as those of the trustee of a charity; but are they not very much higher? The City of London exercises certain rights of a very extensive character, some of which extend, for example, over the whole port of London; and its customs and charters are said to have the strength of an Act of Parliament. Under those circumstances, does not it seem reasonable that when litigation arises and an action is brought by the City, the defendant should be informed what is the nature of the public instrument, whatever it may be, upon which the right of the corporation is alleged to be founded?—No doubt the corporation is in a higher position than the trustees of the charity, inasmuch as it is a body established for the benefit of the whole community, whereas the trustees of a charity are for a specific purpose. I cannot otherwise distinguish its position in regard to litigation with other parties. I believe in the very cases in which this complaint has been made, every fair statement has been offered as to what the nature of the title of the coporation is upon which they rely. All I understand to have been refused is, the actual production of the documents till the time comes, when they must be produced in court for the purpose of the decision there.

5507. In the case of Messrs. Combe and Delafield, the City bring the defendants into Court. They claim a right which extends, or is alleged to extend, from Staines, in the county of Middlesex, to Yantlet Creek in Kent; it a right to the measuring of all measureable articles landed in the port of London. That is a right clearly of a very extensive and important kind, affecting trade very largely. The defendants say they do not know what is the ground upon which this claim is made; they file bills of discovery and they obtain what they consider no satisfactory answer. The case is carried to the House of Lords, upon appeal by the City upon the question, whether the answer made is satisfactory or not. The question is, whether in a case of that kind, involving a right of so large an extent, the defendants ought not to be put in the position of knowing exactly what is the legal basis of the claims of the City. Of course a further question would then arise as to the application of the right, whatever it may be, to the particular state of facts that the court would have to try; but ought not the defendant to be put in a position in which, without filing successive bills of discovery and having recourse to a long and expensive litigation, he should be informed of the precise legal ground upon which the City make their claim?—I have no personal knowledge of the case of Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company, beyond this, which I believe has not yet been stated; that for the last two or three years, while it has been in the House of Lords, as long at least as I have held office, it has been hung up there by the acquiescence of both parties, neither being anxious to bring it to a conclusion, and in the hope that some arrangement would be made which would get rid of all difficulties of this kind. Speaking generally, I should say it would be the duty of every public body, holding its position for the benefit of the public, to give such information as consistently with the sound advice given them by those under whose direction the suit is conducted, they could give to the opposite party of the nature of the title upon which they make their claim. But I believe in that case the corporation consulted counsel wholly independent of the City, and counsel who have since filled the highest stations in judicature and in the profession, and who advised according to their sense of what the course was which the corporation were bound to follow. I cannot think that they would have advised them to take that course if they had not thought it consistent with their public duty. At the same time it must also be be observed, that if by taking a rash step of that kind, against the advice of counsel, they had disclosed any technical matter which would have been fatal to the custom, they would then (assuming, as you must, for the purpose of considering this question, that it is a laudable custom, and one which ought to be enforced) have been responsible to their constituents and to the community for having lost that which could not be restored, by going out of the usual course and disclosing that which they were not bound by law to disclose. It is, however, I admit, a question which may be put in more ways than one, and on which I do not feel I am capable of forming a definite opinion.

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

1508. There is a distinction between asking the City to give copies of documents and afford the substantial information which is required and asking them for permission to inspect their charters, with a view of detecting technical errors, if there be any?—There is the distinction which the corporation draws. I do not believe that substantial information of the nature of the title which is insisted on has ever been withheld from any litigant. With regard to my office, I may be permitted to add, that you will find information stated generally, and, I believe, accurately, in the report of the former commissioners in 1837, and a pretty accurate statement also in Mr. Pulling's book, as well as, I believe, in his evidence. I was only appointed in the year 1850; before that time I had no connection whatever with the City, and never turned my mind to it; and since that time I have been so fully occupied, that I have had no time for antiquarian research or making myself acquainted with details.

5509. Is there any other point to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the commissioners?—There is one point in the written defence or statement that I read to the commissioners which depends upon my evidence to support it, and as to which I am anxious therefore to make a statement now. With regard to the custom of foreign attachment, I should be glad of an opportunity, on some future occasion, to make a further statement. The commissioners will observe that, in the statement I have read, it was alleged with regard to the Suit with the Crown, that it has been the subject of negotiation with the Government almost from the time it was first instituted, and that those negotiations are pending at the present moment.

5510. You allude to the suit concerning the right to the soil and bed of the River Thames?—Precisely so. As, lately, the negotiations have been carried on through myself, I felt it my duty to tender my evidence in support of that statement in the written defence. The fact is, I believe that that matter has been in negotiation from almost the first. It was felt by the City to be a harsh proceeding on the part of the Crown; but notwithstanding that, the City were anxious to avoid being involved in almost the most expensive form of litigation that the Crown could have selected; therefore they have been anxious to come to some arrangement which would be for the public benefit, as well as for the preservation of their own just rights. It is true that the course adopted by the Crown is one which by strict law they were at liberty to adopt, namely, passing by the courts of law to file an information in the nature of a discovery in the Court of Chancery, such as they have filed in this case, and calling upon the corporation to disclose their title; but it is equally true, as is mentioned in the written statement, that if that cannot be considered as an evasion of the proper course, and of the express provisions of the law on that subject, it certainly was the choice of the most harsh, and by far the most expensive and most cumbrous mode of proceeding which could have been adopted. Under the head of "Prerogative," (D. 74,) in Comyn's Digest, the commissioners will find an account of the nature of the writ of intrusion, which is the ordinary remedy for any encroachments upon the rights of the Crown, and to which they would naturally resort. At common law, upon an information of intrusion, the Crown, by its prerogative, might put the defendant to show his title specially, but in the 21st year of King James I., by a statute which I think is the 14th chapter in that year, a provision was made for the protection of the subject, that where any subject had been in possession for twenty years, the Crown should not be entitled in the writ of intrusion to call upon the defendent to support his title until the Crown itself had established its own. There is also a clause in that Act of Parliament (21st James I., chapter 14,) which prevents the Crown from resorting to a scire facias for the purpose of insisting upon the disclosure of the title of the defendant, "where information of intrusion may fitly and aptly be brought on the King's behalf;" and, "whereunto the subject shall be forced to a special pleading and be deprived of "the grace intended by this Act." It was always felt that a proceeding by writ of intrusion was the course which the Crown ought to have pursued. In consequence of that it was that the corporation were advised by a very high authority to resist this claim by every means in their power, as against the Crown; but at the same time they, of their own accord, and with the advice of their officers of that day, of whom I was not one, made every effort to come to an amicable arrangement with the Crown. I only regret that when Mr. Pemberton was examined he did not think it right to refer to that circumstance, because the gravamen of the charge, as it appears upon reading his evidence alleged against the City, seems to be a disposition to unwearied and prolonged litigation, and, in fact, a contentious spirit on their part; whereas, in point of fact, I believe the truth will establish that they have shown a very different spirit throughout. Before I was in office, but I speak of it because I had some personal knowledge of it as a member of Parliament at the time, there were negotiations upon this subject with the Crown, the results of which were embodied in a Bill which was brought into Parliament, and passed its second reading and very nearly passed through committee in the House, when, if I recollect, Mr. Duncombe, one of the members for one of the metropolitan districts, took exception to it as being too favourable to the Crown as well as to the corporation, and unfavourable to the interests of the inhabitants of some parts of the metropolis. It had been once re-committed on Mr. Duncombe's motion, and was re-committed a second time. Mr. Cardwell and myself were put upon that committee on the second re-committal of the bill, I being at the time interested for the Temple, as an inhabitant of part of the banks of the river. The arrangements being connected with the project for an embankment in front of Temple Gardens, I was put upon the committee to represent that interest. Together with Mr. Duncombe, therefore, I endeavoured to defeat the measure. We carried an amendment in the committee and reported, but afterwards the Bill was not proceeded with. The names on the back of the Bill were those of Mr. Masterman and Mr. Pattison, members for the City, Lord Morpeth, then Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and Mr. Ward, the Secretary to the Admiralty. There certainly was an arrangement, therefore, between the Crown and the City, and it was among other things recited in the preamble, that the Crown on one side, and the corporation on the other, were willing to forego their claims to the soil and bed of the river, and transfer them to a board of conservancy, which at that time was projected. There is this recital in the bill: "Whereas the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, in right of her Crown, claims to "be seised of the grounds or soil and bed of the River Thames, and the shores thereof, "so far as the tide flows and reflows in the said river; and the Mayor and commonalty "and citizens are conservators of the said river, and claim to be entitled to so much "of the ground or soil and bed of the said river, and the shores thereof, as lie within "the limits and bounds of their jurisdiction as conservators; and a suit has been "instituted by her Majesty's Attorney General, on behalf of her Majesty, against the "Mayor and commonalty and citizens for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the "rights of her Majesty and of the Mayor and commonalty and citizens, and such suit is still "pending. And whereas, in consideration of the alleged insufficiency of the funds at "present applicable to the conservancy and improvement of the said river, her Majesty "has been graciously pleased to concede the claim of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, "to all rents, fines, and other proceeds which have already arisen or shall hereafter arise "from lands reclaimed by embankment from the said river, and from piers and landing "places constructed on the shores thereof, and to consent that all such rents, fines, and "other proceeds shall be received by the conservators hereby appointed and applied by "them to the purposes of this Act, and the Mayor and commonalty and citizens have "likewise consented to such appropriation of the said rents, fines, and other proceeds." Shewing, therefore that the Crown had consented to forego its claim and hand it over to a board, and that the corporation also had consented to forego their claim, and submit to that arrangement.

Rt. Hon. J. A. S. Wortley, M.P.

5511. In whom would the conservancy of the River Thames have been vested if that Bill had passed?—That would appear by the Bill itself. That was the point upon which it all turned, who was to have the conservancy. It was a mixed body; part of them were to be necessarily taken from the City. "The Lord Mayor for the time being of the "City of London, shall be one of the conservators; that three other of such "shall be aldermen of the City of London, and shall be elected by the Court of "Mayor and Aldermen of the said City in the inner chamber; that six other of such "conservators shall be members of the Common Council of the said City, and shall be "elected by the Mayor, aldermen, and commons of the said City in common council "assembled, and that the remaining five of such conservators shall be elected by the "Mayor, aldermen, and commons of the City of London, in common council assembled "subject to the approval and provisions herein-after mentioned."

5512. In truth then, it was a civic body still?—It was still a civic body. That was the state of things before the committee. This is a print of the Bill as amended in committee on the second re-commitment.

5513. In what sense could that Bill be said to take the conservancy of the River Thames away from the City of London, when apparently the new body which was to be constituted was taken from the corporation of the City?—The Bill was withdrawn by the City when there was forced upon them an admixture from other portions of the metropolis in this board.

5514. I understand you to say that the object of the Bill was, to take the conservancy and the ownership of the soil away both from the Crown and the City, and to vest it in some new body; yet when the Bill comes to say what the new body is to be, it appears to be the City in another form?—That is so; there were, however, certain limitations of the powers of conservancy which made their position a very different one. It certainly was in the nature of a compromise, which the corporation had assented to, and which the Crown had assented to. That was in the year 1847. I have no knowledge of what occurred between that time and the year of my appointment, which was the year 1850, except this, that I believe it was in that interval that the suit was resumed by the Crown, and I believe that a good deal of asperity of feeling arose between those who had conducted the negotiations on each side. Mr. Pemberton conducted it on one side, and the remembrancer on the other; and there was, no doubt, a good deal of feeling between the parties on the subject. Shortly after I came into office, I became aware of the nature of the suit, and it immediately occurred to me that it was a matter which ought again to be made the subject of negotiation with the Government, and that possibly the accession of a new officer to office might afford an opportunity for negotiation. There were also at that time other grave questions between the Government and the corporation; there had been differences before that time about the removal of Smithfield Market, and whether the Government or the corporation were to take the new market into their hands; and looking to this subject, also, which had been a subject of unfortunate difference, as I thought, between the corporation and the Government, I obtained (with perfect ease, I must say) from the corporation and those who conducted that portion of its business, permission to open a negotiation with the Government, and also to ascertain what the feeling of the Government would be with respect to a measure which was then contemplated, and subsequently brought forward in the year 1852, for extending the franchise of the City and making other alterations in the constitution of the corporation itself. Those provisions were afterwards embodied in the Bill of 1852, as the Commissioners have already heard, and that Bill passed the second reading in the House of Commons, with the assent of Government. With the sanction of the committee to whom these matters were referred by the corporation, I opened a negotiation with the Governmet of Lord John Russell, and being anxious to keep the negotiations in the hands of the heads of the departments rather than those who had been mixed up with the dispute, I communicated with Lord John Russell in the first instance. I asked for and obtained a meeting with him and Lord Seymour, and Sir Francis Baring, the First Lord of the Admiralty. Eventually the matter was referred by them to Lord Seymour, who at that time was at the head of the Woods and Forests, and in that capacity had cognizance of this matter; though afterwards that office was divided between the Board of Works and the Board of Land Revenue, it was left in Lord Seymour's hands to negotiate with me upon the subject. I have Lord Seymour's perfect permission, if it is required, to read the whole of that correspondence, though it was of a confidential nature. Being, however, of a confidential nature, I do not think it is necessary that I should read it in detail, but I may state what the result of that correspondence was. In the course of it I drew up a sort of minute of what the propositions on the part of the corporation were, and Lord Seymour, in the shape of an answer to that letter, stated his view of what the points of agreement should be; they substantially coincided, and eventually it was agreed that upon those terms a document should be framed which would embody the settlement of that question. I may state, generally, that the propositions were of this nature: Lord Seymour said he could enter into no negotiation and into no terms which would not have the effect of establishing the right of the Crown to the bed and soil of the River Thames. The corporation proposed, for the purpose of meeting his views in that respect, to take under the Crown a charter with a grant of the bed and soil of the river on certain terms, the acceptance of that grant, of course, having the effect of precluding them from ever again disputing the right of the Crown to the bed and soil of the river. The corporation were willing that the Crown should have the abstract right to the bed and soil, only asking to have such a control over that portion of the bed and soil of the river which was necessary for the purpose of an efficient conservancy. Further provisions were proposed, that the whole of the revenue derived from the bed and soil of the river should be applied to the improvement of the river itself, or expended upon the banks of the river in public improvements; that is, that so far as regarded the river, any rents derived from wharves or jetties, or any other licenses upon the river, should be paid into a particular fund, kept entirely separate; and we went so far as to leave a blank in the proposition, which I have in my hand (and which is still a blank) for the Government to fill up with any proportionate part of that revenue which they chose to assume to their own control and their own purposes, it being provided that whatever portion of the revenue was left in the hands of the corporation should be strictly applied to the purposes of improving the river, and that that portion which was to be attributed to the Government should be strictly applied to public improvements upon the banks or approaches to the river.

5515. Was any stipulation made on the part of the Government that they should have any share in the managing body that was to control the river?—This arrangement did not include any such proposition; on the contrary, it provided, in compensation, as I may say, for their allowing the Crown to assume the right to the bed and soil, an admission which they consented to make by taking a charter that the conservancy of the Thames should be left in the hands of the Lord Mayor, in the form in which it now is, leaving it of course to Parliament, if they chose, to interfere at any future time to make a new arrangement. Eventually, upon those principles an arrangement was come to, without prejudice to either party, of course, if not carried into effect between Lord Seymour and myself. Lord Seymour did not consult the solicitor who had had the conduct of the cause and of the previous negotiations, for the reason I have already given, but he consulted the Solicitor General, Sir William Page Wood, who advised him throughout in that transaction. I was put in communication with Sir William Page Wood, upon the subject, and after very mature consultation, we prepared, on the part of the City, the form of a charter which I hold in my hand. That charter was submitted to Sir William Page Wood, who made several suggested alterations in it in red ink, and the only matter left undecided was the mode in which that charter should be framed, and the manner in which the suit should be put an end to in the Court of Chancery; the Crown pressing for a decree, and we contending that if we gave up so much it was not necessary to have a decree, and that proceedings might be stayed. There was not a prospect of much difficulty upon those subjects when, unfortunately, the Government broke up. Subsequently, Lord John Manners was in the Office of Works. He never was in the Office of Land Revenues; but, being in the Office of Works, we applied to Lord Derby's Government, and the matter was again referred to Lord John Manners. He had an opportunity of seeing the whole of the correspondence with Lord Seymour; and seeing that the matter had been so fully arranged with the exceptions I have mentioned, he was willing that it should be carried on to a conclusion without making himself responsible for the details of the arrangement. Unfortunately, we were again deprived of his assistance by the breaking up of that Government, the present Government coming into office at the beginning of 1853. You are aware how much their time was occupied during the whole of last session; and in vain we endeavoured to get their attention to the subject. It was not left to Sir William Molesworth, for this reason; when Lord John Manners had decided to let the thing go on, he sent it to the Board of Land Revenue, for it to be submitted to the law officers. Sir Frederick Thesiger had refused to take any responsibility about it unless it was laid officially before him. In that way it got back into the hands of the Commissioners of Land Revenue, and of Mr. Pemberton, who was the solicitor to that board, and the solicitor also conducting the suit. The result was, that it was referred to the Treasury, and, no doubt, with some cautionary note to look into the matter. The result of that has been, that towards the end of last session, after an interview with the ministers themselves, and taking every step we could to force the matter on, it was considered by the Treasury. We heard nothing more till the beginning of last month, but I have here the correspondence which has taken place quite recently, and which, being official, I have no difficulty in stating to the commission. It shews the accuracy of the statement in the defence, that those negotiations are pending up to the present moment. This is a letter from Mr. James Wilson, the Secretary to the Treasury, dated the 8th of December 1853:—"Sir, I am commanded "by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you, with reference "to your letter of the 2d November 1852, to Lord John Manners, on the subject of the "long pending dispute and litigation between the Crown and the corporation of London, "in regard to the title to the bed and soil of the River Thames (copy of which has been "furnished to this Board), and also with reference to the personal communications you "have had with my Lords, that their Lordships are advised no charter can be granted "in this case, affecting, as it does, the hereditary possessions and land revenue of the "Crown, without the sanction of Parliament, and without such compensation to the "land revenue as may be deemed reasonable. I am further to state that my Lords "are prepared to concur in an application to Parliament for an Act to carry out "a plan based upon such principles, as soon as its details shall have been agreed upon, "and that they have authorized Mr. Gore, one of the Commissioners of Woods and "Forests, &c, with the aid of such advice as he may deem necessary, to meet any person "appointed by the corporation, if such course be acceptable to them, with a view of "discussing and proposing, for the sanction of my Lords, such terms as may be deemed "equitable. I should state that the passage relating to the sanction of Parliament, alludes to the statute of Anne, which prohibits the alienation of any of the hereditary possessions of the Crown, and in the course of the correspondence with Lord Seymour I had on behalf of the corporation expressed my willingness if it was necessary to go to Parliament for an Act to authorise the proposed arrangement. My answer to that letter was on the 13th of January; it is addressed to Mr. Wilson, and it is in these terms:—"13th January "1854. Sir, since receiving your letter of the 8th December, I have had an opportunity "of consulting those by whose authority I had already conducted the negotiation with "respect to the pending suit between the Crown and the corporation of the City of "London, and which was all but brought to a conclusion at the time of Lord Seymour's "retirement from office on terms satisfactory to that noble lord, and afterwards approved "by Lord John Manners; and though I regret to find that the Treasury are "unwilling to ratify an arrangement which I had considered as substantially concluded, "I have now full authority to re-open the question with Mr. Gore, or any other person "to whom it may be referred by the Government. Though the corporation were advised "that this proposed arrangement, being the compromise of a pending suit, was no alien-"ation of the revenues or possessions of the Crown, requiring an Act of Parliament, yet "they have never been unwilling to join in an application to Parliament for its sanction "if thought necessary. With regard to compensation, I hardly know to what question "your letter refers, as the negotiation has always proceeded on the footing of willingness "on the part of the corporation to surrender any part of the revenues derived from the " use of the bed and soil of the river to be applied by the Crown for the public benefit, " on the sole condition of being secured in their possession of the soil of the river to such " an extent as to enable them to exercise an efficient conservancy in the navigable water- " way." The answer to that I only received last night :—" 17 January 1854. Sir, I am com- " manded by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you that " your letter of the 13th instant, further relative to the suit between the Crown and the " corporation of the City of London, has been referred to the Honourable Charles Gore, " who is duly authorised to enter into negotiation with you with regard to this question, " on the footing laid down in the letter from this board of the 8th ultimo, I remain, " Sir, your obedient servant, James Wilson." This correspondence shows that those negotiations, upon principles which had been more or less approved by more than one person in office, are at this moment re-opened and continuing. Whether, if this commission should come to any definite recommendation on the subject, it may alter the arrangement, I cannot say; but that the corporation are as ready now as ever to negotiate the arrangement of that suit on liberal principles, beneficial to the public as well as just to themselves, is an undoubted fact which I thought it right to bring before the commission.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

18th Jan. 1854.

CHARLES PEARSON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

5516. You are solicitor to the City of London, are you not?—I am.

5517. How long have you held that situation?—Fifteen years.

5518. What is the salary attached to that office?—The salary is 2,000*l.* a year, subject to the charges of the office, clerks, and all other expenses.

5519. What is the average amount of those deductions?—The average amount of the deductions is about 700*l.* a year, but then there are certain emoluments which I am entitled to receive, and which make up a net income of 1,700*l.* or 1,750*l.* a year.

5520. What is the nature of those emoluments?—They are costs in cases of actions, and in business under Acts of Parliament for trust estates.

5521. Are they of a variable nature?—In amount they are variable.

5522. They depend upon the amount of business transacted?—Yes.

5523. What is about the average annual amount of your receipts, from the City?—Altogether 1,750*l.*; that includes every description of emolument from every source.

5524. Besides that, do you not derive some emolument from business which you do for the City?—Every description of emolument which I receive, I am sorry to say, does not exceed 1,750*l.*

5525. Have you any private business as a solicitor?—I have not. I am not permitted to have, by the terms of my appointment. I am solicitor to the Irish Society. I am an attorney of the Mayor's Court, but every description of emolument derived from every source is included in the sum I have named.

5526. You are not paid as an ordinary solicitor would be for the transaction of the City business?—If I were, my emoluments would be certainly from 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* a year. For the business under the trust estates, my bills are taxed by what is termed the Law Bills committee, composed of a number of solicitors, and I have no hesitation in saying that I myself, in common with all the officers of the departments, should be very glad if our bills were taxed by the ordinary taxing officers. There is much greater severity applied in taxation by the Law Bills committee than by the ordinary taxing officers. As an instance of that, I should state that one of my bills to the Irish Society was sent up to the taxing officer, at the request of the society, because they were taxing another solicitor's bill. The taxing officer sent a message to the society that if he had had the making out of that bill, he should have added 80*l.* to it—that is to a bill which was 180*l.*, he should have added 80*l.* I did not get the additional 80*l.* I had the 180*l.* only. I may say that I have not been accustomed to speak of my income as being so small as it is. I have been very willing that the world should think I was a much more highly paid officer. Men frequently measure our talent and station by our receipts, and I have been quite satisfied to be measured by that standard taking the supposed higher amount.

5527. What are your functions and duties as solicitor to the City of London?—My functions and duties are to advise the corporation and all its Committees and Commissions upon any question of law, to conduct all their suits and prosecutions, and generally to advise upon all matters when specially called on to do so, to attend the committees whenever called on, and to give my best advice upon all matters on which my opinion may be asked.

5528. When you conduct a suit on behalf of the City of London, with whom do you communicate with regard to the policy of originally instituting the suit or with regard to the manner in which it shall be conducted?—I receive directions from the Court of Common Council through the committee, and I am in constant communication with that committee upon all matters connected with that particular suit.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

5529. Is that committee composed of professional men?—One committee is composed of professional men, which is the Law Bills committee. It has laymen upon it, but the preponderance of the members consists of professional men; the other committee is not composed of professional men, but they have professional men associated with them. There is scarcely a committee of the corporation, I should think, which has not one solicitor or more upon it, having regard to the proportion which the mass of solicitors bears to the mass of the common council.

5530. There is no one legal officer connected with the corporation who takes the general control of the legal business, and under whose direction you act in any manner, is there?—There is not. Before the passing of the Central Criminal Court Act, the recorder and the common serjeant appeared in court as the counsel for the City of London. Latterly they have been so entirely withdrawn from general practice, that they have declined to take briefs. The late recorder, considering the changes which constantly take place in the decisions of the judges, thought it was not for the advantage of the City that he should take a leading part in the conduct of its suits.

5531. You think the judicial and other duties of the recorder would now render it impossible for him to exercise a general control of that description?—I do.

5532. Do not you think it would be desirable that there should be some law officer who should exercise a control of that description?—I think it undesirable for me to express an opinion upon changes. Considerable difference of opinion prevails in regard to many of the functions of the officers, and I think it not satisfactory for me to give an opinion upon that subject.

5533. At present I suppose it rests very much in your discretion whether a suit should be instituted, or in what manner that suit should be conducted after it is instituted?—Quite the reverse.

5534. With whom does the discretion practically rest?—With counsel; with the attorney general, the solicitor general, and the most eminent counsel of the day. I am instructed to lay a case before counsel of the most eminent rank, and it is upon their advice, with the concurrence frequently of the recorder, that suits are instituted or defended.

5535. I suppose the opinion of the attorney or solicitor general would be given chiefly with respect to the probability of winning the suit?—Upon the probability of the result; the responsibility of instituting it rests in the corporation and its committees.

5536. Upon a question of that sort, do you think the committee really can exercise practical control?—The town clerk, who is a very experienced barrister, I believe the senior serjeant, and well acquainted with corporation law, when called on by the committee, advises them as to the policy of engaging in any legal proceedings; and if they ask my opinion, I give it them frankly and to the best of my judgment.

5537. Is the town clerk uniformly called on by the committee to express an opinion as to the advisability of instituting a suit, and the manner it which it should be conducted?—I think he is.

5538. He is not a member of the committee?—He is not, and I do not recognize him as a lawyer there.

5539. You do not consider the town clerk really responsible for the business, but rather yourself?—Certainly; and I always state that to the committee. Out of that room I respect very highly the judgment of Mr. Serjeant Merewether; but there I hold it to be my duty as City solicitor to vindicate the opinion of the City solicitor.

5540. You are the adviser of the committee as to whether a suit should be instituted, and the manner in which the suit should be conducted?—I consider myself bound to tell them what I believe to be the law of the case. The policy of instituting a proceeding, I think, belongs to the committee.

5541. Do not you think it advisable that there should be some one lawyer of eminence who should be generally responsible for the policy of instituting suits and commencing litigation on the part of the corporation of the City of London?—I think the judgment of the committee is generally very good, and I think the advice of their officers is generally cautious and sound and prudent; and I do not know that they would escape from the difficulties in which they are sometimes placed by any other course which they could adopt.

5542. Who prepares the case which is submitted to counsel?—It is prepared by the solicitor and read to the committee.

5543. Probably the opinion which is obtained from counsel as to the institution of any action or any proceedings, is a good deal guided by the nature of the case which is submitted to them?—No doubt it might be so, if the party presenting the case mis-stated the facts. Of course the opinion of counsel would only be founded upon the statement of facts; if they fail, the opinion will fail with it.

5544. Take the case of the proceeding that was instituted against Messrs. Combe and Delafield; how was that managed?—I should state that, in 1833, when I was a member of the corporation, I brought in a bill and passed an Act through the court, to gradually reduce, and ultimately to abolish, if it was thought necessary, the Fellowship of Porters, by making every porter sign a paper, that if the exigencies of the trade should require it, the institution might be put an end to without any claim for compensation. There were then 3,500 porters admitted, and Messrs. Combe and Company, and some other persons had then begun to refuse to allow them to work. This Act has been in operation from that period, and I believe now it has left only something like 600 or 700 persons whom we should be obliged to deal with in the shape of compensation if we were to put an end to it. The attention of the corporation has continually been directed to the period when we shall be enabled to deal with the port of London without the restraints which were then imposed from the existing interests. The Fellowship of Porters, in the year 1835, applied to the corporation to permit them to use their name to institute proceedings against Messrs. Combe and Company, for refusing to allow them to land their corn. This was in October 1835. Messrs. Combe and Company filed a cross bill against the corporation in that suit on the 5th of December 1838. This you will observe was before I was City solicitor; I do not know therefore who was responsible for those proceedings. That cross bill was for a discovery. The answer of the corporation was put in on the 18th of June 1839. Messrs. Combe and Company amended their bill, not having put their questions sufficiently strongly, or perhaps getting information from our answer, which induced them to put others. We answered that amended bill in February, 1840. There was a motion made before Lord Abinger to compel us to produce our title, and this is copy from the short-hand writer's notes of Lord Abinger's judgment. Lord Abinger gives this as a test of the principle by which, in his judgment, the courts decided the question of the production of documents. "If you take the question as a matter of principle, has "any man a right, or is it consistent with common justice, that he should file a bill to "discover the defendant's case? The ground upon which he files his bill is to make the "defendnat discover what is material to his, the plaintiff's, case, but he has no right to ask "of the defendant: Tell me what your title is—tell me what your case is—tell me how "you mean to prove it—tell me the evidence you have to support it—disclose the docu-"ments you mean to make use of in supporting it—tell me all those things, that I may "pick a hole in them. Surely that is not the principle of a bill of discovery." The judgment is at greater length, and I quote that portion of it for the purpose of stating the defence that the corporation made for having a protection of their documents by the course of law from the discovery which was sought. Lord Abinger refused the discovery sought in that case. He ordered us to produce certain documents, which we did. The other party applied to Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, on the 19th of January 1842, who settled the issues for the trial at law, and ordered it to be tried at the Winchester Assizes.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

5545. Was that in the same suit in which Lord Abinger had given judgment?—Yes. Under that decision we prepared ourselves for trial, and that case might have been decided in the spring of 1842 if Messrs. Combe and Company had chosen to go to trial upon the issues framed between the parties by the direction of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce; but in the meantime, the corporation, in 1839, had filed a bill in the Exchequer against Messrs. Combe and Company, in respect of metage. It was the opinion of counsel, in the porterage case, that the corporation ought not to appear merely as plaintiffs in that suit, but should have a sister suit for metage. I again have no reason to doubt that this was perfectly properly done; but at the same time, it was not during my reign. I was not City solicitor at that time. I know, however, that the advice of the first counsel of the day was taken, who recommended that course of action. Various proceedings took place between that period and 1842, when, on the 9th of June, Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce pronounced a decision different to that which Lord Abinger had pronounced.

5546. Were not there in those various proceedings three successive bills of discovery filed against the City, and three answers put in?—There were three separate bills of discovery, and it is a very frequent practice that the plaintiff discovers something in the answer of his antagonist which leads him to put another question founded upon it. Upon our answer something else was ascertained, and they amended their bill and obtained a further answer. The fact of amending a bill implies that the bill was not sufficiently comprehensive. Although they have obtained answers to their questions, they amend their bill and ask further questions. In a suit of this magnitude and importance, it is a circumstance of frequent occurrence.

5547. Were the amendments suggested by the answer in this case?—Yes. Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, having pronounced this judgment on the 9th of June 1842, calling upon us to produce those documents which Lord Abinger had thought were protected, an appeal to the Lord Chancellor was lodged; it was heard before the Lord Chancellor on the 26th, the 27th, the 28th, and the 30th of January 1843. The Lord Chancellor took three years to consider his judgment, from the 30th of January 1843 to January 1846. He then pronounced a judgment so exceedingly short that it contained no reason and no statement of opinion, beyond affirming the judgment of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce.

5548. He did affirm the order of the Vice Chancellor?—Yes. Sir Richard Bethell, who advised upon the occasion, recommended an appeal, and he gave the following reasons for the appeal:—"First, Because the principle upon which a court of equity gives a plaintiff "who files a bill of discovery an inspection of documents, submitted by the defendant's "answer to be in his possession, requires the plaintiff to state in his bill that such documents "are material to prove the case which he has made in his bill, and as an admission by the "defendant that such documents do relate to the case so stated in the bill; but in the present "case no such statement is made by the bill of the respondents, nor can any such admission "be found in the answer of the appellants. Secondly, Because the plaintiff in equity in a dis-"covery suit is entitled to the inspection of documents in the defendant's possession, merely

Charles Pearson, Esq.

" upon the ground that they may possibly upon inspection be found to aid his defence, by " discovering some defect in the title of his adversary, which ground, however, is the foun- " dation of the order appealed from. Thirdly, Because it plainly appears, as the appellants " submit upon the bill of the respondents, that such bill has not been filed for the purpose " of obtaining proof of any substantial defence, but rather in the hope of finding defects in " the title of the appellants, the corporation of London. Fourthly, Because the plaintiff " must show, from the admissions in the answer, that he could require the defendant to set " out the admitted documents ; he must prove from the answer affirmatively his title to dis- " covery, and cannot claim the production on the ground that the answer does not disprove " his interests in the documents, or does not negative the possibility of his having an interest " in them. Fifthly, Because the documents mentioned, or referred to in the order of the 9th " day of June 1842, are the evidence or material parts of the evidence for the appellants, " the corporation of London, of the existence of their right of metage, and its exercise for " centuries past. Sixthly, Because the order appealed from, if unreversed, is an authority " for the position that a plaintiff may file a bill of discovery, and compel his opponent to " produce the whole of the documentary evidence on which he relies, unless such opponent " pledges his oath that no part of such documentary evidence can in any manner tend to " sustain the opposition to the demand, which it is conceived greatly exceeds the just limits " of the right to a discovery in equity, and will be most prejudicial by encouraging parties " to contest rights founded upon long-established usage, in the hope, or upon the speculation, " that some latent objection may be discovered by which, upon mere technical grounds, such " rights may be defeated."

5549. From what are you reading?—From the case in the House of Lords signed by counsel.

5550. Those are not the grounds upon which Mr. Bethell recommended the appeal to the City, are they?—Yes, they are.

5551. They are the grounds stated to the House of Lords?—They are more technically framed here, but they are the grounds upon which the advice was given to the City. The reasons are only signed by two counsel, but other counsel concurred in them. The advice to appeal I submitted to my clients, as it was my duty to do, and I apprehend that a great responsibility would have been thrown upon the committee if, with such advice, they had not adopted the course of directing an appeal.

5552. There were three answers in the metage suit, were not there?—The bill of discovery was filed in March, 1840; the answer was put in on the 29th of January, 1841; exceptions were taken to the answer of the corporation on the 24th of March; the bill of discovery was amended on the 17th of April; the further answer of the corporation was on the 17th of November; the exceptions to the answer of the corporation on the 29th of November; and the further answer on the 23d of February.

5553. Did the necessity for those further answers arise from exceptions or from amended bills?—Once from the amendment of the bill, and twice from exceptions.

5554. The party excepting meant to allege that the information furnished was insufficient and unsatisfactory, did he not?—It did not technically cover the statement in the bill.

5555. It is an objection to the answer in the nature of a demurrer at common law?—Yes.

5556. Whereas the amendment of the bill proceeds upon the supposition that the answer is sufficient as the bill originally stood, but that something has suggested itself to those who framed the bill, which was not included in the original bill?—That is the case.

5557. Therefore the one admits the sufficiency of the answer and asks some further questions, whereas the exceptions are a denial of the sufficiency of the answer itself?—Yes. The Commissioners will remember that we are criticising in 1853 proceedings which took place ten years ago, when the habit of the profession was undoubtedly much more favourable to litigation than it is now. I should state that this case was appealed to the House of Lords in 1845, when this document was printed, and there the case has remained from 1845 to 1854. It has never been moved in by anybody, nor meddled with by anybody. That has not been, as the learned recorder rather mistook in saying, by any arrangement between the parties. I have never inquired into it, and my antagonist has never inquired into it. I have seen the corporation arrive at a period when it is very likely they would wish that such a suit had never been brought, because they are not enforcing their right under such circumstances or attempting to enforce it, and I believe the spirit of the corporation, in common with the spirit of the age, would not choose to enforce any such claim in the present day. I dare say Messrs. Combe and Delafield are very well satisfied, because probably they are saving 700*l.* or 800*l.* a year, which they would have to pay if it were given against them. We should obtain a barren triumph if we got a decision in our favour, for we should get a privilege that we have no disposition to use, we having been during this time in negociation with the corn trade to put an end to all such claims. I dare say if anybody would enter a stet processus we should be perfectly satisfied on both sides.

5558. Do you mean pendente lite those claims are not enforced against Messrs. Combe?—They are not.

5559. Of course if the action is not persisted in the claim remains in abeyance?—Certainly.

5560. Upon an appeal to the House of Lords whose duty is it to press on the suit?—Anybody who wishes it settled.

5561. Is it ordinarily considered the duty of the appellant or of the respondent?—I do not think it is a matter of duty to either party; either party can do it.

5562. Is not it usually considered the duty of the appellant and not of the respondent to press forward an appeal?—I do not think it is the duty of anybody to press forward that which he does not wish for. If anybody wishes that suit to be settled it is his business to press it forward. I do not want it settled either way; it is a barren right—a right that we probably should not attempt to enforce.

5563. Is there any period within which, if that appeal is not pressed forward, it must be dropped in the House of Lords?—I supposed it had dropped. When a late Lord Chancellor was appointed, in consequence of some discussion in regard to arrears, the archives of the House of Lords were swept. This case was found among others; it was put in the paper two years ago, and we had to retain counsel to argue it.

5564. How came it not to be argued?—I do not know; it slipped out of the paper again in some way.

5565. By which party was it put into the paper?—By the officers of the House of Lords. We received a notification that this case stood for argument. We immediately raised our array of lawyers, put ourselves in an attitude for fighting, but it was just at the close of the session, and the case was not, for some reason or other, called on.

5566. When you say that it would have been a barren triumph to the City, is your meaning that the City do not now wish to enforce the metage dues against persons who are not desirous of having their goods measured. The City duties enforce their metage dues in general, do they not?—Mr. Town Clerk has opened the fact to the Commissioners, and therefore I feel myself at liberty to do so, that there is a negotiation now pending, and has been for the last eighteen months, with the members of the corn trade for putting the metage question on a more satisfactory footing, part of the arrangement being that in cases like that of Messrs. Combe it should be left voluntary, and not be compulsory.

5567. Do you imagine that the principle which the City are going to act on is wide enough to form the basis of a future arrangement, in which all claims for metage of every description in the Port of London shall be merely for service voluntarily accepted?—No. The proposed arrangement with the heads of the trade is that in regard to foreign corn it shall be compulsory; in regard to other portions of trade, for instance manufactured articles, it shall be voluntary. Mr. Recorder and myself gave an opinion to the committee, that this being a prescriptive right this could not be done without the authority of Parliament. We therefore felt it our duty to recommend to the corporation not to enter into this arrangement, by which we might lose one right and not gain another; but to be prepared to go to Parliament for an Act for the purpose of putting the metage upon a footing that would be satisfactory to both the trade and the corporation.

5568. It was stated that the necessary notices had been given to enable the City to go to Parliament?—I do not know what notices might be required. I do not think such a Bill would require notices.

5569. How does the porterage case stand?—It stands over, on the application of Messrs. Combe and Delafield that it should stand over till the other suit is decided.

5570. Till the question as to the discovery is decided?—Yes. We were prepared to go to trial; they asked for a stay of proceedings in that case till the other should be decided.

5571. The Commissioners have received from Mr. Pemberton, the solicitor to the Board of Land Revenue, a statement of the proceedings taken against the City in regard to the ownership of the bed and soil of the Thames. Do you wish to make any statement in regard to the evidence taken in reference to that case?—Yes; that is a case of a struggle between the Crown and the corporation to determine whether the soil and bed of the river is part of the hereditary revenue of the Crown, to be applied for the purposes of the Crown, or whether it is the property of the corporation, to be applied for the purposes of the river. It arose out of a transaction for which in my office I am responsible. It is better to read a document published years ago than to give my own version of the case now. In 1842, the committee thus report:—They "certify that serious complaints "have at different times been made to your committee of various projections in the river "Thames occasioning more or less obstruction to the navigation, and creating on the "adjacent shores deposits of mud and silt, charged with the contents of sewers and with "refuse animal and vegetable substances equally offensive to the sight and dangerous to "public health. These projections, it appears, have been erected not only without "the sanction of your committee, but in some instances in avowed defiance of their "authority. In consequence of this state of circumstances, your committee referred the "same to the City solicitor, to consider and report upon the best measures to be adopted "to put an end to this growing evil. In some cases the solicitor received directions to "commence proceedings to abate the nuisance; but having experienced some unexpected "difficulties, your committee desired him to confer with the recorder and common ser-"jeant, and other eminent counsel, as to the best course to pursue under the circum-"stances stated. Many of the encroachments upon the river against which complaints "had been made were used, some as floating and some as fixed piers, for the landing and "embarking of steam passengers, and were many of them in form and construction

Charles Pearson, Esq.

"similar to some which the present and former committees had been induced to permit "to remain on sufferance, by reason of representations made to them that it was abso- "lutely necessary so far to consult the convenience of the thousands who resorted to the "accommodation of steam-boats for business or recreation, as to allow piers or landing "places in such of the populous parts of the river banks as would admit of pro- "jections without obstructing the navigation of the stream. Your committee re- "ceived a report from the City solicitor that it was the opinion of counsel, in "which his own experience concurred, that although every one of the projections "complained of was undoubtedly a nuisance, and the continuance thereof an in- "dictable offence, yet such a growing indisposition existed on the part of the "magistrates and juries to convict in cases of projections where public accommodation "was favoured by their continuance as piers for the use of steam passengers, that the con- "servators of the river could not with safety proceed to put their authority in force, by re- "moving the piers in question, while others, apparently under similar circumstances, were "permitted to remain. In order to place the conservators of the river in a position to ex- "ecute their authority with becoming effect, it was recommended by counsel that they "should immediately cause a survey to be made of the banks and bed of the river within "the limits of their jurisdiction, and that a line should be laid down, beyond which all "present and future encroachments upon the banks should be removed, by whatever "authority and under whatever circumstances made, and regardless to whom they might "belong; and in order that the corporation might be placed upon the highest possible "ground in the course they were about to adopt, the counsel recommended that engineers "of high character and standing in their profession should be employed to act with the "officers of the committee in carrying into execution the proposed survey and report." It then goes on to state what the town clerk opened to the Commission, that Captain Bullock, Mr. Walker, the eminent engineer, and the officers of the conservancy and the harbour service, had acted together in making this survey, which I think cost 1,700*l.*; my advice being, that there should be one uniform principle acted on, and not, as had been the case for a century, leave given to make embankments here and encroachments there without reference to sufficient professional authority. The report proceeds: "Your committee "upon the whole are of opinion that such of the beneficial recommendations embraced in "the reports as can be carried out under the authority of the corporation, should be "adopted, and that it should be referred back to your committee if necessary, further to "confer with the counsel who have been already consulted, and having laid before them "the information of which possession has been recently obtained, that they should be "called upon to advise your committee as to the proper means to be adopted for the "purpose of maintaining and enforcing the authority of the corporation as conservators "of the river, and of giving effect to such of the recommendations contained in the reports "as may be calculated (while the rights of private property are strictly respected) to re- "move the nuisances now complained of as offensive to the sight and injurious to health, "and to put the river in the best condition to afford every practical facility for its free "navigation, whether for the purposes of commerce, recreation, or health." This book contains the report of all the officers, together with a plan of the river, reduced from one which is I think 50 feet long, shewing the line laid down by these eminent men. The opinion of counsel upon that I will take leave to read. This is the opinion given by Sir Thomas Wilde, Mr. Robert Vaughan Richards, Serjeant Channel, Mr. Mirehouse, the Common Serjeant, Mr. Russell Gurney, and Mr. James Wilde, founded upon the report of those officers, the report of the committee, and the production to them of copies of the documents in the repertories of the corporation, in regard to the soil and bed of the river, and the conservancy: "We have perused the very important and extensive collection of "documents which accompany this case, and have attentively considered the effect of "them, and of the several authorities to which they refer in relation to the power of the "corporation, to accomplish the very desirable ends suggested in the report of the "engineers, and we are of opinion that there is little probability of any effectual "impediment presenting itself to the successful prosecution of the objects of that report. "It is clear that the powers of the corporation over the river are various and extensive, "and while we are aware that the caprice or selfishness of individuals may create some "obstacles, the exact nature of which we cannot now anticipate, and which may require, "with reference to the circumstances attending them, particular consideration as to the "precise mode of overcoming them, we yet feel convinced that the proceedings being "conducted under the influence of that good sense and moderation which will stimulate "the body superintending them, the power of the corporation will, as we have before "stated, be found adequate to the attainment of the destined object. One principal point "to which we have addressed our attention relates to the ownership of the bed of the "river; and it appears to us, after deliberate consideration, that the evidence is sufficient "to establish the title of the City to such ownership. Although the ownership of the "soil in whomsoever vested is subject to and subordinate to the right of the public to "the free use of the navigation of the river, yet very important powers result from such "ownership in relation to the objects of this case, especially in the removal of erections "and encroachments made within twenty years. We are also of opinion that very con- "siderable power is vested in the Lord Mayor in respect of his character of conservator "of the river and navigation; and likewise we are satisfied that the Court of Conser-

" vancy is a legal court, and possesses an extensive jurisdiction, which may be legitimately " exercised in furtherance of the objects of the engineers' report. We cannot pretend to " define in accurate legal terms the precise extent and boundary of the powers of the " Lord Mayor as conservator of the navigation, or of the water bailiff as sub-conservator, " beyond a power of removal of modern obstructions and impediments accompanied by " an interference with the soil of the river ; but although, as we have before stated, par- " ticular cases may present themselves, demanding consideration how far it may be " necessary to call in aid the jurisdiction of the Court of Conservancy, we think when " such cases arise, and the circumstances attending them are made apparent, that little " difficulty will occur in determining the proper course by which to effect the prostration " and removal of any such encroachments and impediments. If the speedy execution of " the entire plan of improvement be deemed of paramount importance an Act of Parlia- " ment would of course confer all necessary powers for the purpose, and public benefit " being the sole object of the corporation, there could be no doubt that legislative " authority could be obtained, but we do not anticipate that there will be any necessity " for such legislative authority except by possibility for the adjustment of the interests " of parties in some of the projected improvements, some of those parties being under legal " incapacities to be bound by agreement. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the " corporation may prudently, and with reasonable prospect of a successful termination of " its labours, enter upon and prosecute the projected course of improvements." The Commissioners will observe, that that report required an expenditure of 60,000*l.*, which the corporation were willing to advance for the purpose of commencing the improvements laid down therein ; but they prudently took the opinion of eminent counsel before they involved themselves in so considerable an expenditure. The first thing required to be done was to remove some shoals, which it was found had concreted at the bottom of the Thames to such an extent that it was impossible to remove them by any of the ordinary dredging machines, but they would require blasting. This we were told involved very considerable outlay, and the corporation did not choose to commence it till they had taken those opinions.

5572. In what part of the river were those shoals ?—I think it was called the Whiting shoal, down about Limehouse. The corporation having received those opinions, circulated very freely up and down the river copies of this report, and it received, I believe, universal approbation Just at the time we were commencing this, and, I believe, had begun the removal of one of the shoals, Mr. Pemberton wrote to me, as he states, to request a copy of this report. I sent him six copies of the report, and it was shortly afterwards followed by the filing of that information, which information sought to take from the corporation of London, not the conservancy of the river, but the soil and bed of the river as a source of profit. That is, it claimed on the part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown the right to embank the soil and bed of the river, that which could be embanked without prejudice to the jus publicum, for the benefit of the Crown. The corporation controverted that, stating that the soil and bed belonged to them, not for the purpose of using it for any private or corporate object, but for the purpose of applying the revenue to be derived from it strictly and solely to the execution of the public purposes laid down here for the benefit and improvement of the stream, in conformity with the plan suggested to them by Mr. Walker, Captain Bullock, and other public officers ; and that is the matter in controversy between the Crown and the corporation.

5573. Did the City allege that their title to the soil and bed of the river flowed from their character as conservators, or did they allege it to be something quite independent of that character ?—Totally independent of their title as conservators.

5574. Are the two things frequently separate in other rivers ?—I believe they are.

5575. Do you believe, with reference to the Thames, that it is of importance for public purposes that the two rights should be exercised by the same party ?—I think there are some acts of conservancy that cannot be efficiently carried out where the soil is in other persons. For example, the right of anchorage is a distinct right, but supposing the ful right to the soil and bed of the river to be in any other party than the corporation, I think the conservancy for the purpose of using the river as a navigable channel could not be efficiently exercised by them. I may take, as an example, the driving piles to which barges might moor for a tide. Supposing the soil to be in foreign hands I do not see how that could be efficiently carried out.

5576. Do the City claim the ownership of the soil by prescription exclusively ?—Yes ; confirmed, or rather recognised, by charters. But then we use those charters rather as evidence of our prescriptive right than as evidence of title in themselves.

5577. Do you know whether it is the case in other instances of tidal harbours and navigable rivers that the ownership of the soil is in any hands except that of the Crown ? —I believe it is so. Serjeant Merewether has paid great attention to that subject, and I think he gave you a statement with respect to it. He disputes the general proposition upon which this bill is founded. He denies that the Crown, by prerogative right, is entitled to the soil and bed of navigable rivers. I do not enter into that question. I am conducting this case according to the received doctrines of Westminster Hall, one of which doctrines would be, that even if it were true that the Crown by prerogative right was entitled to the soil and bed of all navigable rivers, still it may have been taken out of the Crown before the time of legal memory, by some sufficient legal act, and if we can show that we have it by prescription that would be a title in us, notwithstanding the rule of law might be correctly stated in the bill.

5578. Would not that throw upon you the onus of establishing that you have such legal right by prescription or grant?—By the ordinary mode by which prescription is proved.

5579. It was alleged as a hardship that the information had been filed by the Crown asserting their general right, and so throwing the onus of proving your right upon you in the first instance, instead of bringing a writ of intrusion, in which the Crown would have had to establish its right in the first instance?—It assumes as the foundation of its proceedings that the property belongs to the Crown, and then tells us to show by what means we say it belongs to us. We say that that is a hardship.

5580. If the right be conceded to be in the Crown as a general rule, where would be the hardship, because then the prima facie right would be in the Crown?—If the Crown had, by writ of intrusion, or by any other course, come in by the strength of its own title, it would have been a question for the court whether such a legal presumption could be fairly made.

5581. Would not the writ of intrusion necessarily proceed upon the supposition that the corporation were in actual possession of the soil?—It would, which, I apprehend, is not disputed.

5582. It has been stated that the Crown denies the actual possession of the corporation, and attributes all acts done by them to their right of conservancy?—I gather from the proceedings which have taken place that the Crown say: —You are in possession, but you are in possession because you have obtained that possession in your character of trustee or conservator for the Crown, and these are acts which are equivocal, and might be assigned either to the ownership of the soil, and to your position as conservators. The Crown say those acts are done under the power of conservancy. We say that they are evidence of our ownership, and what we further say is that those are questions which ought to be tried in the ordinary course.

5583. A complaint being made of the hardship of the proceeding on the part of the Crown, if they had taken another course would not they have precluded themselves from denying an adverse possession of the corporation?—In the expressions which I have been using I have been only echoing the expressions which some of the greatest men have applied to this particular suit.

5584. You stated that the right of the City to the soil, though considered on the part of the City to be grounded upon prescription, had been recognised by some charters. Can you point out to us what charters have recognized the ownership of the soil?—We consider that the oldest charters, which are in very few words, have to be interpreted by circumstances. The charter of Henry III. says that the corporation shall have all their rights by land and by water. We could have no rights by water except those which relate to the Thames, and construed by contemporaneous historical evidence of how the corporation dealt with the Thames at that time, we consider that it is a chartered recognition of the rights which were in fact exercised by the corporation at that time in regard to the Thames.

5585. Is there any more distinct reference than that which you have cited?—The charter of Henry VI. recognizes the right of the corporation to all common soils in the City of London and the water of the Thames, within the franchises of the City. We show by contemporaneous history, and by documents in our own repertories, that the franchise of the City extended from Staines to Yantlet, the franchise of the City being represented in the immemorial right of conservancy. Because, as I hold it, our conservancy is of two characters; we have the prescriptive conservancy from Staines to Yantlet, and we have a conservancy by charter and by commission from the Crown, that is, the conservancy of certain statutes within the river Thames. But the general right of conservancy is a prescriptive right.

5586. The second kind of conservancy you mention does not go to the extent of the ownership of the soil, does it?—No. I am drawing a distinction; the ownership of the soil we contend is a prescriptive right also.

5587. Chairman. Is there any broad distinction between the duties and functions imposed upon you by the two descriptions of conservancy to which you have referred?—I think the moral and perhaps the legal duty is to apply all the funds derived from the soil and bed of the river to the purposes of the conservancy. The doctrine upon which the corporation have proceeded is, that they are bound to apply every shilling obtained in the one capacity to the public purposes of the other.

5588. You say that, besides what you call the prescriptive right of conservancy enjoyed by the City, there are certain conservancy rights and duties imposed upon the City by statute. To what do you refer?—I referred to fisheries and removing weirs in ancient times. They being at one time probably the only obstructions those words were used, constituting the Lord Mayor of London conservator of those statutes for the river Thames, and appointing certain magistrates conservators of the Ouse and other rivers.

5589. Why were those statutes necessary if the City had already general powers of removing those obstructions?—They probably imposed a duty or obligation to remove them.

5590. If you have gone through all the charters or passages which refer according to your view to the ownership of the soil, there is no very clear and unambiguous reference is there?—Certainly not, or we should not have had that suit.

Charles Pearson Esq.

5591. There are references in general terms which may according to the view of one party, include that right, but according to the view of another, may not include that right?—That may be predicated of all prescriptive rights, the fact of its being a prescriptive right implies that you have no other definite legal origin. If you had a charter or Act of Parliament, you would not fall back upon prescription.

5592. Substantially, according to the view of the City, the ownership of the soil of the Thames is a prescriptive right, proved by successive acts of ownership of dealing with the bed of the Thames, as an owner would deal with it?—Exactly so; that is not the exclusive evidence. Those charters construed with contemporaneous history show that the Crown recognized the right of the corporation at that time. The Honourable Commissioner is aware that the same is the case with all prescriptions; the fact of a prescription presumes either a lost charter or a lost Act of Parliament, or some other legal origin, of a right that we are not able to produce.

5593. The prescription would be bad if, upon the face of it, it appeared incapable of being referred to some such legal origin?—Exactly so. That legal origin may be a lost Act of Parliament.

5594. In acting for the City or receiving instructions with regard to questions in litigation for the City, do you look exclusively to the interests of that portion of the metropolis which is included within the boundaries of the City, or do you take a general view of the interest of the entire town?—I do not know where they conflict. If a case is stated to me I will answer it. I think the interests of the City and the interests of the metropolis are identical.

5595. If there should be any case in which there was a conflict between the two interests, what would be the course which the corporation would take?—I do not desire to evade the question, but I cannot suppose such a case. If such a case were stated to me, I would deal with it. I believe the revenues of the City being applied to the purpose of enlarging the streets, and facilitating the means of intercourse of 200,000 persons, who every day come into the City of London for the purposes of business, but who reside in the metropolis generally, there is no object so important for the benefit of the whole population, as that the streets should be improved, and the City be improved by that means.

5596. Take as an instance the 4*d.* duty on coals; that is levied on the whole metropolis, and a considerable district of country round the metropolis, but it is claimed by the City as a possession in perpetuity to be expended at their sole discretion, is it not?—It is.

5597. Do you think the City are bound either legally or morally, in the expenditure of the proceeds of that particular tax, to consider equally the benefit of the whole of those who pay the duty with that of their own constituents?—I think the two are inseparable. The public who come for their dividends or to transact their business in the City, to the extent of 200,000 persons daily, are as much interested in having wide streets and having free intercourse with the great commercial establishments in the City, as the dwellers in the City itself.

5598. It can hardly be said, can it, that they have the same direct and immediate interest as the dwellers in the City have?—There may be some slight difference in degree and there will be as regards individuals, but I think the interests of all are inseparably connected, and if the narrow streets of the City were neglected, and were allowed to continue narrow, which would impede the passage to the great establishments of the City and from them, that would be felt as much by the inhabitants of the districts surrounding the City, as by the dwellers in the City itself.

5599. Are the proceeds of that 4*d.* duty applied exclusively to improvements in the streets of the City, or are they considered available for general purposes, like any other portion of the City estates?—I think there is a growing feeling similar to that which I entertain, that all our public revenues of that description should be strictly applied to public objects of all kinds. I should desire to see two pockets, into one of which I should put all the property acquired from tolls and dues, and in the other all the produce of our private estates. If I wished to give a dinner or to exercise charity, I would put my hand into one pocket; if I wished to make a public street, I would put my hand into the other, and I would confine the two strictly to those purposes.

5600. What do you think is the view taken by the corporation of the mode in which they should manage their revenues? Is it their view either that the whole revenues of the City, or such portion of them as arises from tolls and dues, should be appropriated to purposes generally beneficial to the metropolis?—The corporation being composed of individuals there are all descriptions of opinions, but I think we are fast arriving at that period in which the majority will be of opinion that the produce of public tolls and dues should be strictly dedicated to public purposes, in which the metropolis generally will have an interest, as well as the City itself. With respect to the City, it is nearly 200 years since the mass of it was erected. The streets are narrow and it is extremely desirable to have convenient main arteries of approach to the Royal Exchange, the Bank of England, and so on. Two millions of money, I know, are required to carry out the improvements which the corporation have under their contemplation.

5601. Do you think the corporation consider themselves as the representatives of the interests of the entire metropolis, or only that portion which is included within the City?—I think a different feeling upon that subject is growing up. I think in former times,

Esq.

18th Jan. 1854.

till within the last 40 or 50 years, it was the City for the citizens. The feeling is now growing up that the City is for the world.

5602. Is that a principle of administration which is followed to any extent by the corporation in the management of their revenues?—I believe it is. I believe Cannon Street is an evidence of it.

5603. In deciding with regard to the opposition to be offered to any private Bill which may be before Parliament, do you think the corporation would take an enlarged view of the general interests of the metropolis, or that they would consider especially the interests of the constituency of the members of the common council?—I think the corporation would consider their first duty to be to their constituents, but I do not think they would permit that feeling of duty to their constituents to operate to an extent to prejudice of other interests.

5604. Is there any other point to which you wish to direct the attention of the Commissioners?—The freedoms, and the position of St. Thomas's Hospital, I think are subjects upon which it is right that I should make some statement. In regard to the freedoms the accuracy of the statement contained in the written document read by the recorder I confirm upon oath. I was a member of the corporation, and took part in all those proceedings for diminishing the charge upon freedoms, and removing the obstacles to inhabitants obtaining them. The charge of 25*l.* which was put on in 1729, was put on, as the document says, for the purpose of enabling them to pay the debts of the corporation. At that time the corporation was in a most embarrassed state—out of funds and out of credit, notwithstanding that at that time seven of the aldermen were bank directors. In 1830 or 1832, a proposal was made for reducing the charge upon freedoms, to encourage the extension of the constituency. The difficulty we experienced arose from the fact that those who had purchased their freedom, and paid 25*l.* as a fine, 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for agents' fine, 4*l.* or 5*l.* for the government stamp and other duties, together with perhaps 20*l.* or 30*l* for their admission to the livery, thought they had acquired a sort of vested interest in an exclusive right. The difficulty which was experienced, therefore, was in suddenly taking off those charges, and exposing persons who had paid them to a competition with persons who might come in in the same trade, but had not paid them. The proposal of the corporation, therefore, was to re-pay to those who had been admitted within two years a portion of the sum which they had paid, and we paid, I think, one half or some other proportion to those who had so come in upon the larger sum, and we gradually reduced the amount so as to work as little injustice or inconvenience as possible to those who had been already in possession. We did so till the amount was reduced to the sum at present stated, 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* It has been assumed that the actions which have been brought against persons for not being free, were brought for the purpose of putting money into the coffers of the corporation. I have no hesitation in saying, being in the confidence of the various committees of the corporation, that no such motive ever entered into their imagination. The only purpose was to endeavour to increase the constituency of the corporation. Whether it was a judicious mode of doing so or not is not a matter for me to express an opinion on, but I was the instrument of the corporation in carrying that out, and I have no hesitation in saying that it was no part of the object of the corporation to increase their revenue. Various actions were brought—one against Mr. Sturt. That was brought by me, for the purpose of trying the question in the least expensive and the least inconvenient form. Mr Sturt was a personal friend of my own. I attended a meeting of the opponents to the City, at Mr. Sturt's house; he was in the chair, and the subject therefore was very fully discussed in the most amicable form in which it could possibly be. We are near neighbours in the country, and we used to walk arm in arm from the omnibus into the City, while this discussion was going on.

5605. In a printed copy of the statement which was read by the recorder, it is said that the action was against Mr. Sturt, and not against Messrs. Ward and Co.; was not Mr. Sturt a partner in the same concern as Messrs. Ward and Co.?—I think not at that time. There was the firm of Sturt and Sharp, and of Ward and Britton, but I think one of the partners in Sturt's house has since died, and one of the partners in Ward's house, and Mr Sturt is now a partner in both. The object of that statement was not for the purpose of appearing to imply a contradiction, but to show identity.

5606. Were any means employed, such as sending persons to purchase goods which, though it might not be called employing spies, was rather in the nature of a hostile proceeding?—One of those parties appeared before the chamberlain and pleaded that he did not sell by retail. I was present, and I said, "I know you to be very wealthy "people. Do you mean to say that you never sell by retail? If I wish for a coat, "would not you sell me one?" They said, "No." I said, "If the Committee direct "me to take proceedings, you are the man I should take proceedings against, because "you are very wealthy and you are doing covertly an injury to the retail traders, because "if you supply retailers, and supply their customers too, you do an injury to them." The partner of the Lord Mayor said he would not take up his freedom because his partner being a freeman covered him in the house. I said, "I shall bring an action "against you if the committee authorize me." The committee did direct me to take proceedings, and I named those two gentlemen. I went to the house of the parties I have referred to, and I took my clerk with me. I said, "My name is Charles Pearson. I "want a coat for that young man." He bought a coat and took his receipt for the money. I went away and brought an action against him; the same took place with the Lord Mayor's partner. But as to anything in the nature of spying, or deception, or anything of the kind, there is not the slightest foundation for such statements.

5607. Whatever was done was done openly, and not in any clandestine manner?—Certainly.

5608. Has your attention been directed to the evidence that has been given to us by Mr. Henry Grey?—I read it at the time.

5609. It relates to a prosecution in which he was engaged in 1847. The statement made by Mr. Grey was, that he was engaged at that time in prosecuting a gang of swindlers, which ended in their conviction. He states that he incurred a great many losses in undertaking this prosecution, and he goes on to say that there were certain estreats paid to the City by one of those swindlers; that, under the impression that those estreats belonged to the treasury, he memorialized the treasury, who were perfectly willing to have given him the money; that finding that they belonged to the City, he applied to them, but that they refused, and have refused up to the present time to give him any benefit from the money; he says he is informed that this money goes to some fund in the City, of which an account has never been rendered to the public. Have you any observations that you desire to make upon this statement?—About one hundred years ago, in making arrangements with the sheriffs, the estreats were set over to the sheriffs as a part of their income. This sum would go for that purpose. I think it may have amounted in the last twenty years to an average of 60*l.* a year, or something of that kind. The whole receipts for the last ten years certainly have not amounted to 100*l.* a year.

5610. Has any account ever been rendered of those receipts?—No; the money is paid over to the sheriffs; the sheriffs do not render any account of their receipts.

5611. On the occasion of the former inquiry into the City of London, did not the sheriffs render some accounts?—I was under sheriff at that time; the amount of those estreats would come into my statement of my emoluments.

5612. Does the under sheriff generally receive them?—I did by my arrangement with the sheriff. My sheriff was a very liberal man; he gave me everything.

5613. Does not it seem to you a great hardship in a case of that sort that this money should not have been paid to the party who undertook the prosecution?—They made many arrangements in former days which the present day does not approve of.

5614. But the present day appears to maintain this custom. We are given to understand that this poor man made an application to have this money, and it has been refused him?—I have no doubt that may be so.

5615. If the money had been received by the treasury, he could not of course have received it?—I do not think that it is by any means a matter of course that the treasury hand over estreats under such circumstances.

5616. In this particular instance the treasury stated to Mr. Grey that they would have given it to him?—I dare say that this is not a convenient mode of remunerating the sheriffs.

5617. It is more than inconvenient, is not it? Does not it absolutely lead to cases of great hardship, as is proved from this particular instance?—I feel a difficulty in expressing an opinion upon matters which are not under my own control. If I were the essence of the corporation here, I think I could not express any opinion favourable to the practice.

5618. This was the case of a man who was acting the part of a public prosecutor?—He took upon himself the office of public prosecutor, it being however a private wrong of his own.

5619. Some of the leading merchants of London supported him, did not they?—I may be mistaken, but I think the corporation supported him too. I think the corporation subscribed towards the expenses of the prosecution. It is of course one thing for the corporation, in the exercise of its just liberality, to give what is their own; it would be another thing for them to give what they have set aside for the sheriffs. It may be a very fit subject for consideration whether they might not give a sum of money to Mr. Grey now, and it might be very fit for consideration whether, if the sheriff is to be remunerated, it should not be in some other form. I believe that a committee of the corporation have already sat upon the question of the sheriffs' allowances, and that it is in contemplation to make the sheriffs an adequate remuneration by a money payment, instead of leaving them to be remunerated from any such sources as these.

5620. Mr. Grey says that he has repeatedly applied to the Court of Common Council for an allowance of money, and has not been able to obtain it?—That may very well have been the case. I can readily imagine that a gentleman may feel himself justified in using a degree of importunity which raises a feeling not very favourable to his pretensions. I do not know that it is so in this case, but it is human nature that exceeding importunity sometimes defeats its own ends.

5621. Mr. Grey stated that the attorney he employed told him that the prosecution would cost some small sum of money. Finding that it would cost a great deal more, he endeavoured to raise a subscription, towards which the corporation paid him 50*l.* Some of the witnesses did not appear when called; their recognizances were estreated, and he says, "After that I petitioned the City solicitor, by the wish of Mr. Potter, his request "being contained in a letter to me. I received no answer from the City solicitor, and I

Charles Pearson, Esq.

18th Jan. 1854.

„ was then advised to make a public appeal to the Court of Common Council by a general „ petition." Have you any recollection of those circumstances?—No. It very likely might be so. The case would not rest with me at all. I could have no power of giving him any money.

5622. Supposing the sheriffs were remunerated by a sum of money, engaged on the part of the City to be paid them instead of having fees, would not estreated recognizances go to the City?—They would.

5623. Under such circumstances any person situated as Mr. Grey was, being led into a much greater expense than he contemplated, and the prosecution being considered to be of public benefit, would have to petition the City?—Yes.

5624. Still it would be a matter of grace, would not it, if they gave the money?—Certainly. The money does not, as a matter of necessity, I should state, go to the sheriffs; the corporation, though they allow them to receive it, retain in their hands the power of diverting it where they think proper. When it is a small sum, 50*l.* or 100*l.*, they do not exercise the right, but in a case which the learned commissioners will recollect, Moseley Wolfe's case, which occupied the courts some ten years, 10,000*l.* was the amount of the fine, and in that case the corporation paid the solicitors something like 1,500*l.* to one, 700*l.* or 800*l.* to another, and they gave the sheriffs only 1,000*l.* out of that money.

5625. What you state now only bears upon the amount of remuneration received by the sheriffs, it does not bear upon the degree of hardship upon the individual who might be considered to have an equitable claim to this money?—I think I ought not to permit myself to go further than that I very much agree with the Commissioners in the questions which they have put. I think the corporation to a man would feel the same when their attention was in cooler moments called to it.

5626. I believe Billingsgate Market is by statute free except certain tolls, which are imposed in accordance with the schedule?—Yes; those are the terms, but though a free market a person is not exempt from the payment of stallage. If by prescription there is a right of stallage, calling it a free market does not exonerate them from the payment.

5627. The demand upon the factors in Billingsgate market rests upon prescription, does it?—Upon prescription for stallage.

5628. You think the declaration of its being a free market is not at variance with that prescription?—No; a reasonable charge for stallage does not appear to me to be inconsistent with it. Contemporaneous with the passing of that Act was the receipt of the stallage. I should state, as the corporation have desired me to do, that though they have laid out 30,000*l.* upon the erection of that market, I do not feel that the corporation could increase the price of the stallage to indemnify themselves for that outlay. That has been a matter as to which I have differed from other persons.

5629. Do you mean that the rate of the charges for stallage is fixed by prescription as well as the principle of asking for them at all?—It is a very difficult question. I have felt it my duty to advise the corporation, that although they have expended 30,000*l.* upon the erection of that market they cannot, in my judgment, raise the price of stallage to any extent adequate to the amount of the outlay. Mr. Recorder reminds me that it is necessary that I should give the Commissioners some explanation as to the recent proceedings for enforcing freedoms. I have stated that there was one person against whose property execution was issued, and the amount levied. In that case there was not only that one execution issued, but there were five others. There were six executions issued for the amount of the penalty and of the costs with instructions to the officers to say to each person,—This is a proceeding to enforce your taking up your freedom; if you choose to take up your freedom the fine will be remitted and the costs also. He did state it, I believe, to every one, and out of the six five did take up their freedom, and had the fine remitted and the costs. The same statement was made to the sixth; he did not choose to comply with it; his goods were taken and were sold, the fine was levied and costs to the amount of 2*l.* The officer in executing the process entreated him to see me or obey the law, telling him what had been the case with the other five; however, he declined to do so, and his goods were sold. He some time afterwards was summoned again by the chamberlain to take up his freedom. I think it very probable that the identity of the name did not occur to the committee who then ordered the persons to be summoned, and therefore it was accidentally included and, probably, not intentionally. However he came before the chamberlain. I was present and I said to him,—"Mr. Dealtry, the penalty " and the costs are still in the hands of the officer; if you choose to take up your free- " dom like other persons that money will be given back to you. There is no intention to " mulct you of your money; if you choose to take up your freedom the money will be paid " back; the penalty and the costs remain still in the hands of the officer in the expec- " tation that you would feel that you had better take that course, or that the corporation " may abandon their proceedings to enforce freedoms—in which case you may have your " fine and costs back again." If any misconduct was practised by the officer upon executing the process, of course he is amenable to the Lord Mayor's Court out of which that process issued. The person himself was with me a few days ago, and I said to him: " I shall not touch your costs. I have never touched the costs of anybody under such " circumstances. You may take your money back again whenever you think proper to " obey the law, or if you choose to wait till the question is settled you can do so."

5630. That sum having been once levied against a man for retailing without being free of the City, suppose he goes on to retail after that; is he liable to a fresh proceeding?

Charles Pearson, Esq.

18th Jan. 1854.

—Certainly; every act of retailing is a fresh offence. With respect to St. Thomas's Hospital, under the Act of Parliament 27 George 3 cap. 77, which settled disputes which had been for some time pending in Chancery, and defined the relation in which the City were to stand towards the hospitals in future times, the corporation about twenty-five years ago passed an order requiring the governors of each hospital, when they sent up their leases to receive the seal of the corporation, to have those leases certified by two governors, being aldermen. For twenty or twenty-five years or probably more the hospitals complied with that requirement, and sent up their leases in this form. Some time ago, from some circumstances of a little unfriendly character with some of the hospitals, there was a departure from that practice, and St. Thomas's Hospital sent up a deed to be executed with the intimation that it was not their intention any longer to comply with that requirement. The corporation referred it to the Law Bills' Committee, constituted principally of solicitors, to deal with the question. They had a case prepared, and submitted it to counsel. Counsel were divided in opinion; one gentleman was very strongly of opinion that it was necessary, under the wording of the clause, that two aldermen at least should sign and certify. The others were of opinion that upon the whole the balance of evidence was the other way, looking at it as a contemporaneous interpretation of the expression used in the Act. However they were all of opinion that it was a subject of some consequence, and that the corporation as trustees ought to receive the judgment of the court upon that question. I have the opinions with me, if the Commissioners desire to see them.

5631. The expression in the Act of Parliament is "in the accustomed way," is not it?—It is upon the 3rd section that the question turned,—"That the seal of, or belonging "to the aforesaid hospital shall be restored to the chamber of the said City of London, "and be kept, as heretofore, by the chamberlain of the same City, for the time being, in a "purse or box sealed with the seals of the Lord Mayor of the said City, for the time "being, and any of the aldermen of the same City, who shall be present, at any time or "times, that the same seal shall be used. And that all leases which shall, at any time or "times hereafter, be made or granted of any of the lands, tenements, hereditaments, of, "or belonging to, the aforesaid several hospitals, or any of them, and all and every other "deeds, presentations, and other instruments whatsoever, relating to or concerning the "same hospitals or the estates, revenues, and possessions thereof respectively, (after the "same shall have been examined, approved, and signed by the presidents or treasurers, "and such a competent number of the aldermen and other governors of such of the said "respective hospitals to which such leases, deeds, or instruments, shall relate or concern, as "have been used and accustomed to examine, approve, and sign the same,) shall be left at "the chamberlain's office," and so on. The argument proceeded upon the old doctrine of corporation law,—that when classes are named, the words must be satisfied by the time of each of those classes. It was thought that the Act would receive its interpretation from what could be shown to have been the practice anterior to the time. Mr. Wainwright, the most respectable solicitor on the other side, concurred with me in agreeing to that document. We mutually submitted all documents to the inspection of each other. We went through them all—made a schedule of them—certified them—and agreed them—and put them upon our affidavits, so that the facts were admitted; and then we took the opinion of the court upon them.

5632. Was not there a rule nisi for a mandamus, which was made absolute in the month of November 1851?—Probably that was the date; we agreed to raise the question upon the return, so as not to multiply proceedings.

5633. I have here a copy of the pleadings; and there are seven or eight issues of fact as to what had been the custom. Were those issues tried by a jury?—No. We saved expense and delay and trouble, by agreeing to the facts, and putting them upon the proceedings.

5634. You stated a case, and took a verdict by counsel?—Yes.

5635. Was that case ever argued?—Yes; and judgment was given against us.

5636. The question then is settled and determined?—Yes. The corporation considered themselves as trustees for posterity, and that they ought not to relinquish an apparent right, of which they were in the exercise, unless a court of competent jurisdiction should say that the law was against them. That was the opinion of counsel, and I acted upon it.

5637. Considerable expense of course was incurred?—No doubt of it; and the question now arises concerning the payment of those expenses. When the court had pronounced its judgment, Sir Frederick Thesiger was asked about the costs by his client. I sat near him at the time. He said, "Do not ask for costs." I communicated it to my clients, as evidence of a good spirit manifested by the hospital that they had not asked for costs. We were all very much delighted at the friendly feeling which we hoped would thenceforth take place. About a year afterwards, an intimation was given to me that costs were asked for. I wrote a civil letter to the solicitor on the other side, telling him how much we had congratulated the corporation on the friendly feeling evinced by not asking for costs. However, he repeats, that he must have the costs; and at the next meeting of the committee I have no doubt the costs will be paid.

5638. Am I right in supposing that before 1821 no charge was made to the factors in Billingsgate market?—I have no doubt a charge was made.

5639. Do you mean a rent or some very small payment?—Before 1821, supposing that to be the boundary period, the profits did not come to the corporation. Our ancestors had sold it to the officers referred to in our statement. The Lord Mayor and sheriffs and aldermen of one hundred years ago had sold the profits of Billingsgate market to what were called the yeomen of the waterside. The corporation bought them up, and when the corporation bought them up, we paid them annuities or specific sums, and received the amount which they had received in the shape of stallage.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

18th Jan. 1854.

5640. Do you believe those parties at that time charged and received payments analogous to the charge now made upon the factors for stallage?—I do.

5641. Is that information before the public in any shape?—I think there is some statement of the kind, but I think it is only a general one.

5642. What is the amount now received by the committee for stallage in Billingsgate market?—I cannot state at the moment; but I will ascertain, and give you the information, 5643. Are you able to state whether, since the right has reverted to the corporation, the rate charged for stallage in that market has been uniformly the same?—I am not able to say. I know that the opinion has prevailed that it was not afixed prescriptive snm for stallage, but that it should be reasonable; the mode of interpreting the word "reasonable" being, that it should have some reference to the outlay. My opinion is not in conformity with that.

5644. You are not able to state to the Commissioners whether, since the corporation have had that property in their own hands, they have charged one uniform rate for stallage or not?—I am not able to state that; but I will take care that it is looked into. My impression is, that it has not been a uniform sum. The committee having to deal with it, have considered that they had to put on a reasonable charge for stallage; and that reasonable charge has had some relation to the sum expended in giving the accommodation. I have been consulted upon that question since they laid out 30,000*l.* They laid out the 30,000*l.* under the impression that they would be entitled to recoup themselves for a portion of that outlay by increasing the amount of stallage in proportion to the increased convenience given to the parties. I felt it right, in the discharge of my professional duties, to say, that unless counsel should be of opinion that we could do so, there was a difficulty in it. I have no doubt the amount has been raised on former occasions when money has been laid out. A case was prepared to be submitted to counsel. Without the countenance of my superior law officer, or some able counsel who would fairly consider the question, I did not feel myself at liberty to sanction such a mode of dealing with it.

5645. Is the office of City solicitor an ancient office?—Yes; it is so ancient that I do not practise by certificate. I practise by warrant. I rank with the solicitor for the treasury, and the solicitors for public departments. I am recognised in the Acts of Parliament of the present day, such as the stamp Acts. I voluntarily pay the certificate duty, because I choose to stand by my brethren; but I am not bound to do so.

5646. Was not it formerly part of the town clerk's office?—I think not. I believe it has always had a separate and independent existence.

5647. I observe in the report of the former Commissioners it is stated that the City solicitor's office is a comparatively modern creation, and separated from that of the town clerk?—A town clerk wrote that. If it had been a City solicitor, he would have given a different statement. I consider the office I hold, taking rank as it does, and being recognised by repeated Acts of Parliament from the first of the Stamp Acts imposing a duty upon the admission of solicitors, exonerates the holder of it from liability to any payment. When the committee dealt with my office, as the Commissioners have heard they do with all offices when they become vacant, the contemplated arrangement with me would have given me upwards of 2,000*l.* a year. But the change of circumstances has added 30 per cent. to my duties, and taken very nearly 30 per cent. from my income.

5648. Would there be any objection that whatever emolument it should be thought right to attach to the office should be paid by salary, doing away with fees altogether?—I think there would be a serious objection to it—it would be, in fact, making the corporation participators in an attorney's gains, because my emoluments partly depend upon bills of cost, not to the corporation, but to other parties. If, therefore, I were to bring those emoluments into the corporation fund, and then were to be paid a salary out of it, the impression upon my mind is, that there would be a legal objection to such an arrangement. A private individual must not share with an attorney in his profits; and if I were to send in a bill of costs to other persons—for instance, to the Irish Society—the profits of that business would go into the corporation chest.

5649. If the professional emoluments should at any time exceed the amount of that specified salary, supposing there were a salary, it would be a direct participation on the part of the corporation in your professional emoluments?—Yes. My predecessor, who was paid by emoluments without salary, had a very much larger income than I ever had. I have reason to believe that his profits approached to 3,000*l.* a year.

5650. If that should turn out to be so now, and the salary were fixed at 2,000*l.*, the other 1,000*l.* being paid over to the corporation, they would be participators in an attorney's profits?—That is my objection.

5651. Are not the solicitor to the treasury, and the solicitors to other public departments, paid altogether by salary?—I cannot answer for that. I believe there has been an arrangement recently made with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. What that arrangement may be, I do not know. I see by Mr. Pemberton's evidence, if he is paid by the usual professional charges, this suit would be a most productive one to him.

5652. Would not the same objection you have mentioned apply to the payment of the solicitors of the public departments by salary?—It is contrary to the policy of the law that any person should share in the profits of a solicitor. If the solicitor of the treasury is paid by salary, I do not know what he does with those profits. In the case of the corporation of London, when we succeed in a suit, and our antagonist has to pay costs, the City solicitor receives them; and the adjustment of his salaried income is made proportionate to what they believe to be the average amount of such payments. If it were a fixed salary, I think he could not pay those costs into the chamber, and therefore there would be a loss to the City.

5653. Would there be any objection to all the business of the solicitor which is virtually done for the corporation, including the business done for those funds which are now kept as distinct trust funds, being done in respect of his salary, whatever the amount of that salary might be?—I think there would be no objection to it, provided, as a matter of strict justice, the fund for whose benefit those professional services were rendered should be charged a proportional part of the amount of the salary.

5654. If an action is brought for the City Commission of Sewers, or for the Commissioner of Police, the expenses of that action would be charged for separately by the solicitor, would they not?—Yes, they would.

5655. Would there be any objection to the remuneration for services of that kind being considered as included in the salary?—I think not.

5656. If all those cases were included, it would only be necessary to provide for the case of costs being received from opposite parties, and for such cases as that of the Irish Society?—That is so.

5657. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—I think I ought to tender more evidence upon the subject of the City prosecutions. I receive instructions from the Lord Mayor, and from the aldermen, to prosecute in various cases; the general class of cases I can state to the Commissioners, but it has to be applied by the individual judgment of different aldermen, who differ from each other as to the extent to which it should be carried. For instance, in cases heard before the Lord Mayor or the aldermen, I am sometimes directed to prosecute where there has been an attack on, or a resistance to the police, in order to throw around the police the protection of the City and maintain their efficiency. On the other hand I have had to prosecute policemen where, in the exercise of their functions, they are accused of having acted with violence or any other description of misconduct. I had to indict a policeman for murder by the direction of the aldermen. That was a case in which death was supposed to have ensued in a conflict between the policeman and a person whom he had sought to take into custody; and it was the opinion of the magistrates that the efficiency of the police could not be maintained unless that subject was judicially inquired into. The man himself, and others upon the beat, were continually the objects of attack, and the aldermen thought it right to institute an inquiry, which was sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and upon the hearing of that case the Lord Mayor for the time being thought it right to have the policeman indicted. He was indicted and tried; and he was acquitted, and I think rightly acquitted; but still I think it was a most important prosecution. It tranquillised the public mind; and satisfied them that justice would be administered, even though a policeman was the party charged. In other instances I am directed to prosecute where it is supposed there will be a failure of justice by the prosecution being bought off. There are, unfortunately, in this metropolis, a number of revolting cases, where persons in a wealthy position in life are supposed to be likely to buy off those whose testimony may be necessary to the ends of justice. In that case the aldermen direct me to conduct the prosecution. There are other instances where the poverty of the party injured would subject him to temptation to defeat the ends of justice. There was an instance, some time ago, where a number of emigrants were defrauded by persons who set up a fraudulent company. They defrauded those emigrants by taking their money under a promise to ship them for Australia, when they had no power to charter ships. I was directed to prosecute. In that case I maintained those emigrants for a considerable length of time; and afterwards, a subscription was opened to pay for their passage. If the aldermen had not directed that prosecution, it would have been impossible to have kept those men together by any recognizance or any other mode. Two of the parties were convicted, and I think transported; and a most important benefit has accrued to the commerce and the character of the port of London by that transaction.

5658. You appear in some degree to perform the duties of a public prosecutor in such cases?—I do so. I stated before that in individual cases there is not an uniform rule observed by the aldermen; some of the aldermen have objected to such a mode of proceeding. It undoubtedly is a questionable course. There are valid arguments on both sides; but I am only stating the facts, and I have no hesitation in saying that from my experience a great amount of benefit has accrued to the public from it, though in theory perhaps it may be objectionable.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

5659. Upon the whole, from your experience, are you inclined to think that good has been the result of following that course?—I am perfectly confident that it has been so. It is an imperfect approach towards the appointment of a public prosecutor. In the absence of any such officer, I am of opinion that great benefit has resulted from it.

5660. I will read you an extract from the evidence of Mr. Pulling before this Commission. He says, in answer to question 915:—"Radically the real abuse is in the power "to grant money for prosecutions." He is asked: "What inducement have the Court of "Aldermen to interfere in respect to the institution of prosecutions?" He says: "There is "the inducement that the aldermen individually are magistrates of the City of London, "and are therefore sometimes exposed to a number of actions. I know, in my own profes- "sional experience, cases have come before me where an alderman has taken a very "warm view of a certain matter, and has entangled himself in litigation. Applications "have been made to the Court of Queen's Bench, and some expensive proceedings have "been taken. With a stroke of his pen he gives an order to the City solicitor to defend "or carry on those proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench." Is it the case that the aldermen direct that actions brought against individual aldermen should be defended by the City solicitor?—It is so; and Mr. Pulling might have added, that if it is liable to abuse, it has been so little abused, if at all, that I believe the case which he pointedly refers to there is the only case that has occurred in my experience. There was a case where an application was made to the Court of Queen's Bench which failed, and against the same gentleman an action was brought in another case. That was defended by the City, and in that case a verdict was given against the alderman, I believe, as regards the amount, principally in consequence of the evidence that the police station room in which the party was confined was damp; therefore the court and the jury visited upon the alderman whom they had there the consequence of this dampness of the cell.

5661. What is the case to which you refer?—It was an action by a person of the name of Bessell, against Alderman Wilson, for committing a man to prison who had been brought before him. The alderman, as Lord Campbell said, mistook the law, as any one else might have done. I do not recollect precisely the pinching point of the case, but I know the courts differed upon the very same Act within a very short time afterwards.

5662. Do not you think in such a case it would be desirable that the aldermen should not be able to put in motion the solicitor for the City without the sanction of some legal authority, who should be responsible for it?—The old difficulty again presses upon me of expressing any opinion of that kind; but I should state that a very respectable police magistrate, now no more, who had to suffer very severely in the case of an action against him for excess of authority as it was supposed to be, told me that there were a lamentable number of cases in which they felt they could not act with vigour for want of some means of sustaining them.

5663. If there were some officer of the City of legal weight and reputation responsible for proceedings of this kind, there would probably not be an indisposition to give a proper and due support to the City authorities when the occasion required it?—I think the form in which you put the question supplies its answer. I think there can be no doubt of it.

5664. But it is possible to suppose the case of an individual alderman acting from pique and precipitation, and not with that entire knowledge of the law which a professed lawyer would possess. To whom would you apply upon one of the aldermen bringing such a case before you?—The case is reported to me by the individual alderman. If it does not require immediate action I report to the next Court of Aldermen; if it does I take such steps as may be required, reporting them to the next court.

5665. You would consider yourself authorized in taking the first steps upon the direction of a single alderman?—Yes.

5666. You have stated that whatever opinion might be held in the abstract as to the expediency of this system, you think the power has not been exercised in an objectionable or immoderate manner?—I feel confident of it. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it has never been exercised capriciously or oppressively, or without due judgment and discretion.

5667. Still if it is in itself improper, and is liable to abuse, it would be right to guard against it?—There can be no question about it.

5668. Mr. Pulling proceeds to say that: "The Court of Aldermen are the executive "who exercise paternal care over the morals of the citizens of London; and, therefore, "when any great crime has been committed, and the parties are too poor to prosecute, "the Court of Aldermen are the most efficient body to direct proceedings to be taken." I suppose there is nothing in that statement from which you dissent?—Nothing.

5669. The question is put to him, "Therefore they discharge the functions of a public "prosecutor out of the City funds;" he answers, "No doubt they do; but I am bound "to say this, that although I give great credit to the Court of Aldermen in some instances "for taking up prosecutions, the principle is bad, and in the majority of cases I do not think "I should be justified in designating the Court of Aldermen as a public prosecutor. They "do not take up cases as a public prosecutor would, but they choose their cases, and they "sometimes have prosecuted people for political offences where they have taken a violent view "in one direction or another." Do you think that is correct?—They have never interfered in political cases since I have been in the office I now hold. I have never known any body of men act with more impartiality in the administration of justice than the aldermen.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

5670. How many prosecutions do you suppose are conducted at the expense of the corporation in the course of a year?—About fifty or sixty.

5671. Are any of them important ones in general?—Such as I have described; one being a case of conspiracy, which, as all lawyers know, is a very difficult case to carry on.

5672. The rule which the government usually follows in instituting proceedings, is that they only interfere in cases where they think private individuals will not be able to carry on the prosecution with efficiency. Is that the general rule which the City adopt?—That is the rule. I believe they do not take a prosecution up except where they think, from some cause or other, it would not otherwise be carried on with efficiency. They do not assume to be public prosecutors.

5673. They merely interfere in cases where the general system appears to be likely to fail?—Yes; or to defend the police when they think they are improperly attached, or prosecute them when they think the public service requires it.

The Right Honourable JAMES STUART WORTLEY, Esq., further examined.

Rt. Hon. J. Stuart Wortley Esq.

5674. Will you state what your experience has been with respect to the prosecutions which have been instituted by the Court of Aldermen?—I would merely state that during the three years I have held the office, there have come before me various instances in which the prosecutions have been by order of the aldermen, and they have been of the character which has been described by the solicitor. In no one instance, during that time, has there been any case prosecuted by order of the Court of Aldermen which has had a political character of any description. As far as my judgment goes, in every case which has come before me it has been greatly for the benefit of the public that the prosecution had been taken up by the magistrates. It has prevented the possibility of collision, it has assisted in the vigorous prosecution of cases, which from the poverty and the position of the parties could not have been effectually prosecuted if the aldermen had not come to their assistance. I take this opportunity of saying, with regard to the general exercise of their duties as magistrates, that as far as the judge in the Central Criminal Court can form an opinion from the depositions which come before him, I am disposed to say that the committals by the City magistrates would bear the most advantageous comparison with those of any other class of magistrates who commit to the Central Criminal Court. I do not mean to depreciate the committals of other magistrates, but those from the City have been justified by the results of the trials, as well as supported by the general nature of the cases, in such a manner as to show that those duties are executed by the aldermen in a way which is for the public benefit.

5675. (Mr. G. Cornewall Lewis.) In your capacity as judge of the Central Criminal Court have you the means of comparing the committals of the aldermen with the committals of other police magistrates. Cases come before you from all parts of the metropolis, do not they?—Cases come before me from all parts of the metropolis, and they come also from county magistrates, from outlying portions of the metropolitan district. There are some portions of the counties where magistrates, who are not professional men, still have jurisdiction to commit. I have an opportunity of seeing the committals and depositions taken by the magistrates of all classes, and I repeat that the depositions as they come before us from the City magistrates will bear advantageous comparison with those of any class of magistrates who commit to that court.

5676. Is there anything which you wish to add to your evidence of yesterday?—There is. With respect to the propriety of referring it to some legal officer to exercise supervision or control over legal proceedings before they are instituted, I expressed myself yesterday according to first impressions. It was a subject which my attention had never been drawn to before, and I spoke as I thought at the moment. I do not desire to qualify the statement I then made, that I believe the committees exercise a wise discretion, and that they are advised by prudent and cautious officers, but looking at it as a question of principle, and looking at it in reference to several facts which have come across my mind since I have been reflecting on the subject, I wish to change the opinion I expressed, and to say that I think such an alteration would be beneficial, and also to change the expression I used when I said I thought that the recorder could not properly be such an officer, seeing that his engagements at the Central Criminal Court took him away from the focus of every-day business. I desire to say that I should see no objection to such functions being vested in the recorder or the town clerk, with such a town clerk as we now have, because the objection to counsel appearing in Westminster Hall whose time is so absorbed at the Central Criminal Court principally arises from a want of forensic habit, which, unless it is kept up, does not leave a gentleman upon a fair footing with his competitors; but it is not so with respect to a function such as has been proposed by the question. I think that if the recorder were required to be consulted upon all questions of law before either a suit or a defence were commenced, it would be a very wholesome and excellent regulation. However honest the City solicitor may be in his recommendations, still, inasmuch as his income partially depends upon business, it would be impossible for him to stand before the world free from the suspicions which ordinarily fall upon men who are doing acts in which their own interests are largely involved. On the other hand, I have had painfully to feel the evil in an opposite direction. I have often felt that I have given feeble advice for fear of subjecting myself to such an imputation. In order to remedy the evil as much as possible, I have generally, in my cases which I have read to the committee, cast upon the counsel whom I have consulted the duty of expressing their opinion, not upon the question as a mere dry question of law, but as one in which they are bound to consider the position of the corporation consulting them. Within the last fortnight I had occasion to consult Sir Richard Bethell and several other eminent counsel upon a point in which questions of law and equity and conveyancing were combined. That was as to the Irish society. I introduced into the case a statement that though the Attorney General of Ireland, and eminent counsel there had expressed an opinion in one form, yet inasmuch as the Irish Society had been suspected and accused of a tendency to litigation, and I had profited by it, I felt it right to charge counsel to give advice to the Irish Society, such as could be maintained, having regard to their moral position in the eyes of the world. Therefore the moral control which the question to me assumed, would be, and was in that case exercised by the counsel concerned. Nevertheless, I am bound to say that in several cases that I have been entrusted with, it would have been a very great relief to my mind if there had been some such controlling officer, for although I recognize in Mr. Serjeant Merewether, a distinguished and experienced lawyer, yet I am bound by my oath and by my sense of duty, sometimes to struggle before the committee in favor of my own legal opinion, while out of that room, I should feel myself justified in bending to his judgment. If Mr. Serjeant Merewether, as town clerk, or the recorder gave me a fiat for any proceeding, I should be at once disembarrassed of all obligations beyond those of an attorney carrying out a case to the utmost of his ability. There are now sometimes conflicting duties which very painfully operate upon my mind, and I have no hesitation in saying that I consider that part of my salary is earned by the weight of those responsibilities, and without reference to what is the proper remuneration of the City Solicitor. I think a deduction might very fairly be made from his salary to remunerate any officer who was charged with the deep responsibility which would belong to such a functionary.

5677. If it were either the recorder or the town clerk, or any officer who had charge of such a function, would not it be easier for him to take a moral view of the case, than for the counsel who might be consulted upon it. Is not it rather going out of the professional course, to ask counsel to do so?—That may be so. It is always well to illustrate a principle by a fact. I wrote these words at the end of my case which was read to the court of the Irish Society, and I requested the governors and deputy governor, and Mr. Sheriff Wire, who is a solicitor, to attend at the consultation. "The society consider that they "are placed in a different situation from other holders of property in Ireland, they have a "fiduciary character; they are trustees for the public, and they have no right to compromise "interests which the public have in the administration of the funds of the society. There "are several public improvements in the district where the estates are situated, which the "society are anxious to aid or affect, had they sufficient funds for the purpose. The "society on the other hand desire to avoid litigation, unless there is a fair and reasonable "ground for believing, that they have a right either to the fine or the additional rent in "in the case put." In the opinion of counsel after dealing with the question as a matter of law they say—"we think that, considering the position of the society, they are not at "liberty to forbear asserting their right to this compensation;" and in case the decision which was then pending in the courts of Ireland, should be against the society, they advise an appeal to the House of Lords. This is similar to the advice which our agent had received in Ireland, from the law officers of the Crown there; but, still feeling myself the difficulty in which I was placed, my advice was feeble. I should, probably, but for that feeling, and knowing how much we have been impugned for wasting, as it was said, the time of the Irish Society, at once under such advice have told the society,—It is a matter of law; I advise you to proceed. With respect to the metage case, I will now call the attention of the Commissioners to an examined copy of the judgment by the confession of the attorney-general in the reign of James the First. I have presented to the Commissioners merely a statement of the circumstances of the suit and not the evidence, with respect to it. This applies both to the conservancy and to the metage question. In the reign of James the First the Crown instituted proceedings against the corporation of London, challenging them to show by what title they claimed to be conservators of the river Thames, and by what title they claimed the metage and measuring of all measurable goods. The corporation of London, in the pleas stated here, set up that they had that title by prescription, and that there was an Act of Parliament in the reign of Richard the 2nd, that confirmed their title to all their rights and privileges which they then possessed. The Attorney General replies upon it—here is the plea—the terms in which we charge it are these :—" And further the same Mayor and commonalty, &c., say, That " all the customs, liberties, privileges, and franchises of the City aforesaid, for a long time " used by the authority of the Parliament of the Lord Richard the Second, late King of " England, after the conquest, held at Westminster in the seventh year of his reign, " were ratified and confirmed to the then Mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city " aforesaid, and to their successors ; and by that warrant the same Mayor and commonalty " and citizens of the said City of London, for the whole of the said time, &c., to hold and " exercise the said office" of conservators, and the said office of measurers, which are set forth in the previous part of the plea, in the very terms in which they are subsequently embodied in the charter of James the First, which terms, so far from being concealed, are set out in the bill against Messrs. Coombe and Company, and are printed in the Act of Parliament passed in the late reign, with regard to coals. It thus proceeds, " And Edward " Coke Knight, the attorney general who, &c., present here in court at the same day, in " his own proper person, and being asked and required if he was willing further to pro- " ceed in the premises against the aforesaid mayor, &c., says that having seen the plea of " the aforesaid Mayor, &c., and having fully and diligently understood and examined, " &c. Because it sufficiently appears to him, and is sufficiently attested here in Court, as " well by view of the aforesaid Act of Confirmation of the liberties, privileges, and fran- " chises aforesaid, as of divers evidences and other proofs, as by the relation and testimony " of divers trustworthy persons,—That the aforesaid Mayor, &c., and all their predecessors " from time whereof, &c., have used and enjoyed all and singular the liberties, privileges, " and franchises aforesaid, and others the premises in the said conformation above speci- " fied, in manner and form, &c., above in pleading alleged. The same attorney of the " now Lord the King doth not deny the same, but confesses and acknowledges the plea " aforesaid by the same Mayor, &c., in form aforesaid above pleaded, to be true, and that " he the same attorney, &c., will not further prosecute in the premises against the said " Mayor, &c., and whereupon the aforesaid mayor, &c., pray judgment in the premises, " and that they and their successors may use, have, enjoy, and receive all and singular " the liberties, privileges, offices, franchises, wages, rewards, and fees aforesaid ; and after " the premises in their aforesaid plea, and on view of the premises here had by the barons, " and on mature deliberation between them. It is considered by the same barons, that " the aforesaid mayor, &c., and their successors may have, receive, enjoy, and use all and " all manner, offices, privileges, liberties, franchises, wages, rewards, and fees aforesaid, " and other the premises in their plea aforesaid, above claimed from time to time, by virtue " of the aforesaid Act of Parliament ; and the same Mayor and commonalty and citizens " aforesaid, as to the premises may so from hence quit without delay ; saving always " the King's right if otherwise, &c." There is one circumstance in respect of the metage which is referred to in the evidence, but not in the statement of the corporation ; but as it is the wish of the corporation that nothing shall be left unanswered, I take leave to refer to the case of the oyster meters. The office of the oyster meters is a purchased office of the grantee and purchaser of the office of yeoman of the waterside, sold a century ago, the oyster meters having purchased with their places the right of alienation. Two of the oyster meters, in the course of years, have died without alienating, and they have died since the time when the corporation, according to its modern usage, refused to sell any office. The corporation, therefore, appointed two oyster meters, and they acted in concert with their colleagues. But the attention of the court was called by a petition to an abuse practised in Billingsgate Market, the abuse being that the holdsmen or persons engaged in the actual delivery of the oysters in heaping them up in the bushel and delivering them on deck were in the habit of receiving gratuities from the purchaser, in a tone and manner which rendered it necessary that they should be paid. They were, so to speak, compulsory voluntaries. They asked them in a manner that led them to believe that they would either be served late or served badly if they did not comply with this custom. The corporation found that they were receiving from their two nominees the dry produce of the place, it being decided according to a judgment in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Layburn v. Crisp, that the fee for metage included the cost of the labour, and that the meters were bound to find labourers out of that sum. The corporation, as soon as it came to their knowledge, insisted that the legal practice, as established by that case, should be carried out, but they found that the first thing to do was to clear themselves before they proceeded to correct others ; therefore, they said, we will not permit our two meters to take this money, and to hand us over only the legal fee ; but we will appoint two men, who are actual holdsmen, and they shall receive the whole of the amount and take no fees from the public. A bill has been filed against those two men by the other eighteen, the oyster meters setting up a quasi corporation, entitled to a partnership division of the receipts of them all, saying to those men,—If you have been choosing to pay the holdsmen to assist you, and to work yourselves, you are fools for your pains ; you shall receive only your proportionate share of the whole amount of the receipts, and you shall bring the whole amount of your receipts into the partnership division. Vice Chancellor Turner heard the case, and he decided that the doctrine in Layburn v. Crisp must be maintained, and that the oyster meters ought to pay their holdsmen out of the money received. But, strange to say, the the public will pay the holdsmen, and a conflict has taken place at Billinsgate, in which the corporation meters have been actually defeated, and they are compelled to receive this money; and it is in vain that we stick up notices in all directions to say the people are not bound to pay it; they will pay it, and they do pay it; and it is now before Lord Chancellor Wood, who feels that it is impossible to restrain people from paying a gratuity, if it is a gratuity, and I believe the effect of it will be that it will lapse into its ancient state and conditon. We have struggled at a very great expense. We had hoped that the matter might have been arranged, and that the corporation would have been enabled upon fair terms to have bought up the places which their ancestors had sold, so as to effect a total change.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

5678. Is there any reason to suppose that those holdsmen who take gratuities from the public, make any return by way of giving over measure so as to defraud the seller?—The seller is upon the spot. The proprietors of the oysters themselves attend, and although they petitioned us to put an end to this practice, the strong impression upon my mind, is that from some cause which I cannot very well understand, they really did not desire to break down the system. There is no effort as it appears to me to support the corporation in what they have done.

5679. It has been stated in evidence by some of the witnesses, that they were aware that the corporation were desirous of putting down the practice, but that they found themselves unable to do so?—If I were paid by fees and emoluments, instead of being paid by salary, that would have been a very rich and valuable suit.

5680. How many oyster meters are there who are not under the City?—There are eighteen day oyster meters, and three night meters.

5681. They are independent of the City, having derived their offices from purchase?—They affirm that they are independent from something that dropped from Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and also from Vice Chancellor Page Wood; it would rather seem as if their impression was that the corporation might by its power to change its customs, deal with the whole matter, but while this quasi fellowship remained it could not deal with it in detail. They seem to imply that they did not know that the corporation might not make some superior regulations, to over-ride the regulations of this partnership.

5682. Are the holdsmen appointed by the meters or by the corporation?—They are nominated by the owners of the oysters, and they are appointed by the meters. I should say that I believe a strong feeling prevails in the mind of the corporation, that those parties would be harshly dealt with if a strict measure of law were dealt out to them, and they were compelled to pay the holdsmen out of their legal fees. They having bought the office at some time, however irregularly, from persons for whom we are not morally or legally responsible, in all probability if they were to come to the Court, the court would deal fairly with the whole transaction; and it is very possible, if we had some such officer as the question to me yesterday assumed, he might have thought it right to have taken an enlarged view of the question at that time, and have tried some other mode than that which I tried.

5683. I will call your attention to the question and answer No. 2262, in the evidence of Mr. Henry Gibbs, and various other persons who appeared as proprietors of oyster grounds at Queenborough, and as members of a deputation of oyster meters and proprietors generally. "Are you to be understood that the persons who actually measure "the oysters, being the servants of the City deputy meters, cheat the sellers, being bribed "by the purchasers to give over measurement? I believe it frequently occurs, but there "are several gentlemen now before you who will speak positively to that point, they "having been and are sellers at Billingsgate Market." The statement of the witness is that those measurers cheat the sellers, being bribed by the purchasers to give them overmeasure. Do you believe that to be the fact?—I am quite satisfied, if you had asked Mr. Gibbs whether the meters who attend him did so, he would have said, no. It was at the instance of Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Alston that the City meters were appointed, who were to refuse to receive those gratuities. It is extraordinary to me that the oyster sellers, if that is so, did not concur with the corporation in putting a stop to the practice. It is clear if they concurred with us that they might do it. The enormous sums of money which are paid to buy those officers are quite inconsistent with the income which is attributed to them.

5684. Would the compensation requisite to abolish the offices of those 21 persons be considerable?—I think it would, because I think that they have given very large sums of money for some irregular profits that we know nothing of, and I think the pressure which is put upon the corporation now keeps up the market. They think we must buy. That is my impression, that they think there has been a strong moral feeling acting for some time upon the corporation, and that those places sooner or later will be bought up. They would not command, in my opinion, the prices they do, unless they received more fees than they acknowledge to, which I have no reason to suppose, or unless they expected they would be bought up. I know some of them personally, and believe them to be very respectable men. I do not charge them, therefore, with receiving more fees. I am only putting the fact that the price they pay for their place is very much above what anybody would seem to imagine was the fair purchase money for such a situation. It is one of the evils perpetrated by our ancestors, the rich merchants and bankers who had the management of the corporation and sold those places.

5685. In the evidence of Mr. Gibbs, he goes on to mention a tax of 2*s.* on every fishing vessel, which is levied by the marine society?—With that the corporation has nothing to do, and I do not know anything with respect to it. With respect to the City solicitor being paid by salary instead of by fees, I stated yesterday that there were cases under which the Attorney General did receive costs. In the case which was then under consideration, the solicitors for the woods and forests were entitled in my opinion to receive costs, and they did so. The rule laid down by Lord Cottenham, in regard to the costs of the Attorney General was this, he said the Attorney General receives no costs because he pays no costs; parties to a private suit receive costs because they pay costs, but there are occasions when parties to a private suit do not pay costs, and in corresponding cases to those, the Attorney General is entitled to receive them, because he stands upon the same footing with Her Majesty's subjects generally. In the case of over-ruling the exceptions to the answer of the City, inasmuch as the judgment below was confirmed, of course under no circumstances could we have claimed costs. The costs were given to the Attorney General, and to the amount of 221*l.* we paid them. The difficulty to my mind was this, if a gentleman was paid by salary instead of being paid by fees, supposing such costs to be received by him, his principal would participate in those emoluments. With respect to the case of Bessell v. Wilson, to which I referred yesterday, when the Court quashed the conviction, there was an intimation from the Court that there should be no action brought, and the rule was drawn up in that form; but the parties would not accept the rule in that form. They said, "No; the court has no power to deprive us of our common law right of action; it has quashed the conviction and it may have intimated an opinion upon the subject, but we claim our right." Accordingly they brought the action. I only use that for the purpose of intimating to the Commissioners, that it cannot have been a very bad case in the judgment of the Court when they intimated the opinion that there should be no action brought. The action however was brought, and 100*l.* damages was recovered for some fifteen hours detention. It was a strong verdict, but it was alleged, that although this party was apprehended upon a warrant to bring him before the magistrate to show why he did not appear to pay the penalty, he was taken in the evening and locked up during the night. There was no charge of misconduct against the police, but it was said that the station-house was damp. Whether it was or was not so I do not know. I was not in a condition at the trial to prove anything respecting it, and we had to pay for the consequences of it, and we paid 100*l.* I make no complaint of anybody; that was the verdict obtained. Probably if we had had some comptroller over the institution, or defence of actions, I might have applied in that case, and might have been sanctioned in compromising it. It is possible, but I do not know that it would have been so. I had no such power. I may remark that I am in a difficulty at this moment, and I wish I had some controlling power to resort to. An action has been brought against an officer for keeping a man in prison a day more than he ought. The attorney is a very respectable man, and I believe if a 5*l.* note would satisfy his client I should be happy to pay it; but I asked the committee of aldermen, and they said: "Mr. Solicitor, do you think there is a good "defence to this action?" I said, "I believe there is." They said: "As public men "we feel a difficulty in inviting other actions by compromising this." It may lead to a trial at law, and I am involving the corporation in the expenses of such a trial. I should be very glad to have some one to fall back upon to give me instructions, which would be my justification.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5686. Will you have the goodness to explain the division between your duties and those of the comptroller; he is also an attorney, is not he?—He is.

5687. Do you conduct all litigated questions?—I do.

5688. Both in law and in equity?—Yes.

5689. The comptroller merely manages what may be called the conveyancing business?—In his professional department only the conveyancing business. He has an official department in which he acts as clerk to the City Lands committee, and as clerk to the Markets committee; he is comptroller of the chamber, and makes out the charge upon the chamber. I have myself filled that office pro tempore during the last vacancy. The gentleman who now holds it is very ill, and if you wish to ask me any question respecting it, I am acquainted with it.

5690. The comptroller prepares the leases, does not he?—Yes.

5691. If an action were brought upon a lease you would bring it?—I should.

5692. Wherever there is any litigation founded upon that business which is in the management of the comptroller, it would come into your department?—It would. Where any question arises upon the draft of a deed, I am usually consulted; if it is a matter that may possibly lead to litigation, I am consulted in every stage of it.

5693. If the opinion of counsel is taken does the case go through you?—If the opinion of counsel is taken upon mere questions of title and conveyancing, it is taken by him; if it is taken upon questions of construction, it would be taken by me preparatory to or tending to litigation either way.

5694. You say the comptroller has the control of the chamber. Are the Commissioners to understand that the comptroller checks the chamberlain's accounts?—He checks the receipt of money payable into the chamber.

5695. Do you mean the money actually received, or does he make out an account of what ought to be received?—He makes out an account of what ought to be received from the deeds of the corporation; he also makes out what is reported to be received from the markets and the coal exchange, and so on. Those separate officers make a return to him as well as a return to the chamberlain. In the case of the markets, he examines the accounts and puts his initials to the amount, showing the balance to be paid into the hands of the chamberlain. The chamberlain recognises his initial as a voucher for him to receive a certain sum of money; he receives that. Those vouchers go afterwards to a committee of the Common Council, of which the comptroller is the clerk, and they audit those accounts; but during the interval when it is paid into the chamber, he enters it in his own book, and it becomes a charge upon the chamberlain. At the end of the year, when the charge is made up, the total of those items is introduced as his charge upon the chamberlain. So far it is an account; in other respects it is an estimate; you charge him with receiving so much, and he discharges himself by saying there is so much received, and there is so much arrear. At the audit those are compared.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5696. There is a difference between the comptroller's account and the chamberlain's account, which ought to appear as the amount of arrears?—No doubt it does so. They check their accounts with each other at the end of the year, and there is no doubt that in the charge and discharge that is the amount.

5697. With regard to the markets the comptroller renders an actual account to the chamber, and the balance merely is paid over?—The whole is paid into the chamber; there are some deductions for particular wages, but the general mass of the expenditure is drawn by warrant. There are certain weekly payments, and so on, which are subjects of deduction, but since I was comptroller, which was only for a couple of months on the occasion of the vacancy, there has been a constant tendency in that office, and all other offices, to bring into charge the whole amount. Dr. Bowring proposed in Parliament that the goverment accounts should be kept in that way, and there was a resolution of the House of Commons which would have led to the government bringing everything into charge, and then discharging itself by paying it. There has been a constant tendency, even before that discussion in the House of Commons, on the part of the corporation to arrive at that result.

Edward Bullock, Esq.

EDWARD BULLOCK, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

5698. You hold the office of common serjeant, do you not?—I do.

5699. How long have you held it?—I have held it nearly four years.

5700. In what manner does the appointment take place?—It is an appointment in the gift of the Common Council. The majority of the Common Council decides.

5701. Will you state what is the amount of the salary and emolument of the office?—1,500*l.* per annum is the salary.

5702. Are there any other receipts besides the salary?—There are some occasional fees for extra business; for opinions and cases in court occasionally.

5703. You, yourself, are a barrister?—I am.

5704. Is the office always held by a barrister?—Always.

5705. Will you describe the duties of the office?—The main duty of the office is attendance at the sessions of the Central Criminal Court, where I sit as one of the City judges.

5706. The recorder sits in one court and you in another,—is not that so?—The recorder sits in one court, I in another, and the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, Mr. Gurney, as a commissioner, sits in the early part of the day to try any short cases there may be before the judges come, and to prepare the court for them; and if the sessions are lengthened after the judges have ceased attendance, we should be all three sitting in the three courts.

5707. How often are the sessions of the Central Criminal Court held?—About once a month on an average; the intervals generally are rather shorter than a month, but once or twice, rather longer than a month.

5708. Is there any distinction between the cases which come before the different courts?—They always place the more serious cases before the judges when they come on the Wednesday, and as long as they continue to sit. I do not think there is much distinction in the rest.

5709. Are the cases which come before the recorder and those which come before the common serjeant similar in their character?—Quite similar. They may make some arrangement as to the length of the cases, but I am not aware that they do.

5710. How many days do you usually sit in each session?—We usually sit now about four or five days; generally the session terminates on the fifth day, about the middle of the day.

5711. Are your duties at the Central Criminal Court the ordinary duties of a judge in a Crown Court?—Exactly so.

5712. You try prisoners with a jury, and act as a judge ordinarily does under such circumstances?—Yes.

5713. If any difficulty arises before you in the course of any case you are trying, have you an opportunity of consulting with the other judges?—Yes; we never miss the opportunity when the judges are there on the Wednesday, or if the judges are not there, I always confer with the recorder or with the commissioner, where I think it necessary.

Edward Bullock, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5714. Is there any other duty besides that of sitting in the Central Criminal Court which you discharge?—There is the duty of attending the Court of Aldermen, and the Court of Common Council in case my opinion may be required—that is not so imperative a duty as the other.

5715. Are you in the habit of regularly attending the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council?—Not very regularly. I generally do so, especially if I see in the notice anything that is likely to give rise to a question to me.

5716. Your attendance then would be for the same purpose as the attendance of the recorder, to advise upon questions of law,—would it?—Except that the recorder acts as the assessor of the Lord Mayor; the Lord Mayor being chairman, the recorder is his mouth-piece and adviser.

5717. Your attendance would be principally in order to be consulted upon questions of law?—That I presume to be the ground of my being summoned.

5718. You are not in the habit of taking part in the debates?—Not at all.

5719. Are there any other duties?—There is the duty of acting as assessor to the sheriff at common hall, on the day of the election of the City officers.

5720. That would probably be for a similar purpose?—Except that I there take an active part in proposing the candidates, that is the method of putting the court in action. I proclaim the names, and advise the sheriffs as to any point which may arise at the time.

5721. Does not the recorder act in a similar capacity?—Yes; he does not hold the court, he intimates to the livery for what purpose they are assembled; he then retires with the Lord Mayor during the time of the election, and then the sheriffs assume the court.

5722. While the sheriffs are acting, the common serjeant attends there?—He is their officer, and he proclaims the names of those who are to be mentioned as candidates.

5723. Is the common serjeant considered to have any peculiar connection with the office of sheriff?—He is more especially the officer of the Common Council, but I do not know that that distinction is ever brought into action; he considers himself so, and is so considered.

5724. Is there anything else appertaining to your office, which you wish to explain?—No; having seen what has been said by the recorder and the town clerk, nothing further suggests itself to my mind. I should like to confirm the recorder in one observation which he made about the attendance of the Lord Mayor and aldermen at the sessions of the Central Criminal Court. I never knew any occasion of their interference except as a casual observation, which may be made by any one sitting by,—"Do you believe that?"—or "how can that be?"—but nothing as far as the trial of the case goes. I hold that their attendance is frequently of good service as far as our own satisfaction is concerned, in the opportunity it gives of consulting them as to the degree of punishment to inflict.

5725. Practically the Lord Mayor and the aldermen do not interfere more in the trials than any magistrate sitting on the bench at assizes in the country would do?—Certainly not; certainly not so much as where they are sitting in quarter sessions.

5726. Does your duty as common serjeant occupy your time so much as to preclude you from attending at Westminster Hall?—It does in effect; if I had any cause coming on I might be required to be absent in consequence of the sessions of the Central Criminal Court—my clients elsewhere could not depend upon me.

5727. Was not it the custom for the common serjeant to practice in ordinary business at Westminster at one time?—Yes; but the number of the sessions at the Central Criminal Court has very much increased since that. There used to be only eight sessions, and now there are twelve.

5728. By the terms of your appointment you are not debarred from practice?—I am not debarred from attending in any court except inferior courts of criminal jurisdiction.

5729. Do you ever appear for the corporation in court?—I have appeared for them two or three times in the courts at Westminster, but that does not often happen; it does not necessarily happen now; it used necessarily to happen, but of late in the appointment of the common serjeant, they have stipulated that should not necessarily happen.

Russell Gurney, Esq.

RUSSELL GURNEY, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

5730. The office you hold is that of judge of the Sheriff's Court?—It is. As judge of the Sheriff's Court, I preside at the Small Debts Court, by Act of Parliament.

5731. How does your appointment take place?—By the Common Council.

5732. How long have you held the office?—Since the year 1850. Previously, from 1830 to 1845, I held the office of common pleader; for the next five years I was not connected in any way with the corporation. In 1850 I was elected judge of the Sheriff's Court.

5733. The appointment takes place under a local Act, does not it?—Not the appointment of judge of the Sheriff's Court; that is an ancient office. When the Small Debts Court was created, it was provided that the judge of the Sheriff's Court should preside as judge of the Small Debts Court.

Russell Gurney, Esq.

5734. What is your salary?—1,200*l.* a year.

5735. Is there anything additional received by you?—Nothing. There are some fees received in the cases of writs of trial sent down by the superior courts to be tried at the Sheriff's Court; but any amount of fees is deducted from the salary. I believe that that will explain a difference which appears between the account of the amount paid, and the return made of the salary, which I see has been referred to in evidence.

5736. You are, probably, not debarred from private practice?—I am not, theoretically.

5737. Practically are you so?—To some small extent I practice.

5738. How much attendance have you to give in the performance of your duties?—In the old Sheriff's Court there are about two courts a month, appointed at the beginning of the year; but very often there is no business. In the Small Debts Court the business has a good deal increased; and I think now from two to three days a week I am required to attend. Besides that, I am in the commission of the Central Criminal Court, and have to attend there occasionally.

5739. How often do you attend at the Central Criminal Court?—I have to attend first of all for the opening of the Court and the swearing of the jury, every day the judges are there. I have to keep the Third Court full; there is the recorder in one, the common serjeant in another, and, when the judges are not there, I have to take the Third Court. Besides that, there has been an arrangement that each of us is away for one session; so that there are two sessions in the year when either the recorder or the common serjeant is absent, and then I have to sit the whole session.

5740. Your time must be pretty fully occupied with your different judicial duties?—It is.

5742. The Commissioners have had their attention called to the terms of the Act constituting the Small Debts Court in the City, and the use of the word "employment" there. One of the witnesses stated that it was submitted to you before it passed, and that that word was put in intentionally. Has there been any complaint made as to the difficulty of finding out who has employment in the City?—No. Everybody I have heard speak of it has stated it to be a great improvement; there were a great number of clerks in the City, who obtained credit by virtue of their employment. They were known as clerks employed either at the Government offices, or some of the mercantile establishments; but people could not find out where they lived; consequently, there was a difficulty in serving them. The creditor knew where they were employed, and knew, therefore, what court would have the jurisdiction. The original omission of this word was thought to be an evil, and the introduction of it was intended as a correction of that evil. The words used in the first Small Debts Act were supposed to include those cases, and parties were sued where the business of their employers was carried on. It was held that the words must refer to a man carrying on his own business, and not his master's business.

5743. Is the number of causes which you try in the Small Debts Court large?—Last year there were between 10,000 and 11,000 plaints. A great many of them are not tried, being settled before the day of hearing.

3745. The amount of the cases necessarily limits their importance?—Our jurisdiction extends to debts of 50*l.*

5746. Do you conceive that the cases which come into your court are rather more important than those tried in other county courts?—I think they are. In Liverpool and Manchester it might be the same. A friend who sat for me, when I was at liberty to appoint a deputy during absence, had sat in other county courts for other judges, and he told me that the class of cases in the City court was different from those in other courts.

5747. Is there any distinction in your court between debts under 20*l.* and debts under 50*l.*, with respect to the plaintiff being entitled to costs if he sues in a superior court?—There is.

5748. Can a case be stated in appeal if the amount is above 20*l.*?—Between 20*l.* and 50*l.*

5749 Is there anything further you wish to state to the Commissioners in reference to any of your duties?—I practised for many years in the Lord Mayor's Court, and can give the Commissioners any information they may desire respecting it.

5750. Have you formed any opinion upon the custom of foreign attachment?—I think, upon the whole, it is very beneficial; at least, it was when I saw more of it. I think that a change has been made since that time, which would render some alteration necessary. In the custom of foreign attachment, there is a good deal of power placed in the hands of the attorney concerned for the plaintiff; and a good deal depends,

Russell Gurney, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

I think, upon the mode in which his practice is conducted. Formerly, there were only a limited number of attorneys; their offices were offices of great value, and they were responsible to the Court of Aldermen for the way in which they exercised their duties; so that there was a great check upon their conduct, which, now that it is thrown open to the whole of the profession, there is not; and that may render necessary some precautions which were not found to be necessary previously.

5751. If the custom is a good custom for the City of London, does not it seem that it would also be a good custom for the rest of the metropolis?—I think so, certainly.

5752. Do you think it would be a good custom for the whole of the kingdom?—I do; at least in the metropolis and in large commercial towns, where there is a local tribunal by which it can be enforced.

5753. What do you consider to be the principal effect of it, as regards the remedy of the plaintiff?—It affords him the means of procuring the payment of debts, in cases where it could not otherwise have been obtained.

5754. It enables the plaintiff to get at money belonging to the defendant, in the hands of a banker; is not that the practical effect of it?—Yes; there are a great many occasions also on which you obtain property where it is not in the hands of a banker. Supposing I found a person owed my debtor money, I might attach that debt.

5755. Are the cases of bankers the usual cases, or are other cases very frequent?—The other cases are frequent; but the more common case is that of a banker.

5756. Your opinion is decidedly in favour of the custom?—It is.

5757. Do you think there is any hardship in the amount of bail which is required to be put in, in cases of foreign attachment; having no reference to the amount of the property attached, but only to the debt sought to be recovered?—I think clearly some alterations are required in that respect, and in one or two other respects, which can be mentioned. There are, undoubtedly, some facilities for fraud, which ought to be corrected.

5758. Does not it seem to be a hardship that the amount of bail to be put in should not be in some measure proportioned to the amount of the property attached?—I think it ought not to exceed it, at any rate.

5759. The effect of the custom is that the debtor's debtor, the garnishee, is brought into court, is not it?—It is.

5760. Does it ever operate as a hardship upon a person in that situation, to be brought into court when the original action was not against him?—If he admits having the money, he suffers judgment by default, and does not appear at all.

5761. There may be disputes between him and the defendant; there may be a cross account or a set off?—Then he must come into court.

5762. He is made a party to litigation when it is possible that the defendant in the existing suit might never have brought him into court?—Yes; and I think there is a hardship in the rule which provides that no costs shall be paid. I think the garnishee ought to be entitled to his costs; he never gets nor pays costs.

5763. If the garnishee admits the debt and pays the money, would a recovery against him be any protection to him in a dispute between him and the actual defendant?—It has been so held.

5764. That proceeds upon the principle that the defendant might come in and dispute the question?—Yes; any party besides the defendant who claims the money attached, may come in by filing a bill of proof.

Ferdinand Brand, Esq.

FERDINAND BRAND, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

5765. You are the comptroller of the Bridge House estates?—I am; the title of my office is clerk at the Bridge House, and comptroller of the works and revenues of London Bridge.

5766. By whom are you appointed?—By the Court of Common Council.

5767. How long have you held your office?—Nearly fifteen years. I was connected with the office before that. Altogether I have been connected with the corporation upwards of twenty-nine years.

5768. What is the amount of your salary?—My salary is 300*l.* a year. I have an allowance for stationery of 21*l.* a year. I have emoluments derived from other sources. I am solicitor to the Bridge House estates, and I transact all the legal business connected with the Bridge House estates as well as the conveyancing; from that I derive an emolument, which, in the year 1852, was 81*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* I prepare all the leases of the Bridge House estates; and, from that source, leases and applications for leases, licenses to assign and demise, and fees on the registry of wills and administrations, I derived in the same year the amount of 325*l.* By a covenant in the Bridge House leases I am entitled to prepare all assignments and under leases of the Bridge House property, from which I derived an emolument in the year 1852 of 286*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, making the total of gross emoluments 1,013*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, from which sum are to be deducted the whole of the expenses of my office, which are paid by myself—salaries to clerks, stationery, and other expenses, 312*l.* 14*s.* 0*d.*—leaving the net emoluments of the office 701*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* I also hold another appointment under the corporation connected with the Sheriff's Court.

Ferdinand Brand, Esq.

5769. You in fact discharge for the Bridge House trust the duties of chamberlain and comptroller and solicitor?—Comptroller and solicitor. The duties of the chamberlain, as connected with the Bridge House trust, are discharged by the bridge masters; they are two ancient officers.

5770. You discharge only the duties of comptroller and solicitor?—Comptroller and solicitor.

5771. Will you describe the manner in which the fund of the Bridge House estates is created?—It is created by ancient grants from the Crown, gifts from different individuals, and purchases of property arising from the saving of the revenues at different periods. On the first building of London Bridge, a sort of crusade was preached by Peter of Colechurch; he went about the country with a brief, and was enabled to collect funds towards the erection of the bridge. Sometimes money was given, and at other times land, for the purpose of building London Bridge; at other times grants have been made from the Crown, and purchases have been made out of the surplus rents and profits of the Bridge House estates. Property also has been given by will.

5772. The result is a fund formed from various sources?—Yes; held in trust for the maintenance and support of London Bridge.

5773. Can you describe to us the constituent parts of that fund; there is a portion derived from rents of land and houses, is not there?—I may say the whole is so derived with the exception of some dividends which arise from the produce of lands which have been sold at different times under the authority of Acts of Parliament: the money in such cases is paid into the Bank of England, and invested by the direction of the Court of Chancery, according to the provisions of those Acts, either in the purchase of other property, or in the funds. The whole of the Bridge House property now consists of landed estates, or the produce of landed estates converted into money, as I before mentioned.

5774. Do you make any payment towards the orphans' fund?—No.

5775. How is the Bridge House fund appropriated?—It is appropriated for the maintenance and support of London Bridge. At the present moment, the money that was raised for the re-building of London Bridge is secured upon the Bridge House estates; the sum of 431,000*l.* was advanced by Government out of the consolidated fund, and is charged upon the Bridge House estates; the repayment whereof is secured by various annuities, amounting in the whole to 21,550*l.* per annum, the whole of which annuities will be paid off in the year 1871.

5776. Will the charge be permanent up to that year?—It will.

5777. Will any diminution take place before that year?—The diminution will commence in 1867; up to that year there will be no alteration. In 1867 some of the annuities will begin to fall off, and they will all cease in 1871.

5778. Will the fund be entirely free in that year?—No; when the present Blackfriars Bridge required to be substantially repaired, a difficulty arose as to the means of obtaining funds for that purpose. The Government of that day considered that it would not be an improper application of the Bridge House funds to appropriate a portion of them in securing the repayment of the monies advanced for the repair of Blackfriars Bridge, and those estates were accordingly charged with the payment of 77,400*l.*, raised for the repair of Blackfriars Bridge; in respect of which, the sum of 73,100*l.* still remains unpaid.

5779. When will that charge expire?—That will depend upon circumstances. That charge of course applies only to the surplus rents and profits, after the payment of the 21,550*l.* a year to the Government, from the actual produce of the Bridge House estates. That surplus is about 5,000*l.* a year. That is charged, in the first place, with the payment of the annual expenses of the lighting, cleansing, watching, and repairing Blackfriars Bridge. Those expenses of course vary from year to year; and for the last two or three years, very considerable and extraordinary expenses have been incurred in the repair of the bridge. If those very heavy expenses recur frequently, it will of course retard the discharge of that loan.

5780. For the present the fund is entirely exhausted by the expenses in respect of London Bridge and Blackfriars Bridge, and the cost of collection?—Entirely so.

5781. The Bridge House estates are virtually the estates of the corporation, subject to a trust, are they not?—The corporation have the legal estate in the Bridge House property, but the estates are no part of the property of the corporation; they have no right to appropriate any portion of the Bridge House estates to their own corporate uses.

5782. They are trustees of a fund devoted to a particular purpose?—Yes.

5783. They cannot alter the application of the fund?—Not without the authority of Parliament.

5784. The entire management of the trust is vested in the corporation, is it not?—Entirely so.

5785. What would be the effect if the management of this fund were incorporated with the management of the estates of the City; would there be any saving of expense?—The saving of expense would simply be the salary which is paid to me of 300*l.* a year. The other emoluments of the office, derived from different sources, of course would not be saved to the corporation, inasmuch as they do not pay them. There would be a saving also of the salaries paid to the bridge masters.

5786. What do they amount to?—The senior bridge master receives about 380*l.* a year; the junior bridge master has 50*l.* a year less.

Ferdinand Brand, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5787. Who collects the rents of the property?—The bridge masters. They are the receivers; the rents are paid at their office.

5788. There is no collector who goes round?—No; according to the covenants in the leases, the tenants pay their rents at the office of the bridge masters.

5789. Is that the practice with respect to the other rents; are they paid to the chamberlain's office?—Yes; I believe the practice of the comptroller of the chamber and the department which I fill is precisely the same.

5790. Do the bridge masters personally perform any duty at all?—They receive the rents; the bridge masters attend personally for that purpose.

5791. Where is the office of the Bridge House estates?—It is now at Guildhall. There was an ancient establishment connected with the bridge house close to London Bridge, where all the officers, in ancient times, used to reside—the bridge masters, the comptroller, and all the officers connected with the establishment. Materials were kept there for the repair of old London Bridge, and the superintendent for watching the bridge and keeping it in repair was to be found there. About ten or twelve years since the bridge house in Tooley Street was pulled down, and the site thereof let for the benefit of the trust, and it now forms part of what is called Cotton's wharf.

5792. Has the alderman of Bridge Ward anything to do with the Bridge House estates?—He had at one time. Not the present alderman, but there was a justice of the bridge yard in ancient times, who had a residence at the bridge yard, and was paid a small stipend out of the Bridge House estates.

5793. We have heard something about Southwark Bridge. If the City purchased that, would it be entirely independent of the Bridge House estates?—I apprehend so. I do not think for a moment that the corporation are intending to purchase Southwark Bridge themselves.

5794. If they did they must provide the money out of their own estate, independently of the Bridge House estates?—Yes.

5795. Is there any other point which you wish to mention?—I see there has been a mistake made by some of the witnesses as to the amount of the annual revenue of the Bridge House estates. It is stated that the income of the Bridge House estates for the year 1852 was upwards of 47,000*l.*; by the printed accounts for that year that will be seen to be an error. In that amount of 47,000*l.* are included sums of money for the sale of property, which, of course, formed no part of the income or revenue of the estates.

5796. Was the produce of the property sold invested?—Yes; it does not come into the hands of the bridge masters or the corporation at all. Under the provisions of the Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act any money paid for the purchase of property situated as the Bridge House estates are is paid into the Bank of England, and can only be dealt with by the direction of the Court of Chancery. Some of the witnesses, however, have included 12,740*l.* as revenue or income, which forms no part of it.

5797. The Court of Chancery would probably direct the produce arising from the sale of that land to be carried to the account of the fund?—Yes; the money is invested in the funds, and the interest or dividends forms part of the income. Ultimately, the principal must be laid out in the purchase of other freehold property.

5798. Have you any explanation to offer with respect to the mode of letting the property of the Bridge House estates?—The practice of the corporation in letting their property is precisely the same with respect to the Bridge House estates as with respect to their own estates. They give a preference, in all cases, to the tenant in possession, their object being not to deal with a party who is the lessee, or the representative of the original lessee, but the party who is in actual possession of the property at or shortly before the expiration of the lease. That party has an opportunity of applying if he wishes it. It is ascertained first that he has such an interest as will enable him to retain possession of the property up to the time his landlord's lease will expire, and then he may make an application to the Court of Common Council for a lease. That application is referred to the Bridge House Committee; the committee then view the property. After the committee have viewed it, the surveyor makes a general survey of the property, and he reports his opinion to the committee as to the best mode of letting the property—whether it shall be let on a repairing lease for twenty one years, or any other term he thinks desirable, or whether the property is in such a bad condition that it should be pulled down and let upon a building lease. The committee then consider that report, and they agree as to the mode of letting the property. The tenant then comes to the committee, and treats with them for a lease, and till the tenant has failed in the treaty, or the treaty has gone off, no steps are taken for letting to any other party. The tenant offers a rent; if his offer be what the committee consider a fair offer, after consulting their own surveyor and using their own judgment, as men of business, they either accept it or tell the tenant that his offer is not what they consider the property worth, and if it approaches to their opinion of the value, they tell him the amount, and he either accepts or rejects it. If the tenant offers such an amount as is out of the question there is an end of the matter. If the committee agree with the tenant they then report the fact to the Court of Common Council, the Court of Common Council usually agree with the committee in their report as to letting the property, and then a lease is granted. If the tenant in possession does not treat, the property is advertised to be let by tender, no preference being given to any one. Then, if he is a respectable man, the party offering the highest rent has the property, in which case it is not necessary to report to the court.

Ferdinand Brand, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5799. Does it very often happen that the property of the City is let by tender?—Not very often; the occupying tenants usually treat.

5800. You say the practice is, in the first instance, to deal with the tenant in possession, and not to go to the lessee. Is there any restraint upon assigning or subletting any of the City leases?—The tenants are not to assign or underlet without licence.

5801. I suppose, from what you state, a licence is not unfrequently given?—It is not. The object of the corporation is to remove the middlemen altogether, and give the occupying tenant the preference.

5802. Does it often happen that the immediate lessee of the corporation obtains leave of the corporation to underlet?—Yes.

5803. Would the result be to divide the property, so that he may let it in parcels to a number of people?—It frequently is so.

5804. You say they give the option of the new lease to the immediate occupier?—Yes. We have frequently let a property where the ground rent was 20*l.* or 30*l.* a year; by dividing it out it has produced between 300*l.* and 400*l.* a year.

5805. You do not always comprise in any new lease the whole of the premises which were contained in the original lease?—Scarcely ever; the principle being to give the occupier who is settled and established and carrying on a trade the benefit of any advantage which is to be derived from holding directly under the City, instead of having another person over him who could screw out a larger rent by way of goodwill. I have brought with me the last audited account of the estate, which I beg to produce.

[The witness produced the same.]

5806. Reference has been made by one witness to a payment under the name of a benevolence to the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs. There is 50*l.* put down as paid to the Lord Mayor towards the charge of feasts during the mayoralty; and it has been intimated that it is a feast to the Bridge House Committee?—I beg to state that it is no such thing. The Bridge House Committee have no feasts during the mayoralty at all. They have a certain allowance from the corporation of London for their tavern expenses. Thi payment to the Lord Mayor is a very ancient payment. I find in the old books the first entry of it is in 1556. It is a payment of 50*l.* to the Lord Mayor, and 50*l.* to the two sheriffs "towards the greate feaste in Guyldehalle, called the Lord Mayres feaste." That payment has been continued ever since. With reference to the allowance to the committee, I should also state, that taking the average at the commencement of the year 1802, for eight years, it was something above 300*l.* for the attendance of members; and for their tavern expenses 900*l.* In 1832 the allowance for attendances was 200*l.*; and the allowance for tavern expenses 300*l.* Since 1836 the allowance for tavern expenses has been 300*l.* only; the attendance money having been entirely abolished.

5807. The Bridge House Committee is a committee of the Common Council?—It is.

5808. Their duties are not very onerous, are they?—Yes, I think they are. In a large estate like that of the Bridge House there are questions constantly arising as to letting and otherwise, also as to London and Blackfriars bridges.

5809. All the details of the estate in regard to granting new leases come before the committee?—All of them.

5810. They are not decided by you, in your office?—No.

5811. In fact, the Bridge House Committee performs the duty of manager of the estate?—They are the managers. The comptroller of the Bridge House estates has the general superintendence, subject to the supervision of the committee.

5812. Your office, therefore, involves very little responsibility upon you; you have rather to see that the directions of the committee are properly carried into effect?—And to take care that all facts connected with lettings, and other matters, are duly brought before the committee.

5813. You prepare the business for their consideration?—I have to prepare and arrange all the business for their consideration. Their meetings during the year 1852 were 32, and the average attendance of members from 16 to 18; they sometimes sit till 4 or 5 o'clock. Where there is a large estate, beside the business of its general management, there are a great many complaints from tenants, one against another. The committee very often act as arbitrators in such disputes. Some reference has been made to the borough of Southwark not deriving any advantage from the property held by the City. The property in Southwark to which allusion has been made belongs to the Bridge House estates. The purchase money was paid out of the Bridge House funds; and the rents and profits of these estates have always been received and appropriated as part of the Bridge House estates. Of course they are not applicable to improvements in Southwark in general terms, but I submit that the borough of Southwark has derived greater advantages from those estates being in the hands of a great corporation like that of London, than it would have done if the property had been in the hands of private individuals. On the estate in St. George's fields, for example, when the lease fell in there many years ago, the City expended large sums. They took an enlarged view of the subject as beneficial to the whole property, and consequently beneficial to the borough; and they expended very large sums of money in properly draining the whole of St. George's fields. They expended upwards of 12,000*l.* in sewerage, and upwards of 2,000*l.* in the formation of roads and ways, all of which have been beneficial to the public. The new road which has been formed by the Roman Catholic cathedral in the Westminster Road was formed entirely by the corporation. Many narrow ways were stopped up by arrangement with the trustees of the roads, and a fine opening made in front of Bethlehem Hospital. The corporation of London in setting out these roads set apart small portions, which were not very applicable to building purposes, and let them to Bethlehem Hospital, the Blind School, and the Philanthropic Society, at nominal rents, with the condition that they should be preserved as planted shrubberies, and kept open and unbuilt on during the whole term. In Tooley-street again very great improvements have been made by the Bridge House estate. The example was set of widening Tooley-street by setting back the property there from fifteen to twenty feet. In various other ways when opportunities have occurred of effecting improvements in the way of widening streets, it has been done by setting back the property, whereas other parties have refused to set back, unless they were paid for it. In that way I think the borough of Southwark has derived great advantage from the Bridge House estates being held by the corporation instead of by private individuals.

5814. Of course the tenants and occupiers o? the City houses pay parish rates and other rates like other tenants ?—They do.

5816. If the City were to make no actual outlay the parish of Southwark would derive the same contribution from the occupiers of the City houses as from any other class of houses ?—They would not have derived the actual outlay of 14,000*l.* from any private individual. The rate would have been made upon the inhabitants after the sewers were made; but had not it been for that 1,4000*l.* the sewers never would have been made at that time. Sewerage was not then so fashionable as it is now. I am speaking of more than twenty years ago. A statement is made by one of the witnesses in page 132, No. 1,221, as to the conflicting duties of the different committees of the corporation. It is said : "There is another point which is also of importance. Five years ago Blackfriars Bridge "was reported to be in a very unsound condition ; indeed, it had broken its back. The "engineers, Messrs. Walker and Burgess, required, that for the safety of the bridge, large "quantities of chalk should be thrown into the water round the piers, to prevent the bridge "falling down. In consequence of throwing so much chalk into the water, the passage in "the river was greatly filled up, and sundry accidents arose, which the Navigation "Committee had no power to prevent. Thus we have two conflicting jurisdictions :—the "Bridge House Committee, to keep up the bridge, and fill up the bed of the river ; and "the Navigation Committee to take away that which had been put in for the purpose of "sustaining the structure." I can only say, in answer to that statement, that two years ago, instead of five as is there stated, a report was made that symptoms of sinking had taken place at one of the piers of Blackfriars Bridge. Under the advice of Messrs. Walker and Burgess, the engineers under whose superintendence the bridge had been repaired ten years ago, the Bridge House Committee acted in directing that rubble should be thrown in to support the defective pier. That work was executed under the direction of Messrs. Walker and Burgess ; and I believe it is not correct that any of that rubble caused shoals or accidents on the river. A statement was made a short time ago that the steam boat called "the Ant" had met with an accident at Blackfriars bridge, occasioned by this rubble being thrown in. An investigation took place. Messrs. Walker and Burgess were directed to examine into the affair ; and they reported to the Bridge House Committee that upon a careful examination of the bridge none of the rubble which had been thrown in to support that pier had at all moved from its position. The Navigation Committee also inquired into the subject ; and it was ascertained very satisfactorily that the supposed accident to "the Ant," whatever it was, had arisen before it reached Blackfriars Bridge, and not in consequence of any shoals whatever connected with or adjacent to the bridge. The two committees act in perfect harmony, Mr. Leach, the engineer of the Navigation Committee, taking care that nothing shall be done to the prejudice of the navigation.

5817. Has there been any proposition under the consideration either of the Court of Aldermen or the Court of Common Council with respect to the purchase of Southwark Bridge ? —There has. By direction of the Court of Common Council, the Bridge House Committee have been in negociation with the directors of the Southwark Bridge Company.

5818. Can you give us any account of what has passed ?—The negociation first opened in 1849, at a conference with the directors of the Southwark Bridge Company. Upon that occasion the Southwark Bridge Company required the sum of 300,000*l.* for the purchase of that bridge.

5819. The Southwark Bridge Company are doubtless incorporated under Act of Parliament ?—I believe they are.

5820. An Act of Parliament which enabled them to build the bridge, and which probably gives them jurisdiction over the bridge and the approaches ?—Over the bridge ; they have nothing now to do with the approaches, except to a very small extent. The Southwark Bridge Company asked 300,000*l.* for the purchase of that bridge. They were asked by the Bridge House Committee if they would be good enough to state the basis upon which they formed that calculation; the directors gave for answer that the only basis they would give was that they had been offered 300,000*l.* by the North Kent Railway Company for the purchase of the bridge, and that sum they should require. The North Kent Railway Company had a plan for bringing their railway into the City, but the Bill did not pass the House of Commons.

Ferdinand Brand, Esq.

5821. Did it appear that this projected company had actually contracted to give that sum for the purchase of the bridge?—They had, subject to their Bill passing. The Bridge House committee had before them the report of the select committee of the House of Commons on metropolis improvements in the year 1836, when the subject of purchasing Southwark Bridge was entertained by Parliament. Finding from that that the dividends realised by the Southwark Bridge Company were confined entirely to the preference shareholders, and that the other shareholders did not receive one shilling, the dividend upon the preference shares being only 1¾ per cent., the committee of the Bridge House thought that 300,000*l.* was a large sum to ask, and they requested to know the basis upon which the calculation was formed; but the directors of the Southwark Bridge Company declined to give any other basis than that which I have mentioned.

5822. Did it appear what the number of the preference shares was?—There were 6700 preference shares.

5823. The profits appropriated to dividends must have been inconsiderable?—£2,600 was the annual income. Since that time I should say it has diminished; it has gradually been getting less and less, and they receive now about 1¼ per cent.

5824. What is the expense of maintaining the bridge?—It does not appear, it is said to be very small; they say that they have nothing but the collectors, and it requires very little repair. The negociation has been renewed recently. During the latter part of last year I attended again with the Bridge House Committee at a conference with the directors of Southwark Bridge; they still maintained their price of 300,000*l.*, and they do not appear to be disposed to make the slightest abatement. In fact, it was intimated that unless that sum was speedily given the price would be raised; they seem to have an impression that the bridge must be purchased for the public, and they think, as one of them said, that they will be able to get any price they like.

5825. Are the tolls levied upon Southwark Bridge high?—No; 2*d.* for a one horse carriage, and a 1*d.* for foot passengers.

5826. The traffic is inconsiderable, is not it?—Very inconsiderable.

5827. The approaches are very bad?—They are.

5828. If the City were to buy the bridge on public grounds, it would be almost necessary for them to improve the approaches, would not it?—No estimate has been made, but it has been pretty well calculated, by persons conversant with the subject, that, irrespective of the sum of money which may be paid for the purchase of the bridge, it would require an outlay of 150,000*l.* to make the approaches available, in order to render the bridge beneficial to the public. I have no idea that the Bridge House estates could be applied to the purchase of Southwark Bridge, nor do I conceive that the corporation of London should be expected to provide the whole of the money for its purchase, seeing that it is made in the nature of a national concern than a City one. I believe that the corporation desire to bring the matter into such a train that, with some assistance from the Government and by means also of their own funds, this bridge should be thrown open to the public.

5829. The northern end of Southwark Bridge abuts upon the City?—Yes, it does.

5830. You hold another appointment connected with the City, do you not?—Yes; I also hold the appointment of prothonotary and clerk of the papers, and clerk sitter of the Sheriffs' Courts.

5831. What are your receipts in that capacity?—I have a salary of 100*l.* a year. I receive an allowance for livery of 2*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and I derive emoluments from fees, amounting, in the year 1852, to 21*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*

5832. What are your duties?—The duties are not very onerous now. The old Sheriff's Court has, in point of fact, little or nothing now to do since the passing of the City Small Debts Act, and especially since the extension of the powers of that Act to debts not exceeding 50*l.*; but the corporation of London appointed me to hold those offices at that time rather because they contemplated some improvements themselves in the Sheriffs' Courts before the Small Debts Act was passed. I held the first of those appointments from the year 1832. When I was elected to the office of comptroller of the Bridge House estates I tendered my resignation. The corporation were then contemplating improvements in the Sheriffs' Courts so as to throw it open to the public generally, and they requested me to continue the duties of that office, in order that they might not be encumbered with the appointment of new officers, or any claim founded upon vested rights. As other offices have fallen in of the same kind, the whole of the offices have been accumulated upon me, with the exception of two of the clerk sitters. The business of the office was for many years conducted at Whitecross Street prison, under the provisions of the Act of Parliament for removing the compter in Wood Street, and the Poultry compter. The resort to a prison being considered very objectionable, the corporation were desirous of removing it from there; and in passing the Act for the Small Debts Court, a clause was inserted which enabled them to do so. Looking at the operation of the Small Debts Act, although the corporation did not feel that they could supersede the old Sheriffs' Courts altogether, they were not desirous of incurring unnecessary expense in the establishment of a new office and a new set of officers, therefore they requested me to take the duties of the office, performing them at my own office, thus avoiding the necessity of having another office for the discharge of those duties.

5833. Is that court now completely in a state of suspended animation?—It is so; the business is virtually annihilated, with the exception of replevins and writs of trial from the superior courts.

5834. Would there be any objection to the abolition of the court by Act of Parliament if the position of the officers was properly regarded?—I should think not. The Small Debts Court has virtually superseded the Sheriffs' Courts, and although I think one court in the City of London would be very desirable in the old fashioned form of court and jury, the Mayor's Court would be better adapted for that purpose than the Sheriffs' Court. The Mayor's Court being the superior court, plaints in the Sheriff's Court might be removed at any time into the Mayor's Court.

5835. If any business came before the Sheriff's Court, it would be as a Small Debts Court, would not it?—Not conducted on the same principle; the Sheriff's Court business is conducted in the same way as business at nisi prius.

5836. The subject of jurisdiction would be small debts, would not it?—Debts of any amount. At the same time there was a power of removal to the superior courts. The counsel in the old Sheriffs' Courts were the same counsel as in the Mayor's Court, the City pleaders. The corporation bought up all the rights of the City pleaders, and they have thrown open the Sheriffs' Courts to all attorneys, with a view of increasing the practice of that court.

Sir John Key, Bart.

SIR JOHN KEY, BART., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

5837. How long have you held the office of chamberlain?—Since June last.

5838. There was a contest for the office?—There was.

5839. We have heard from several witnesses an account of that contest. Some statements have been made with reference to the expenses of the candidates. One of the witnesses, Mr. Rose, stated in answer to Question 2924—"I think Sir John Key told me "that his election cost him upwards of 7,000*l.*" Is that a correct statement?—It is not. I never had any communication with Mr. Rose.

5840. Have you any objection to state what the cost of your election was?—I should think about 5,000*l.*; but I should say, in all contests where a person happens to become a candidate for any public office, whether it be a municipal or a Parliamentary contest, the expenses are ordinarily very large. I do not think that that altogether springs from any corruption in the constituency, but there are certain individuals in such cases who come forward, calling themselves agents, who cause a very large expense. As a proof of the expenses incurred on these occasions, I will refer to one fact. About nine or ten years ago, when the late chamberlain was a candidate for the office, I also was a candidate. It so happened that I was then living in Gloucestershire. Sir William Heygate died, I believe, on Sunday; his death was communicated on Monday to my son, but no communication came to me till Tuesday's post; consequently I did not get it till Wednesday afternoon. I am merely referring to this, to show how expenses are incurred. I assembled a few friends, and a committee was formed. After sending round circulars, I found that the chances of success were very problematical, and I consulted my committee whether it would not be the most honourable course to withdraw from the contest. I was strongly advised to try the result of a poll; but on Saturday night, after about two and a half days, I sent in a letter to the effect that I retired; at the end of that time I had a bill of 850*l.* sent in to me. That will enable you to form some idea of the amount of the expenses which are incurred on such occasions.

5841. While the election was going on, probably expenses were to a great extent incurred without any very accurate knowledge on your part as to what the object of them might be?—Quite so.

5842. After the election was over, did you make any inquiry as to the objects of the expenditure?—I have had an account of some of them. From one of those who acted as agent I have had no account. From the principal agent I find that, during the course of the contest, eighty cabs were kept at 1*l.* a day, waiting to bring up the voters; there were sixty clerks employed, as I am informed. All those matters would lead of themselves to considerable expenses. There were persons brought up from various parts of the country, some of whom had their expenses paid; others came at their own expense.

5843. Were the expenses of the conveyance of non-resident voters considerable?—No; I believe they did not exceed the amount of the actual cost.

5844. Were the expenses of canvassing agents large?—They were a large item in the account.

5845. Did you retain many attornies?—Yes; from the peculiarity of the circumstances, I had several agents. Living in the country, I was not at all aware of the probability of a vacancy, till some friend wrote to me, informing me that if I contemplated starting as a candidate it was necessary that I should come immediately, there being several parties canvassing. I came to town, and found that some of those parties had made an arrangement, and that the persons whom I had contemplated as my agents were engaged, or were so situated that they could not act for me. My principal agent was waiting to see whether the party who was intended to be brought forward by those with whom he and I had previously acted was disposed to start. By this uncertainty I was kept in suspense some days, and this rendered it necessary that I should employ another agent. This gentleman referred to, who had the book of the voters, and everything connected with the constituency, after some time however was prepared to come to me, so that I had not only himself but the other agent. He also had engaged the principal hotel for his client; I therefore had to engage others, which also increased the expense, as when he joined I was bound to take his plan also.

Sir John Key, Bart.

5846. Was any considerable sum expended in refreshments for voters, in tavern bills, and public houses?—I am disposed to think a very small amount. The bill at the hotel where my committee always met was paid by myself. It was very small; not much above 100*l.* for refreshments.

5847. Was there any expenditure in the nature of an allowance to voters for loss of time?—I am not aware. I believe there are a certain number of persons, not exceeding 300, though represented by the agents to amount to 2,200, who come and vote and have money for their loss of time for the day. I do not know it of my own knowledge.

5848. You feel sure that the total expenses of your election did not exceed 5,000*l.*?—They were about that amount, I believe, certainly not more.

5849. Since you have been elected, have you regularly discharged the duties of the office?—I have, constantly, from morning to night. In reference to that question, to shew the recklessness with which people swear to statements of the facts of which they know nothing, I beg to call your attention to Question No. 243. The witness states there, that the situation is a perfect sinecure. The question is, "Is that an office the duties of which "are weighty and arduous?" The answer is, "I believe it is the next thing to a sinecure." I refer also to Question 350: "Is it the amount of remuneration received by the chamberlain "that you object to, or the mode in which that remuneration is given?—Both. It is an "office approaching very nearly to a sinecure on the part of the chamberlain himself. The "former Commissioners describe the office as one of great labour and of the greatest "responsibility. Do you believe that to be an incorrect description of the office?—Certainly, "inasmuch as the duties are performed by deputy. If they had spoken of the office of "chief clerk to the chamberlain, it would have been a very accurate description of the "duties." The witness in 362 is asked, "Is not the chamberlain in a position of personal "responsibility which no clerk or deputy can be?" He answers, "No, he is not." I will now refer to the responsibilities of the duties performed by the chamberlain. It must be an office of great responsibility, inasmuch as he is responsible for the whole of the City funds. During the last year, the receipts for which he was responsible coming through the office were 1,219,511*l.*; payments 1,229,242*l.*, making a gross total of money passing over the counter 2,448,753*l.* I should say that this is not altogether cash; but the amount of actual money received by the chamberlain was about 800,000*l.*, the actual revenue of the City being about, say 200,000*l.*

5850. Does the chamberlain give security?—He does. He gives a very large security, and he is confined by a deed into which he enters at the time of assuming the office, as to the mode in which those sums are to be dealt with.

5851. What is the amount of the security?—The amount of security which he gives is 30,000*l.*, in responsible parties who must be approved of by the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee, and by the Court of Aldermen. Every month he is obliged to present his accounts before the committee, and if there be any sum appropriated or deposited in a manner, or upon securities which they do not strictly approve of, or if there is a larger balance than they think proper, at their recommendation an alteration is made. When there is a sum of money beyond the amount which the chamberlain is authorized to have at the bankers, he must deposit it on certain securities; it is generally lent upon what is called calls, because there is less risk of loss upon any sum of money being suddenly demanded than there would be by investing it in the funds. He might invest it in Government securities in the public funds, but inasmuch as money might be called for suddenly, and if there should be any fall, there might be a loss occur, the plan I have adopted is to lend it out on what are called calls, so that when any emergency arises and the money is wanted, it is received back; the nature of the security being the security of the person borrowing at call with the collateral security of either City bonds or Government securities.

5852. You would obtain a lower interest if it was lent at call, would not you, than if you invested it in the funds?—No, I think not generally; at the present time it would be a larger interest.

5853. The whole of the responsibility in respect to the application of the funds in the hands of the corporation at any moment is vested in the chamberlain?—It is. If any loss occurs from his mismanagement, he is the person responsible for it.

5854. That part of his business in fact, to a certain extent, involves the business of a banker, does not it?—It does.

5855. In making an arrangement with respect to the employment of those funds, does he act upon his own judgment?—He principally advises with the banker and with the chief clerk, and probably, with the broker—that is the plan I have adopted.

5856. Does he take any detailed instructions from the committee of the Common Council?—No; but every month he lays before them his accounts; and, as a proof of the close attention the committee pay to that, when I first became chamberlain I invested a sum of money upon call on the responsibility of eminent bill brokers, Messrs. Gurney, a house whose responsibility is equal to the bank. I took as collateral security, by the advice of the banker, Canada bonds at 6 per cent., thinking that that was a more prompt mode of turning the money again, if required, being of more ready sale or rather commanding a better price in the market. The committee, however, considered the matter, and thought that the security ought to be Goverment securities; therefore, I had those Canada debentures replaced by City bonds.

5857. Does the banking part of your business occupy much of your time?—Considerable; above a certain sum all amounts are paid by cheque—several cheques are signed in a day. I never sign a cheque without ascertaining that there is a proper warrant for it, and that the committee, by whom the cheques are warranted, have not overdrawn the amount placed to their credit by the order of the Common Council. Again all small sums under 100*l.* are paid through the desk of the cashier. Feeling that I am responsible for it, whatever may be the confidence I have in the cashier, which is great, I see every night what payments have passed through his hands, or if I am not able to do so at night I do so the next morning, and so as to all payments which have been made to him. The number of payments passing through his desk alone in the course of the year are 10,535, and receipts 9,088, total 19,623. I am responsible for those, and therefore I should not feel comfortable unless I looked into them myself. I find that the office occupies my attention and time from ten in the morning till five in the evening, and sometimes I am obliged to take papers home with me afterwards.

5858. Are there not other duties attached to the office of chamberlain?—There are, but not so responsible, nor of so heavy a nature.

5859. Will you describe them?—The Commissioners are probably aware that whenever an office falls vacant, the common council refer it to a committee to consider the duties of that office, the emoluments, and so forth, to see if any change can be advantageously made, either in the manner in which the duties of the office are performed or the emoluments derived from it. In my case that was done—there are a number of duties which devolve upon the chamberlain—one is to admit persons to the freedom of the City. Another of them is of a judicial character—to hear and decide all disputes between masters and apprentices, which frequently occur; the chamberlain has the power, when he thinks necessary, to commit an apprentice to Bridewell.

5860. Will you describe a little in detail the nature of that duty; are there many of those cases of apprentices which come before you?—The numbers are uncertain; sometimes there may be three or four in a day, at other times days may elapse without any.

5861. It is a jurisdiction peculiar to the City, is not it?—It is.

5862. Nothing of the kind appears elsewhere?—Not that I am aware of.

5863. A justice of the peace possesses no such power under the general law?—I believe not.

5864. What sort of complaints are they to which the jurisdiction applies?—If a master does not fulfil the duties which he is bound by the indenture between himself and the friends of the apprentice to fulfil, the apprentice has the power of calling the master before the chamberlain, and inquiring into the case. If it is his opinion that the master has neglected his duty or that the apprentice has neglected his, the chamberlain inquires into the case, and adjudicates between them. It sometimes happens that there is no chance of their ever acting together, and he discharges the parties from the bond into which they have entered.

5865. He has the power of cancelling the bond, has he?—With the consent of the parties.

5866. Which class of complaints is most numerous, the complaints of the master against the apprentice, or the apprentice against the master?—I think, according to my experience, complaints by the master against the apprentice.

5867. Considerably more numerous?—Yes.

5868. The ordinary nature of the jurisdiction is this; it is to interfere in cases where the master complains against the apprentice?—Yes; where the complaint is not of a criminal nature.

5869. What is the redress which you ordinarily give to a master; in what manner do you interfere?—A great number of the cases are decided by giving judicious advice to the apprentices.

5870. You read the apprentice a lecture?—Yes. In other cases where they are very obstreporous, and those complaints have been repeated, they may be committed to the Bridewell. In nineteen cases out of twenty they never get to the Bridewell; but when they do generally the next day a very penitential letter comes to the master to intercede for them.

5871. Are there many cases of committals to the Bridewell?—Not a great many.

5872. How many in the course of a month, should you think?—As to committals to the Bridewell there are very few, because I invariably avoid going to that extreme if I can possibly persuade the apprentice to return to his duty, and endeavour to give satisfaction to his master. I generally find by letting a case stand over for a fortnight, telling the apprentice that the result will depend upon his conduct whether he goes to prison or not, I hear no more of it.

Sir John Key, Bart.

19th Jan. 1854.

5873. Do you commit apprentices of both sexes to the Bridewell?—I have never had one female apprentice before me.

5874. There are a great many female apprentices in London, are there not?—I am not prepared to answer that question; I believe not in the City.

5875. Your experience, of course, at present has been rather limited, but from wha you have observed of the nature of that jurisdiction, do you think it is attended with beneficial effects?—I think it is very much so.

5876. You think it is a jurisdiction which it is desirable to maintain?—Yes. I think it acts very advantageously; it leads the master to act in a greater spirit of kindness towards his apprentice, and if the master does not teach the apprentice the branches of his trade, if he is disposed to make a use of him as a servant or in any way not intended when the boy was bound apprentice, it is very beneficial in calling the master to a sense of his duty.

5877. You say generally the interference is on behalf of the master against the apprentice?—It has been so in the majority of cases, according to my experience.

5878. Then it operates rather for the protection of the master than the apprentice?—In London apprentices are apt to get into very bad associations, and sometimes a little lecture from the chamberlain, and the dread of the Bridewell, may arrest them in an evil course.

5879. Have you read Captain Williams' evidence in regard to the cases of prisoners committed to Bridewell?—I have not. I should add that with regard to apprentices committed by the chamberlain they are kept separate from criminals who are committed to Bridewell.

5880. Captain Williams states that the comptroller sometimes exercises the power of committing apprentices to Bridewell?—That would be in case of the absence of the chamberlain from ill health.

5881. The comptroller acts as the deputy of the chamberlain?—He does in that case, and for the purpose of the admission of freemen; in no other case does he do so.

5882. Captain Williams is asked, "Are there many instances of apprentices committed "by the City authorities to this prison?" His answer is, "They average about ten a "year." Do you think that is a correct statement?—I should think so. In the great majority of cases the very threat of sending them to the Bridewell, or rather the advice given them by the chamberlain, has the desired result without proceeding to such extremities.

5883. He says, "Confinement in the prisons acts most mischievously on boys. I have "repeatedly spoken of it, and the authorities are themselves aware of it." He says, "I "have always urged the abandonment of this Bridewell as a penal establishment." Do you concur in that opinion?—The experience I have had during the short time I have filled the office has been rather the other way. I do not, however, put my judgment in competition with that of Captain Williams. I suppose the half dozen whom I have sent to Bridewell have not been there a day or two days before a very penitential letter has come to the master, the master has applied to me, and I have let them loose again, and their conduct has been much better after.

5884. For how many days can you commit an apprentice?—I never commit for above ten days.

5885. If you interfere on behalf of the apprentice, what punishment can you inflict upon the master. Suppose an apprentice came before you and complained that his master had ill treated him, what redress can you give to him supposing he establishes his case?—If it were a case in which his master had ill treated him, so far as that it amounted to an assault, I should send him over to the other side of Guildhall, and he would be left to the ordinary law.

5886. There might be a case of maltreatment coming within your jurisdiction, probably, which would not amount to an offence according to the general law; how would you deal with a case of that sort?—I apprehend if there was a continuance of ill usage on the part of the master, or if he neglected to teach the apprentice his business, there would be power to cancel the indenture. I have not had such a case.

5887. Has there been a single case since your appointment in which you have interfered on behalf of an apprentice?—There has.

5888. What have you done?—I have told the master the duties he should perform, and he has promised to rectify the cause of complaint, and I have told the apprentice that if the ground of complaint were not removed he was to come again and I should take further measures.

5889. Have you the power of cancelling the indenture without consent?—I am not quite sure how that would be in case of a master neglecting his duties.

5890. Are there any other duties connected with the office of chamberlain?—All the freemen of London are admitted through the chamberlain.

5891. Have you anything to do with issuing notices to persons who do not take out their freedom?—I have never given any directions of that kind; some time ago sundry notices were sent out for the purpose of enlarging the constituency rather than with any other object.

Sir John K Bart.

19th Jan. 1854.

5892. You have no personal knowledge upon that subject?—None; no notices have been sent out since I have been in the office. Another duty is to receive from the town clerk, upon the order of the Court of Aldermen, the names of the several persons presented by the Wardmote Inquests as carrying on business within the City, and not being free, to cause such persons to be summoned before him and to direct prosecutions in case of non-compliance with the customs of London, to attend the Lord Mayor and all common halls and common councils, and on all state occasions, and deliver over the City regalia to the Lord Mayor upon his being sworn.

5893. Do you attend all common councils?—Yes, and Courts of Aldermen. If any member of either court has any question to ask as to the financial affairs of the City, I must be prepared to answer him. I do not attend the whole time, but my duty is to be present at every court. The chamberlain has to receive all rents, profits of markets, tolls, and other revenues of the corporation, with which he is annually charged by the comptroller, to make all payments on account of the corporation, and to ascertain that such payments are by warrant or order of competent authority and conformable to the various resolutions and orders of the Court of Aldermen or Common Council, and to keep accounts thereof, and to arrange the same for the purpose of affording any necessary information thereon. I should state that we have 4,000 tenants, paying 103,095*l.* annually; that includes the receipts from the prebend of Finsbury. Besides that, there are moneys in the nature of coal duties and others which we have to receive, amounting to about 700,000*l.* more.

5894. Mr. Scott explained how the expenses of the chamberlain's office were managed; he said that the profits on all the balances were brought to account, and that a sum was assigned to the chamberlain not greater than 2,500*l.* a-year, but that some years it had not amounted to that sum?—That is the case; the sum is 2,500*l.* a-year; I am not aware whether it has always amounted to that. Formerly the chamberlain was paid in a different manner, as you are aware, but he is now, by the deed he enters into, paid in the manner which has been stated.

5895. At present the entire emoluments of the office can never exceed that sum?—They can never exceed 2,500*l.* a-year. I beg to call the attention of the Commissioners to the answer to Question 353. The witness says, "An overture was made to Mr. Scott "during the contest that his situation should be improved pecuniarily if he would "resign, and a threat conveyed that if he persisted in the poll after a certain time, he "would lose the appointment, for that the new chamberlain would appoint some one "else." I distinctly swear that no such overture was ever made—nothing of the kind passed.

5896. No such overture was made with your knowledge?—Certainly not. The only thing I can attribute such a misstatement to arises from the fact that, on the last day of the contest, on Saturday, Mr. Scott communicated through a mutual friend the wish to know whether, provided he resigned, I would enter into an arrangement not to discharge any of the clerks. My reply was, that I never had had any intention of making any alteration. Of course I could not make any such engagement, because I did not know how they might perform their duties; but I never contemplated any such proceedings. That was the only communication which was ever made. I added, if he did resign, it must be before 6 o'clock, because I must send round a notice of it by post. However, his committee did not advise such a course, and that put me, of course, to a very considerable expense more, because I had to send round to all parts of the country to bring up my voters.

5897. Have you the power of dismissing any clerk in the office?—Certainly.

5898. Without any authority from the Court of Aldermen or the Common Council?—Yes. The chief clerk and the cashier, when they are admitted, must be approved of by the Court of Aldermen, and also by the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee of the Common Council; their power is confined to giving their approval.

5899. Are the appointments of the clerks in the office made by the chamberlain himself?—All of them.

5900. You state distinctly that no overture of the nature described in the answer to this question was, so far as your knowledge and belief extend, made to Mr. Scott during the contest?—Nothing of the kind; so far as my own knowledge goes, I swear it was not, and as to my belief, I am quite convinced that no member of my committee would have made such a proposal without my knowledge.

5901. Do you know whether Mr. Scott was under any impression that such an overture was made to him?—I never heard anything of the kind from him; the only communication from him was, that he should have been glad to have saved all further expense on the Saturday, when this inquiry to which I have referred was made; but his committee would not suffer him. I wish, also, to call the attention of the Commissioners to Question 361. The inference from the answer to that question is, that the duties of the chamberlain are performed by the clerk. Had Mr. Scott been elected, he would have made a very good chamberlain I am quite convinced, but he would have himself elected the same chief clerk that I have now. He would not have performed the duties both of chamberlain and of chief clerk, which seems to be the bearing of the evidence of some of the witnesses; they seem to suppose that the two offices would have been amalgamated; each of the clerks, I should state, gives security, though to a smaller amount than the chamberlain. I will also call the attention of the Commissioners to the answer to Question 312. After insinuations of corruption have been made throughout, there is a statement there by which I am put forward as the author of it; the statement there made is diametrically contrary to the fact. It is said that the first corruption with regard to elections began at the period there mentioned, and that the sum of 15,000*l.* was expended at that election. It is said that there were then 400 men, called 'Longshore men, who were controlled by Alderman Lucas, and that Alderman Lucas, by his influence over those men, effectively secured the return of his friend Alderman Key. That is quite contrary to the fact. It may be in the recollection of some members of the Commission that that was a time of great popular excitement; I suppose there never was a greater degree of popular feeling exhibited than on that occasion; it was about the period of the passing of the Reform Bill. I had taken a somewhat active course in forwarding that view, and towards the close of the first year of my office, I was waited upon by a deputation, to know whether I would serve a second time, the view being, that as I had previously done to a very large amount, and with great effect, I should lend any influence which I might possess to assist in forwarding that measure, with respect to which I had taken so active a part. The majority of the Court of Aldermen were at that time on the opposite side in politics. The Commission is aware that the Lord Mayor is returned by the livery, but the livery must return two names to the Court of Aldermen, from which the court choose one. The persons who wished to carry out the objects of the Reform Bill being aware that the majority of the Court of Aldermen was against that measure, an arrangement was necessarily made with some alderman who had served once before, and who, therefore, had the power of refusing to serve again, that if he were returned with me to the Court and were chosen, he would agree not to serve. The alderman who was accordingly named with me, after having been returned by the livery and chosen by the aldermen, refused to serve, as previously arranged; that occurred three times, there being an eight days' poll on each occasion. I am quite convinced that the whole election did not cost 1,500*l.* instead of the expense being 15,000*l.*; and as to the assertion that Alderman Lucas returned his friend Alderman Key from his influence with the 'Longshore men, the most violent and hostile opponent I had at that time was Alderman Lucas; therefore, when a gentleman swears that Alderman Lucas returned me by his influence, he swears that which is contrary to the fact, the fact being, he did all he could, and used all his exertion against me on political matters.

Sir John Key, Bart.

5902. The statement here is that the expenses of the two candidates amounted to from 12,000*l.* to 15,000*l.* Do you happen to remember, without reference to what were the expenses of the other candidate, what your expenses were?—They were very small. My impression is that the two together would not have amounted to 1,500*l.* or 2,000*l.* to the outside.

5903. Do you think your own were 1,000*l.*?—My impression is that they were not. I do not think that they came nearly to 1,000*l.* There were no expenses of treating or anything of that kind.

5904. The poll, you say, was kept open for twenty-four days?—Yes. There having been three elections, the aldermen, from political motives, the majority being opposed to the Reform Bill, each time having chosen the alderman whom the livery did not wish to be chosen.

5905. Is there any other statement which you wish to refer to?—I desire to refer to Question 340, and also to Questions 1455 and 1464, both referring to the same circumstance, though the evidence is given by different witnesses. It is said, in answer to Question 340, that the aldermen at the late contest subscribed 100*l.* each, which is untrue; although, if it had been their wish so to do, no one would have any right to complain, as they would have as much right as any parties to return a member from their own fund. But the imputation in the subsequent questions is that the money was subscribed out of the public funds. With respect to the 100*l.* being agreed to be subscribed by the aldermen, I say distinctly that no such agreement was ever made or contemplated.

5906. Was any such subscription ever made?—No, nor ever contemplated.

5907. Was any subscription made either by the aldermen or by any officers of the corporation, towards the expenses of your election?—None whatever. I paid the whole out of my own funds. With respect to the answers to the subsequent questions, it is clearly implied that such subscription was made, and that it was made out of the funds of the City. I met Mr. Wallis after the election, and he congratulated me upon some good news which he had heard; he said there was a large subscription being made, that the aldermen had subscribed about 2,000*l.*, and Baron Rothschild 1,000*l.* I said it was very good news, but unfortunately it was not true; that I had not heard of any such event having occurred—he must have been perfectly aware therefore that no such subscription was made. In the answer to 2,815, it was implied that twelve of the City officers have the same income as twelve cabinet ministers, namely, 45,480*l.* Taking the twelve highest paid City officers they only amount to 19,600*l.* That is not quite a correct statement, therefore; besides, the persons making that statement in reference to the cabinet ministers merely refer to the salary alone, without any reference to the expense of the office or their enormous patronage, while, in the comparison, they include the whole expenses of the office to which such officer belongs. Another witness swears that in reference to the Borough of Leeds, under the head of justice, the whole expense is 729*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, while the fact is that it is 5191*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* according to the statement which he himself gives. So as to the borough expenses of Leeds—the witness states them to be only 2439*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* while they are in fact 6348*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* I merely mention those circumstances amongst many others, as showing how recklessly people are swearing to what they call evidence against the corporation. Another witness has sworn that the corporation are adverse to all improvements. If the Commissioners will bear with me a moment, I will show them a map of the improvements which have been made, not only in the City, but at the west end of the town, by the corporation. (The witness produced and explained the same.) Those improvements which are marked out of the City, are made out of the 8*d.* coal duty. There is already a debt of about a million upon that duty, the whole of which has been laid out upon improvements without the City, in addition to the Commissioners of parks and palaces now having the whole proceeds of the coal duty 9*d.*, for improvements entirely out of the City. This fund is also pledged to pay off the million debt contracted on that tax, for improvements made out of the City, and to which improvements out of the City, the City also contributes 11,000*l.* per annum out of the City funds. I mention this because a great outcry is raised against the City on account of the 8*d.* and 1*s.* coal duty, while Her Majesty's Commissioners of parks and palaces receive the whole of the sum of 11,000*l.* from the City funds in addition.

5908. Are there any other duties attached to the office of chamberlain which you have not mentioned?—He has to prepare and lay before the Court of Common Council, after Lady-day in every year, a statement of the produce and expenditure of the City's estate for the preceding year. To engross on vellum the rental of the City's estates, markets, tolls and other income of the corporation, prepared annually by the comptroller, and to prepare an account of the arrears of such rents, tolls, and other sources of income, and to deliver an abstract of the same to the Court of Common Council. To prepare and furnish such accounts as may be required from time to time by the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council, or any of the committee of the corporation; to see that the rents, tolls, and other sources of income are regularly paid into the chamber, and to report to the committee of City Lands such as may not have been paid in due course. To prepare accounts that may be required by order of the Queen in Council, or either House of Parliament, as well as the several accounts directed by Act of Parliament to be presented annually. The accounts directed to be presented annually are in No. 14. To receive and pay monies under the authority of Acts of Parliament for effecting public works and improvements, and to keep accounts of the same agreeably to the directions of those Acts. To receive and pay all monies in relation to the orphans' fund, and accounts of loans, &c., connected therewith. To report quarterly to the Court of Aldermen the surpluses applicable to the payment of debts charged on the said fund. To arrange and make out for audit by the Commissioners for auditing public accounts, a statement in detail of every sum received and paid on such account, and to attend the said Commissioners on their examination of the same, and to deliver annually to both Houses of Parliament and the Court of Aldermen abstracts of the accounts of the said fund. To receive and pay all monies on behalf of the Commissioners appointed under the Acts of Parliament for paving, cleansing, and lighting the City of London; to keep detailed accounts of the same, and deliver abstracts thereof to Parliament; and to keep accounts of all other funds under his care, and to furnish abstracts or copies of the same for audit, or other purposes when required. Those are the principal duties, but the most responsible and those which occupy the most time are those in reference to such a large amount of money as passes through his hands—either money belonging to the City, or for which they are responsible as trustees. There is only one other point to which I will take the liberty of adverting. A great many people have given their opinion as to the manner in which the aldermen perform their duties in their capacity of magistrates. I was an alderman for thirty years before I resigned my situation to become chamberlain, therefore I can speak with some experience as to the manner in which they perform their duties, and not only from that thirty years' experience, but during that time having occasionally attended police offices and acted as a county magistrate. I give it as my firm opinion that it would be impossible to find any set of men chosen as they are, who are more intelligent, and who attend more anxiously and closely to their duties than the magistrates of London do; they give their most anxious attention to their duties as magistrates; and, in reference to a legal education being necessary, I think that men who have lived to a certain period of life respected by their neighbours, and who have had sufficient talent to make their way in the world are quite as capable as any other men can be of performing the duties of magistrates, a proof of which has been given before the learned judges and others, as to the number of convictions and committals. Nine tenths of the cases which come before the magistrates are cases which do not require any legal knowledge; they are mere matters which common sense would enable them to decide, or if they do require legal knowledge, they always have a clerk of considerable legal attainments who advises them upon those points. I apprehend that legal magistrates who are professional men also have their clerks to assist them. My experience convinces me that the aldermen of London perform their duties more to the satisfaction of the citizens than any paid magistracy would do besides. It does not always follow that because a man has had a legal education and is a paid magistrate, he will be fit for the office; there may be other influences at work which are much more objectionable as leaving the choice of the magistrates to the persons whose magistrates they are. I have also, during that period, attended committees of the corporation, and I can testify to the anxiety always shown to conduct the duties of those committees honourably and independently, to the advantage of the corporation and of the public at large. They devote a vast deal of time and give their most anxious attention to the various subjects coming before them, of which the vast improvements made in the City afford ample proof; and as to the sewers, I have seen most of the cities on the continent, and I hesitate not to affirm that no sewers in the world are at all comparable to those of the City. There has been no jobbing which I have seen during my experience either in the Court of Aldermen, or in the Court of Common Council. I have seen nothing but an anxious wish to perform the duties committed to their charge. Then again the aldermen have a considerable advantage in being members of the Central Criminal Court, for though they have never interfered with the judges as to any legal point, or any question which arises during the trial, they may sometimes advise as to the sentence to be pronounced. They have one great advantage in acting as magistrates there—that they have an opportunity, of hearing from time to time the way in which the learned judges lay down the law on criminal subjects. They must be blockheads indeed, if with that advantage they do not fit themselves to perform the duties of magistrates, as well at least as any other magistrates, even those who boast of legal education.

Sir John Key, Bart.

Joseph Daw, Esq.

JOSEPH DAW, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows.—

5909. What office do you hold under the commissioners of sewers?—I am principal clerk.

5910. How is the commission of sewers in the City constituted?—It is appointed by the Common Council, under the provisions of the Act of Parliament which was passed for the purpose.

5911. That is a local Act, confining its provisions to the City of London?—It is.

5912. What is the power which enables the corporation to issue the commission?—The power is given to them by Act of Parliament, and dates back originally as far as Charles II., if not to a period anterior to that. From that time they have continued to appoint the commission of sewers.

5913. Is that commission appointed by the Common Council, under their seal?—Yes.

5914. How many persons does the commission consist of?—The Lord Mayor, the recorder, and the common serjeant, ex-officio, and all the aldermen and deputies, and one commoner from each ward, except the ward of Farringdon Without, from which there are two commoners on each side of the ward.

5915. All the commissioners are members of the corporation?—They are.

5916. It is, strictly speaking, a corporation commission?—Unquestionably.

5918. Is it desirable that they should have that sort of independent power?—It has been always so considered. Deriving their revenues entirely from rates upon the inhabitants of London, in that sense, they may be deemed rather to act for the inhabitants than for the corporation.

5919. Have they any other source of revenue, except the sewers' rate?—The consolidated rate is the chief rate. I should explain, perhaps, to the Commissioners, that in our commission we are not only a commission of sewers, but also a commission for paving, lighting, and for sanatory works, and as commissioners of paving, for executing improvements.

5920. Are all those powers given under that commission?—Yes.

5921. Does the Act of Parliament refer to all those powers?—It does. I should say that we effect improvements (which we have done within the last 30 years to the amount of nearly 100,000*l.*,) under the Metropolitan Paving Act, commonly called Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. By that, we are empowered to effect improvements wherever it is thought expedient to do so; and we have done it. To explain the usefulness of those improvements, I should say that the same power is vested in every paving trust in the metropolis; but I am not aware that it has been exercised to any extent except by the commissioners of the City of London, who have, from the outset, done so.

5922. You have the power of making two rates, the sewers' rate and the consolidated rate?—Yes.

5923. Are those rates upon the same assessments?—Yes.

5924. What limit is there to those rates?—The limit is, that we may not make the consolidated rate to exceed 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in the year, or the sewers' rate to exceed 4*d.* in the pound in the year.

5925. Is the assessment up to the full value of the rental?—No. I should conceive not.

5926. Who makes the assessment?—The assessment is made by the aldermen and the common councilmen of each ward. The Act of Parliament provides that it shall be made from the poor rate assessment, unless the poor rate assessment be deemed, in any case, a wrong one, in which case power is given to the commissioners to amend it, as they may think fit, upon the advice of surveyors to be appointed.

5927. Practically, probably the assessment is made by taking the poor rate assessment subject to an appeal?—Probably this is the case.

5928. What is the amount of the expenditure for those two purposes? Do you go to the full extent of your powers in making the rates?—No. We have not done so for some years.

5929. How much does a penny rate produce?—About 4,500*l.* We estimated the rental at about 1,100,000*l.* We have not raised the consolidated rate to the full amount for several years past.

5930. What is the general amount which you levy in poundage?—About 54,000*l.* the consolidated rate would produce, at 1*s.* in the pound. We had, some years ago, a 1*s.* 1*d.* rate. That was followed by a 1*s.* rate. The two last years, it has been a 1*s.* 3*d.* rate. The sewers' rate has been 4*d.* in the pound for several years till the last year, when we made it 2*d.*, and in 1846 and 1847, it was only 2*d.* in the pound. We are now reducing the sewers' rate, and the probability is that it will be less even than 2*d.* in future.

5931. Taking one rate at 4*d.*, and the other at 1*s.*, the taxation under your commission would be about 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound?—Yes.

5932. Do you happen to know what is about the amount of the poundage for the police rate, in the City of London?—I do not know. I have seen it stated as 7*d.* in the pound.

5933. Do you know whether they collect 7*d.* in the pound?—I cannot say.

5934. Those are the only three rates levied by the corporation, are they not; the police rate, the consolidated rate, and the sewers' rate?—The only three.

5935. Are your two rates collected by distinct collectors, or by the same collector?—Generally speaking, the same collector collects all three.

5936. Does he collect them at the same time?—That I cannot say; it is very likely he may. As far as we are concerned, he collects for us, independently of the police rate.

5937. Would not it save expense and time to consolidate the three collections?—I apprehend it would save time; but I do not see any particular advantage that would result from it, because the poundage would be the same.

5938. The poundage might be reduced?—I think it is as low at the present as it could be fairly reduced to.

5939. At present, are the three rates all upon the same assessment?—I apprehend they are. We should wish them to agree in all cases.

5940. What are the duties of your commission so far as relates to the consolidated rate?—Our duties as relates to that are, to pave the streets, to light them, and to cleanse them; to effect such local improvements as may be, from time to time, deemed expedient; to execute such works of a sanitary character as the nature of our new Acts of Parliament require, and we shall shortly have duties, as a cemetery board, which are devolved upon us by the recent Act of Parliament, constituting the commission a burial board for the City of London.

5941. Does that give you the power of making additional rates?—It gives us the power of raising money upon our consolidated rate by loan, or otherwise, as we may think fit. We propose to raise the required sum by loan upon the credit of our rate.

5942. Is there any parochial power within the limits of the City, for any of the purposes which you have described?—No.

5943. The whole of the lighting, paving, and the other sanitary works which you have described, are done by the commission?—Entirely so.

5944. What is done under the sewers' rate?—Our duties consist of the construction of new sewers where they are required, which are now very few in number, inasmuch as we have completed almost the entire sewerage of the City of London. There are duties as regards reparation, cleansing, and supervision of the sewers, as well as the construction of private drains.

5945. Does any inconvenience arise from the separation of the City commission from the other commissions of sewers north of the Thames?—I do not conceive that any inconvenience has arisen at any time, and it can hardly arise now, because there is the best possible feeling between the two commissions. The powers of our Act of Parliament and theirs are made to dovetail in such a manner, that no difficulty can arise. If there did, the matter is referrible,under our Act of Parliament, to the lords of the Committee of Privy Council for trade, at once to decide upon the question which may be in issue between the two commissions.

5946. Does the district of the other commission of sewers completely surround yours; does it extent eastward of yours as well as westward?—Yes; it surrounds us on every side north of the Thames.

5947. What do you consider to be the advantages of a separate commission of sewers for the City?—We have effected all the works which are necessary for the City of London at the cost of the inhabitants of the City of London; and, therefore, it would be very unfair that they should now be subjected to taxation for the cost of the drainage of surrounding districts; that is one reason why they should not be united. Then, again, the ancient and prescriptive right of self-taxation for these purposes has been with the City of London for so many centuries, that it would be unjust, unless there were a strong reason for it, to deprive them of it. The machinery, as far as regards the sewerage, has worked extremely well for many years past. I am not aware that, during the twenty-two years that I have been in the service of the commissioners, there has ever arisen any difference of opinion, or any question, between the two bodies. In respect to the lighting I may say that we have, through the intervention of the commissioners, effected of late a very considerable reduction in the charge which has been made for gas to the public lamps, as well as influenced the price paid by private consumers. There has been a reduction of twenty-five per cent. within the last five years thus effected in the public lights.

Joseph Daw, Esq.

5948. What improvements have your commissioners executed under the Acts of Parliament which you refer to?—From time to time, wherever it has been thought necessary to widen any street, and an opportunity has presented itself, they have availed themselves of the power to do so. To quote an illustration, Chancery Lane may be mentioned. The southern end of Chancery Lane we have been for some time widening; and we are just upon the eve of bringing that work to a close. I have no hesitation in saying that, had the north end of Chancery Lane been within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which so much was said about widening it some time since, it would unquestionably have been done. The same power is given to the trustees for paving of the parish in which it is situated to effect it as we enjoy.

5949. Does your Act give to the commissioners the power of what are called Wide Street Commissioners?—The power of widening wherever we think necessary.

William Haywood, Esq.

WILLIAM HAYWOOD, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

5950. You are the engineer to the City commission of sewers?—I am.

5951. What are the duties which you perform in connexion with the commission?—My duties may be said to be co-extensive with the functions of the commission itself; inasmuch, as I have the direction of the whole of their works, and am generally their adviser as to the propriety of the execution of those works, which are various and extensive. The commissioners have actually the control, directly or indirectly, over nearly every one of the physical conditions of the City which are likely to affect the health and comfort of its inhabitants. They take charge of the whole of the sewers, and also the whole of the pavings; of the scavengering, lighting, removal of dust from the houses, and the charge generally of the whole of the public ways, which implies the power of control of projections of every description, both above and beneath the pavement; of controlling, to a certain extent, the times when the gas, and water, and other companies shall open the pavements; and the hoards and scaffolds which are put up. Every shop front, every grating, indeed every species of construction which is put out from the front of a house, is not allowed to be projected without the consent of the commission. Upon all such points, I am their principal adviser. The area of the City is one square mile. There are within the City 1,000 public places, and 16,000 houses. What I mean by public places are distinct and separate public ways, having distinct names. There are fifty-one miles of public way. I prepare plans and specifications, and estimates of all the sewers. I take charge of their execution, and make up the accounts of the work. I also prepare schedules, plans, and specifications for the various contracts for pavings and artificers' works generally, and lighting and cleansing. I estimate the cost of constructing private drains beneath public ways; make plans of all the houses for the drainage of which application is made to the commission. I direct how the drainage of those premises shall be laid out and executed, and I keep in my office documents, showing the private drains for the future inspection of the owners of property. I have, as a matter of course, to make various surveys, drawings, estimates, and reports, which are required by the commission from time to time in relation to their numerous works. I take charge of the construction of public urinals, the numbering of houses, the naming of the streets, and the hoards and scaffolds. I have also some control over ruinous buildings, when they are likely to affect the public safety.

5952. Is there any building Act in the City?—There is.

5953. Is it peculiar to the City?—I believe I am the only officer in the metropolis who has any control over ruinous buildings, except the district surveyor. Mine is a more prompt power with respect to buildings likely to become ruinous, than the district surveyors appear to have.

5954. The district surveyors are under the Metropolitan Building Act?—Yes.

5955. Does that Act apply to the City?—Yes.

5956. Is their jurisdiction concurrent with yours?—No; but they do not clash at all. I have a more prompt power than they have. I am generally called on to give the commission advice on all sanitary matters which come under their control, involving the execution of works, as to the regulation of slaughter-houses, lodging-houses, and dwelling-houses; questions in relation to the water supply, smoke consumption, houses unfit for habitation, nuisances, and generally on all miscellaneous business which must necessarily attach to a commission controlling the interior of 16,000 houses, so many miles of public way, and having such a wide range of functions.

William Haywood, Esq.

9th Jan. 1854.

5956 a. Do you consider the sanitary police of the City is in general in a satisfactory state?—The sanitary police of the City is in a very satisfactory condition. I am not prepared to say that as necessities develop themselves, during sanitary progress, it may not be capable of improvement; but it is the only section of the metropolis that I am aware of at the present time which can be said to have any special sanitary staff, conducted upon any complete system.

5957. There is a medical officer attached to the commission of sewers, is not there?—Yes; and inspectors of nuisances, who make a large amount of domiciliary visitations. Whenever the medical officer finds, from the detailed returns of the registrar general, that deaths have occurred in premises of a nature which leads him to infer that the condition of those houses is unsatisfactory, domiciliary visits take place by the inspectors. They report what sanitary works are required to be done, and orders, upon recommendation of the officer of health, are issued by the commission for the execution of those works. Those orders have amounted to between 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* annually.

5958. The medical officer of the commission makes an annual report, does not he?—He does; and he also makes the before-mentioned weekly reports of what he advises to be done in the interior of premises which are reported by the inspector of nuisances to be in an unsatisfactory condition.

5959. The Lodging-House Act does not extent to the City, does it?—The City had an Act which empowered them to enforce the regulations for lodging-houses, before there was any similar power in the metropolis. Therefore, they have the same power in the City as outside the City now exists for the rest of the metropolis.

5960. Are those powers exercised?—Undoubtedly.

5961. In an efficient manner?—A very efficient manner.

5962. Have you anything to do with that inspection?—No; it rests with the medical officer and the inspectors of nuisances; but if anything is to be done in the interior of those premises which require works to be performed compulsorily by the commission, it falls within my department, more or less. There are six inspectors of nuisances under the commission; they are at the same time inspectors of pavements; they take charge of the scavenging and dusting, have the general superintendence of the public ways, and, indeed, the whole of their respective districts.

5963. Do you know whether the inspection of lodging houses in the City is efficiently exercised, and the number of persons sleeping in them regulated, so as to prevent unhealthy and improper crowding?—Every house which has been registered by the commissioners as a lodging house has cards affixed in each room, stating the number of persons permitted to dwell in that room, and stating what sex is to sleep in the room—the numbers having been determined by the medical officer.

5964. Are those regulations enforced?—Yes.

5965. If any one of those regulations is contravened, what happens?—The proprietor is summoned before the commission.

5966. Is there a power of punishing him?—The clerk can better answer that question and others in relation to the lodging houses, than I can.

(Mr. Daw.) The course is to summon the party, if he disobey the orders of the commission, or do not act up to them, before a magistrate. We have this day a man summoned before the magistrates at the Guildhall for that particular offence.

5967. There is a power of punishing him, is there?—Yes; by a fine for disobeying the orders of the commissioners. I need not say that it is very difficult in many cases to enforce it.

5968. Do you believe that the inspection is efficiently carried on by your commission?—I think it is very fairly and efficiently carried on; it might be more efficiently done if it were done with the more continuous assistance of the police. I mean by night. It is evidently by night in those places that the nuisance of overcrowding occurs.

5969. Have not the police given you assistance?—They have periodically given us assistance.

5970. Do you know how the Lodging-House Act is carried into effect in the rest of the metropolis?—I believe by the police.

5971. Do you know how it works?—I do not, except as I have read from time to time of cases in the public newspapers.

5972. Do you know whether your commission have ever taken any means of ascertaining whether the lodging-houses are as efficiently inspected in the City as they are in the metropolis under the new Act?—The police have examined several of them, and made their reports from time to time. Our own officers sometimes examine them, but our immediate officers examine them by day only. The police we wish to examine them at night, it being at night that they most require it.

5973. If there is no night inspection, the inspection must be very inefficient?—There are not in the City many common lodging-houses, in the ordinary sense of the term. I mean lodging-houses receiving persons indiscriminately at fourpence or fivepence per night, and so on.

William Haywood, Esq.

19th Jan. 1854.

5974. In the neighbourhood of Smithfield are there not such houses?—There used to be some, but I rather think they have been got rid of, with the exception of three or four at most, if there are so many. I should say that our operations in that respect have been the cause of closing a great many of them.

5975. (To Mr. Haywood.) Have you observed any inconvenience or any advantage to arise from there being a separate commission of sewers for the City?—I have heard it vaguely stated that inconvenience arises, but I never heard a reason given for that statement.

5976. Have you ever observed in your own experience any practical evil to result?—No, not the slightest. I have examined very closely into the allegation, and I am quite unable to find an instance, either recently or in years gone by, in which there was the slightest inconvenience resulting from the existence of separate jurisdictions, even at a time when the necessity for co-operation was not felt so much as in the present day. At this period if there were any differences upon points jointly affecting the two commissions, or the metropolis generally, there are ample means of setting it right, in the manner which has been described to you by the principal clerk; but there never did exist any, and I can scarcely conceive that any are ever likely to exist.

5977. With regard to one branch of the duties of the commission, no inconvenience probably was likely to arise, namely, all that branch which is included under the consolidated rate?—There is just as much inconvenience likely to arise as with respect to the sewers—I mean that as far as regards the paving, there is just as much ground for alleging possible inconvenience as with regard to the sewers. The only shadow of a reason I have ever heard assigned for the desirability of annexing the City to the general commission for the metropolis, has been that it was just possible that the corporation might object to the external commissions draining through their area. Such a thing is not at all likely to have existed, and at the present day I need scarcely say it would be perfectly absurd to suppose any commission having an outfall sewer could object to any external commission draining through that sewer. At the present time there are, I believe, more outlets provided at the City boundaries than are likely to be immediately wanted by the metropolitan commission, and if at any time a junction with the City sewers is required, the application to connect those sewers is generally complied with, within a week or two, by the City commission, and the work executed within a month. I have had cases within the last four years in which trifling portions of the area of the metropolitan commissions have required drainage into the City sewers; the whole of the requisite outlets have been provided within an exceedingly brief time after the demand for them has been made. The extensive area under the metropolitan commission of sewers obliged them to separate the area into districts, under the charge of different officers who co-operate, when necessary, in precisely the same manner that the officers of the City commission of sewers co-operate with those of the metropolitan commission of sewers whenever it is essential for the public benefit. I beg, however, to observe that I consider there is great practical benefit in the contract of the pavings being joined to that of the sewers,—particularly in a district so peculiar in its traffic, &c. as the City of London.

5978. You have observed that to be the case, have you?—I have no doubt of it whatever.

5979. And the lighting?—Whoever takes charge of the paving, as a matter of course, must take charge also of the cleansing and the lighting of those pavements, and the projections over them. Those duties seem intimately combined.

5980. The water supply is wholly independent of the commission?—Yes; and the gas supply also. But the commission can compel the owners of property to have a proper water supply on their premises. Under the powers of their Act of Parliament they can call upon the owner of a house to make provision of all which is essential to the health and decency of the inhabitants.

5981. Are those powers exercised?—I might use a large word to express how very much has been done in that way. There is scarcely a house in the City which has not been looked to. The owners of half the houses within the City, I should say, have been compelled to do something to those premises, and though there is at the present time a great deal to do,—and undoubtedly will be a great deal to do so long as the poor are dirty in their habits, and misuse so much what is provided for their comfort—there has been a vast deal done. The mere enumeration of the notices which have been served under different heads to meet various necessities would prove that; but I believe at the present moment there is not a house in the City of London which has not a daily water supply of some kind, contained in a receptacle more or less efficient. I may say that the commissioners in that branch of their labours have been somewhat fettered of late years by the uncertain condition of the mode of the metropolitan water supply;—the result being that the receptacles for the storage of water are not quite of so satisfactory a kind as it is possible they might be, but still every dwelling has a water supply in it or closely adjoining it, and with regard to the poorer dwellings, mainly through the exertions made by the commission and its officers, since the year 1849; prior to that year they having no power whatever over the interior of dwellings, their power stopping at the front walls of the premises.

William Haywood, Esq.

5982. In that year an amending Act was passed?—In that year the corporation applied for a new Act giving them extensive controlling powers, and they obtained it. The City was the first section of the metropolis which possessed the power of compelling the abatement of the issue of opaque smoke from furnaces; and since that time I believe nearly the whole of the furnaces have been so altered that the smoke is consumed. Even at the present time it is the only section of the metropolis which possesses power over slaughter houses, and of regulating the manner in which slaughtering is conducted—and power of seizing and confiscating diseased cattle or food unfit for human consumption.

5983. Is there anything else which you desire to state to the Commissioners?—I have only to say that, with regard to all projections upon and the charge generally of the public ways, with regard to the sewers, and the other branches of the services of the corporation, I am not aware of any portion of the metropolis where more care is taken for the accommodation and convenience of the public, and of the huge traffic which rolls through the City streets. The restrictions which existed upon persons breaking open pavements, and with respect to boards and scaffolds, &c., have all been either made more stringent or made wholly new within the last four or five years; entirely new rules and regulations with regard to all those matters brought under the control of the commission by their Acts of Parliament have been made, and the result has been most beneficial to the citizens and the public generally. I find in the printed evidence that it has been stated here by a witness (No. 59), that he cannot imagine that "The sewerage of the metropolis can be "sufficient and effectual under different administrations," &c. This is one of that class of vague allegations to which I have alluded, and must say that upon such a point it requires an engineer who has well considered the subject to give an opinion, and I should very much have liked to have seen a reason for that statement being made. At another place, instead of the blank statement itself (Question 234), a gentleman states that the "manage-"ment of the sewers is very unsatisfactorily done;" assuming that to apply to the works, I must confess that, as I am responsible to the commission for a very great deal of what is done, I feel that I am personally concerned in that statement. Now I beg to state my belief that, upon the whole, the sewerage of the City of London has been well carried out. I will state broadly, that more has been done within the City of London with regard to sewers than in any other section of the metropolis in the same time. For years, when the other portions of the metropolis were almost supine as regards the construction of sewers, the City commission imposed a heavy rate, and pushed on its sewerage, and early nearly completed them. They have constructed a map of sewers, which perhaps will never be exceeded in actual length within an equally small area. They have recently been enabled to reduce their rate to 2*d.* in the pound, and will shortly, I have no doubt, reduce it to 1*d.*; and it has not been that the City of London has had less sewers to provide within its area, and less difficulties to contend with than other portions of the metropolis have had, for it would be difficult to find any portion of the metropolis which has so much to do, and such numerous and varied difficulties to contend with.

5984. You consider the drainage of London to be nearly approaching perfection?—As nearly as may be expected, considering that the commission has sewers in its jurisdiction which were constructed long before sewers were used for their present purposes. Thirty or forty years ago, that which it is a statutable offence now not to do when called upon, it was a statutable offence to do at all; the drainage of fæcal matters, or house drainage, within the modern acceptation of the term, was at the time alluded to a statutable offence. The sewers which were then constructed were constructed for surface drainage only, and they do not answer their purpose so well or as efficiently as the sewers which have been constructed in more recent years; but I may say that upon the whole the sewers in the City of London are in a fair state of efficiency. In a few years the old sewers will be remodelled and adapted to the exigencies of the present day, and then I believe the sewers of the City of London will be in the highest possible state of efficiency.

5985. (To Mr. Daw.) Is the sewers' rate levied upon the same class of persons as the consolidated rate?—In all usual cases the occupier is assessed, but the rate is recoverable from the landlord on small property where the rental is less than 25*l.* a year.

5986. You levy upon the occupier?—Yes.

5988. In cases above 25*l.* a year, does the tenant recover from the owner?—He can, I think, if there is not any clause in his lease or agreement to forbid it; he then deducts it from his rent.

5989. Therefore, in all cases, it is intended that the immediate incidence of the sewers' rate shall be upon the owner?—Yes; that was felt as a reason why we did not, when we went to Parliament the last time, get the two rates consolidated into one.

5989 a. (Mr. Haywood.) As an evidence of the co-operation which exists for the public benefit between the City commission and the metropolitan commission, I may say that I have been, from time to time, associated with their engineer as regards works which mutually affect the jurisdictions or the metropolis generally. I was associated with Mr. Frank Forster, in 1851, in the preparation of his general scheme for the interception of the sewage flowing into the Thames. At the present time I am preparing, with the engineer to the metropolitan commission, the details of a scheme for that purpose.

William Haywood, Esq.

5990. In your experience there has always been a disposition between the two commissions to co-operate for purposes within the sphere of their duties?—Invariably; but the necessity for that co-operation occurs very rarely indeed.

Adjourned to to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Friday, 20th January 1854.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

James B. Bunning, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

JAMES B. BUNNING, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

5991. What situation do you hold in connection with the corporation?—I am their architect and surveyor.

5992. How long have you held that situation?—Since 1843. I was elected about Michaelmas 1843.

5993. Is the whole of the business done by the City of that description under you, or do you employ different agents for different purposes?—I am solely employed.

5994. In what way are you remunerated?—When I was elected in the year 1843, my salary was 1,600*l.* a-year, which included my office expenses; in 1847 it was raised to 2,500*l.* a-year, including my office expenses.

5995. What was the ground of that increase?—It was in consequence of the enormous increase of business brought to the office, and the increasing business.

5996. Had the office expenses been greatly increased in the mean time?—They had increased greatly.

5997. At what do you estimate the office expenses?—They are now about 1,000*l.* a-year, but my salary in the year 1852 was fixed at 2,500*l.* a-year, and an allowance of 1,000*l.* a-year for office expenses.

5998. Does that allowance cover all the expenses?—Yes.

5999. Do you receive any other payment besides your salary?—The salary is made up in this way: I receive from the City's cash, 1,300*l.* a-year; for attending to the Bridge House estates, 600*l.* a-year; the Finsbury estate, 500*l.* a-year; from the Coal-fund, 50*l.* a-year; and there is an estimate amount of 50*l.* for preparing plans and putting them upon leases of any property which may be let, one on the lease and another on the counterpart. In consequence, however, of the leases of the Conduit Mead estate being renewed last year, (a renewal which recurs every fourteen years) there was an accumulation of 413*l.*, which increased my salary, with five guineas for subpœnas, which I received in 1852 for attending upon trials, to the total amount of 2,888*l.* 18*s.* When the Conduit Mead leases are completed, I should judge the receipts from that source will fall back to something like 50*l.* a-year; they were not quite that amount when I was elected, there being but few leases granted at that time.

6000. Was this arrangement made by any one on the part of the City, or did each of those separate trusts make a separate arrangement with you for the business which you do for them?—The salary was arranged by a committee, I believe, called the officers' and clerks' committee. When any appointment falls vacant the duties of the officers are referred to that committee, and it is then considered what salary the future officer shall receive. At the time of my election, they made the salary much less than my predecessor received.

6001. What did he receive?—I can hardly tell you. I think it was something like 2,000*l.* a-year; then he held a district surveyorship, and did private business, not in the City, but out of the City. I am not allowed to practise in any shape or way whatever.

6002. You are not allowed to have any private practice at all?—No, and not only so, but I was deprived of a district surveyorship which I held at the time of my appointment.

6003. Were all those payments arranged by this committee which you have mentioned, or was the payment from the corporation first arranged, and then the separate trusts allowed to make separate arrangements with you?—The whole arrangement was made by this one committee with the sanction of the Court of Common Council.

6004. They took a general view of all your duties connected with the corporation, and they made one general arrangement?—Yes; whether they called upon the comptroller of the Bridge House estate to give them any account of the labour to be performed for that estate I know not.

6005. Your salary and emoluments vary between 2,500*l.* a-year and 3,000*l.* a-year?—I should think the amount would be 2,500*l.* a-year in future.

6006. It cannot greatly exceed 2,500*l.* a-year?—I think not.

6007. You have no other sources of income connected with the City?—None.

6008. What are your duties?—They are very multifarious. I have to attend the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council when required; for the Court of Aldermen I have to attend to the ruinous buildings.

6009. What do you mean by the ruinous buildings?—Any building which may be in danger of falling.

6010. You have to keep the City buildings in a proper state of repair?—Not in repair; only to provide against the falling of those which have been represented to the Court of Aldermen by the official referees to be in a dangerous condition, and likely to injure the passers-by.

6011. Are you speaking of buildings which are the property of the corporation and of other buildings in the City, the state of which may be dangerous to the passers-by?—Not of buildings belonging to the corporation, but of those represented to be dangerous by the official referees. I should not ordinarily interfere with any buildings unless they belonged to the corporation. Then, in the capacity of their surveyor, if they were in a dangerous condition, I should attend to them.

6012. Is it a common thing for a building belonging to the corporation to be allowed to get into such a state of repair that it is actually dangerous to the passers-by?—Certainly not. If any buildings within the City are in a dangerous condition, and the district surveyors find them so, the official referees send notice to the Lord Mayor, which is laid before the Court of Aldermen. I am instructed to shore up any such buildings, and hoard them in, and the solicitor is instructed to give the parties notice to repair and amend that building or buildings according to the directions given to them.

6013. What description of buildings are you speaking of?—Any building in the City which may be in a dangerous condition. The corporation, however, I hope, take better care of their buildings than to allow them to get into such a condition.

6014. How is this duty performed in other parts of the metropolis?—I believe a notice from the district surveyor is sent to the parish authorities; what steps they take I do not know. I have heard from the official referees that, whenever any complaint of the kind is sent to the City authorities, it is always attended to immediately, and I know it is so, because it is my duty to attend to it.

6015. Will you proceed with the enumeration of your duties?—I have also to attend the committee of aldermen with respect to the prisons—Newgate, Giltspur Street prison, the debtors' prison, Whitecross Street, the Borough Compter, and I have recently erected the prison at Holloway.

6016. Have you seen Captain Williams's evidence with regard to the City prison?—I saw it in the Times.

6017. You have not read the evidence in full?—I read to this effect in the paper, that Captain Williams had been kind enough to express himself satisfied with the accommodation given in the gaols.

6018. He expressed also an unfavourable opinion of some of the old prisons?—I have had an opportunity of being frequently with Captain Williams, and I also know well the prison at Newgate—that it is not fit for the present arrangement of prisoners, or the discipline which is wished to be carried out. There can be no question but it is a fine old prison.

6019. Captain Williams says the internal arrangements are such as to render it unfit for use as a prison according to the present system of prison discipline?—There can be no question about it.

6020. Your opinion accords with Captain Williams's as to Newgate?—It cannot, without considerable expense, be made suitable for carrying out the same discipline which is carried out at our new prison, because there are very few separate cells. In the new prison at Holloway there are 436 cells and fourteen work-rooms, which are equal to ninety-six additional cells. There is every accommodation there for carrying out almost whatever kind of discipline may be wished.

6021. Are you acquainted with the state of the City Bridewell?—I have nothing to do with it. I have to attend to all the requirements of those prisons—when I say that, I mean all appertaining to my profession. If anything is wanted in the nature of repair or alteration I have to survey it, and with regard to any work which the governors wish done, before they can do it I represent it to the aldermen, and I am desired to see it carried out. I examine the artificers' bills, and certify that the charges are correct.

6022. Do you give an estimate before the work is done?—Very frequently; in fact, nothing is allowed to be paid till I have certified that the amount is correct.

6023. Is any expense incurred in regard to building or repairing the City property of which you have not given a previous estimate?—Anything beyond 50*l.* is generally put out to public tender. If it is under 50*l.* the tradesmen of the corporation generally do that work, and that work is performed upon fixed prices, which are year by year sent in by the various tradesmen to a committee called the City Lands' committee.

6024. In the case of the erection of a considerable building, such as the Holloway prison must have been, how is it done; is it done by contract?—Yes. I think there were twelve or fourteen of the most respectable builders in the country written to. The lowest tender is accepted.

6025. Do you give the plans?—Yes.

6026. In every case?—In every case. I have a plan of the prison here (producing the same).

6027. In the event of the City undertaking a great building would there be any competition between different architects, or would it go to you as a matter of course?—Since I have had the honour of holding the position I do there has been no competition for any building.

6028. Has there been any considerable building undertaken except the prison to which you have adverted?—The Coal Exchange I built, and also Billingsgate Market. For the new cattle market I made a number of plans, when it was proposed to keep the cattle market where it now is, that is, by enlarging it considerably. Of course, all those plans are now abandoned, and I am forming a new market for the corporation at Copenhagen Fields.

James B. Bunning, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

6029. In that case, the City have not resorted to the advice of any other architect?—Not another person.

6030. Has that always been the practice of the City in former times?—It has not. About twelve years before my election I had been by competition the successful candidate as architect of the City school, which I built for the corporation. At that time I was an entire stranger to them.

6031. Was there a City architect at that time?—There was a gentleman who was called the clerk of the works.

6032. Do you know why the City have altered their system, and now, when there are buildings of importance to be executed, do not resort to any competition between architects, but always employ their own City architect?—I am very much gratified that they do so, because I should feel very much hurt if it were otherwise.

6033. What was done in the case of the rebuilding of the Royal Exchange?—There were advertisements for designs.

6034. There was a City architect at that time?—Yes; the gentleman who had then the title of clerk of the works of the City.

6035. Do not you think, as a general rule, without in the least meaning to express the smallest doubt of your eminence as an architect, that when a great public building is to be erected, there is an advantage in throwing it open to competition, to a certain degree, and receiving the suggestions of more than one eminent architect, and adopting the plan which may appear to present the greatest advantages?—It is very difficult for me to give an opinion upon that point. I should only hope that it will never be so while I am the City architect.

6036. Is there any clerk of the works now?—No, the office is merged in mine.

6037. Can you state what the average expenditure, since you have been the architect, has been in the construction and reparation of buildings?—About 36,300*l.* was certified by me upon different buildings in 1852.

6038. Supposing such a misfortune were to happen as that the Royal Exchange were again burnt down, should you consider that you had, in virtue of your office, a right to the exclusive preparation of a plan for rebuilding that exchange, and that it would be a wrong done to you to apply to any other architect for suggestions?—In the case of the Royal Exchange, that is not entirely under the jurisdiction of the corporation, because the corporation are united with the Gresham trust, which I believe, is with the Mercers' company. One part of that body might wish to employ their architect, and the City might wish to employ their own, therefore, under such circumstances, they might be very glad to advertise.

6039. Suppose there was a necessity for building a new Mansion House?—I should try very hard to prevent anybody competing for it, because I should like to erect it myself—not that it would give me 1*s.* more salary.

6040. Will you proceed in the statement of your duties?—I am at this moment, by direction of the Court of Aldermen, who contemplate erecting a lunatic asylum, looking out for a plot of ground. I am in treaty for one conjointly with Mr. Alderman Lawrence and Mr. Alderman Cubitt.

6041. Where is that site?—The site at present spoken of is adjoining our prison at Holloway. A very large amount of area is required for the lunatics, therefore, we are compelled to go to some distance from the City.

6042. In point of air of course it is desirable to be at a distance from very crowded buildings?—Yes.

6043. Do you think the site is, in a sanitary point of view, one which is well calculated for the object?—I think it is; and it offers this advantage that the aldermen when they paid a visit to the gaol would have an opportunity also, without going any greater distance, of inspecting the lunatic asylum.

6044. How was the expense of the Holloway prison defrayed?—Out of the cash of the City.

6045. A loan was effected, was it not?—I think so. The whole of those arrangements were made by Mr. Scott.

6046. You did not inquire into the manner in which the money was raised?—I had so much to do to attend to the expending of it that I did not do so.

6047. By whom is the City architect appointed?—By the Common Council.

6048. I suppose it is considered a permanent office?—One hopes so, though I am elected annually.

6049. The usual course has been to continue the same architect unless there was some reason for his removal?—I have never heard any instance of such an officer being displaced.

6050. There never was a City architect before you, was there?—No, not permanent.

6051. The appointment of a City architect is a new system, is it?—When I was first appointed I was called the clerk of the works.

6052. In point of fact, except in name, you are exactly in the same situation which the clerk of the works to the City formerly occupied?—Precisely; only performing all the architectural business of the corporation—whereas other persons were formerly called in, now no one is called in.

6053. When the officer was called the clerk of the works it was the habit to employ other architects, from time to time, for business strictly architectural; now you are the architect as well as the clerk of the works?—I am.

6054. Will you proceed to state any other duties which you perform?—Emanuel Hospital also comes under my care and the almshouses. And since I have been elected I have built new schools and dormitories to that establishment. Whatever is required I have to attend to, just as I have with respect to the gaols.

6055. Have you anything to do with the laying out of the streets?—Yes.

6056. Have the great City improvements, which have been made of late years, been conducted altogether under your management?—They have. On Lord Mayor's day I have to attend to the fitting-up of the hall, and whatever may be required to prepare the buildings for that banquet. For the management of the City lands there is a committee called the City Lands Committee. They have under their control the public buildings, Guildhall, the Courts of Law, the officer's residences, the Monument, the Sessions-house, the public stairs, consisting of Sommer's Quay, Billingsgate, Old Swan, All Hallows, Cousins-lane, Southwark Bridge, Dowgate Dock, Queenhithe, Stew-lane, Frigg-lane, Paul's Wharf, Puddle Dock, and Whitefriars. Wherever any repairs are necessary, or any pile is pulled away, attached to those stairs, I have to attend to it. I have nothing to do with the river Thames, but with those stairs only which lead to it.

6057. Have you anything to do with the bridges themselves?—I have to do with London Bridge. I have recently laid before the Bridge House Committee a proposition for throwing projecting footpath over each side of the bridge, which is now before the Bridge-house Estate Committee. It will be considered by them. They have ordered a survey to be made with respect to the security of the bridge, which will be reported on; and I have no doubt steps taken to carry out that improvement.

6058. When the present London Bridge was constructed who was the architect employed?—Sir John Rennie.

6059. He is not an architect, is he?—No; Sir John Rennie is an engineer.

6060. Do you conceive if a new bridge was required, as a matter of course, you would be employed in the construction of that bridge?—No.

6061. You think an engineer would be employed?—Yes; having to give my time so entirely to the duties of an architect and surveyor, I should really not like to undertake the construction of a bridge across the Thames; in fact my duties are so multifarious that I could not do it.

6062. It is your business to report upon the state of the City bridges, is not it?—It is.

6063. Is any engineer consulted on that subject?—Sir John Rennie will be consulted and so will Mr. Page, with respect to the present state of London Bridge; it only awaits an appointment of Sir John for us to go into the subject of the bridge, and ascertain in what state it is at the present moment, before a report is made to the Bridge House Committee.

6064. Are there any apprehensions entertained of the state in which it is?—None whatever. The committee were only desirous to ascertain if the system, which I had suggested, of throwing these projecting ways over the bridge would be approved by Sir John Rennie, because I had mentioned to them that I should not like to interfere with a magnificent work like London Bridge without consulting him.

6065. The alterations which you propose, I understand, merely to relate to the way over the bridge, and not to the stability of the bridge itself?—No; they relate to the appearance. It is proposed to throw out a projection of something like twelve feet on each side. Of course it would not improve the appearance of the bridge as an architectural structure, but whether the accommodation to the public is to override that or not, is a point for the committee to determine.

6066. In reporting upon the bridges do you confine your attention exclusively to the constructive part of the bridges, or do you look at all to the consequences which may follow from the erection of the bridge to the water way?—My duty, I consider, with respect to London Bridge is merely to attend to any repairs which may be necessary. If any accident should occur, or any stone be misplaced, or the paving should require renewing, I should consider it my duty to attend to it; but if it should happen that the arches should be defective, and require the careful inspection of an engineer, I should decidedly and immediately ask the committee to let some eminent engineer be associated with me, or to enter upon it himself.

6067. Your attention has not been at all called to the difference which has been produced by the greater width of waterway under the present bridge, as compared with Old London Bridge?—I should not like to speak to that subject. Mr. Leach is here, who will give you every information on that point.

6068. In making any temporary construction of an ornamental nature, do you act upon your own judgment, or do you take instructions from any of the committees or City authorities?—I always submit any idea that I may have for the purpose of decoration to the entertainment committee, and I ask their permission to have it placed in any position I think fit. If it has received their sanction, they generally know before it is placed there the sum of money that it is to cost.

6069. What may be called questions of taste then would be decided by them?—The decision is made by them whether they will have it or not. It is my duty to survey the City estates, which consist of about 6,084 houses and buildings,—the dilapidations are surveyed, the rentals are assessed, and reports made to the committee.

6070. Do you assess the rentals?—Yes.

6071. Therefore you are the surveyor and valuer as well as the architect?—Yes.

6072. Those duties occupy more of your time than the architectural part of your business, do not they?—They take up a very large portion of my time. I assure you I have no sinecure.

6073. Was the salary that was paid to the clerk of the works, when he was so called, the same as that which you now receive?—I think his salary was about 2,000*l.* a year.

6074. Do you consider the 500*l.* a-year to be added in consideration of your being architect as well as clerk of the works?—No; I cannot say that I think that is the reason. I am quite sure if the corporation were to employ a professional gentleman and pay him as professional gentlemen are ordinarily paid, his salary would be very large indeed.

6075. Are you speaking now of your services as architect, or your services as clerk of the works?—Of the whole of my services.

6076. You said that that your predecessor had 2,000*l.* a-year as clerk of the works;—you,besides being clerk of the works, give your services as architect to the City, and you have an increase over his salary of 500*l.* a-year?—Yes.

6077. Supposing he was properly remunerated as clerk of the works, is not it probable that the 500*l.* was given to you in consideration of your acting as architect as well as clerk of the works?—I think the corporation raised my salary seeing the enormous amount of the duty I had to perform. I am reminded that when my predecessor held the appointment which I now do, Sir Robert Smirke was called in for the improvements; since I have held the appointment, no person has been called in in any way whatever. The Bridge House estates also fall under my care. I have to attend the committees, and to survey the properties, which consist of about 6,000 houses and buildings. Of course the whole of them have not come under my supervision at present, but a very great many of them have.

6078. Before your appointment as architect to the City had you in your private capacity conducted as an architect the construction of any considerable buildings?—I had built schools. I built the City schools, a workhouse, and warehouses. Previous to my building the City schools, I did not know an individual connected with the corporation.

6079. Had you been engaged in constructing any buildings unconnected with the City?—I had built a workhouse, gentlemen's houses and warehouses.

6080. You had built considerable houses for private individuals?—Yes. I have to attend theCoal, Corn, and Finance Committee, under which committee I built the Coal Exchange. The boundary marks have also been affixed twenty miles round London under my superintendence, on each road, canal, and railway. The General Purposes Committee I attend; they have under their care the Mansion House. I report upon the repairs and the general state of the building and the furniture.

6081. Is the Mansion House in a good condition?—In a very fair condition. For the Markets' Committee I attend to the Leadenhall butchers' and poultry markets.

6082. In what state is Leadenhall market?—It is a very confined site.

6083. Would not it be desirable that the present site of Leadenhall market should be changed?—It would be very desirable to enlarge it.

6084. Is it in a convenient situation?—I should think so long as the present system exists of allowing slaughtering at the Whitechapel. I imagine that the slaughtering at Whitechapel serves that market principally.

6085. There is a large hide market there?—Yes; that is a separate market from the butchers' market and the poultry market.

6086. A very large traffic in hides is carried on there,—is not there?—A very large.

6087. Could not more use be made of Farringdon market than is now made of it?—It is very difficult to know what to do with that market.

6088. It is an extremely good and spacious market, is not it?—It is very spacious, but very dark.

6089. At present it is not above a third or fourth part used, is it?—Perhaps half of it in point of area is used, certainly not one-fourth of the arcades is used.

6090. You may say that to a very great extent at present it is not used?—It is not.

6091. It is one of the best situations in the City, is not it?—I should consider it in a very good situation.

6092. You have a large market there which is only used to a very slight extent, and you have other markets which are greatly crowded, such as Leadenhall market and Newgate market; could not the City make some better arrangement with their markets?—It is very difficult to induce a trade to move, or drive a market from one side to another.

6093. Has any effort been made for the purpose?—I am at this moment designing a dead meat market to be placed on the side of Smithfield.

6094. That would be in place of Newgate market?—Yes.

6095. Newgate market is altogether insufficient for the trade?—Quite so.

6096. The trade in dead meat in the City is increasing, is not it?—Certainly.

6097. In consequence of railways and steam boats, the facilities of transport of dead meat from the country have been greatly increased?—Yes; and the number of houses used by butchers for the sale of tollable articles far exceeds the area of the market itself.

6098. Would not it be possible to use Farringdon market for the purposes of Newgate market?—The whole subject is now before the Markets' Committee.

6099. Do not they move rather slowly in such cases?—I do not fancy so; it is very difficult to get money to do all these things.

6100. Farringdon market is actually built, and ready for use for any other purpose?—Till Newgate market is annihilated, it will be very difficult to get the dealers to move from there.

6101. What is the state of Blackfriars Bridge?—I should rather refer you to Mr. Walker for information on that subject, he having the care of that bridge. I have the care of it only to the same extent as I have the care of London Bridge; that is, I look after the stone work and the pavement. I have lately erected Billingsgate market.

6102. Is that in a satisfactory state?—I hope so. Any repairs or alterations with regard to any of those markets, I and my staff have to attend to, so as to see that the wants of every tenant are carried out. I have a very efficient staff of gentlemen. No alteration can be made, and no line of hooks can be put up, without obtaining first of all the permission of the Markets' Committee; and before a bill can be paid, it must be examined by my people, and certified by myself. I also do what is necessary in the City of London School. Under the Officers and Clerks Committee there is a Small Debts Court, which I altered. I altered some extensive premises for the purpose of carrying on the Small Debts Court. With respect to the Improvements Committee, I have to attend their meetings, to value the freeholds and leaseholds required for the improvements. We have at the present moment in hand the continuation of Cannon Street, from the statue to St. Paul's Churchyard. We have an improvement going on in Threadneedle Street, in Mark Lane, in Dowgate Hill, and the formation of a street from Farringdon Street to Clerkenwell. On that site, also, it is proposed to erect lodging-houses for the poor. A site has been purchased, and the buildings I dare say would have been commenced before this time, but for having received notices with respect to a railway which it was proposed to bring there. Even now, there is a proposition to take a line of railway across Smithfield, terminating at the Post Office. The Improvements Committee have under their care all the improvements. They have now before them the proposed street from Cannon Street to Blackfriars Bridge; and a plan for the raising of Holborn Hill. I have been called on recently to make another estimate for that purpose; and, instead of the amount of 316,000*l.*, in consequence of the great rise in materials, the works which we should have to perform to raise the road, would amount to something like 333,000*l.*

6103. Would you have no property for that 333,000*l.*, which would produce rent?—No; it would be all loss. In making an improvement through valuable property, it will be seen at once there must be a very large amount of loss; because every shilling we pay for goodwills is gone. There is something also for compulsory sale; the rents are forced up to their utmost. For example, in the case of Cannon Street, the claims sent in for that line, amounted to 1,177,153*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*

6104. Do you mean for the line which has been already made, or the line which is projected?—For the line which has been already made. Those claims were settled at 796,566*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, being about one-third less than the claims: but that is a very large sum.

6105. Was that money all loss, or did you get any property which would yield rent?—We shall obtain about 300,000*l.* back.

6106. You lost about 400,000*l.* out of 700,000*l.*?—We lose something less than 500,000*l.*; we make up the rest by the sale of the frontages.

6107. I suppose the frontage value is increased by the construction of the new street?—Wonderfully. The system adopted by the committee, I think, is very admirable. The ground is staked out by myself, and plotted upon the plan. As we have cleared from street to street, we have advertised it; parties have come forward who wished to establish themselves there in their business, and that accounts for their giving so large a figure for this property; the frontages are valued by myself. They are sealed and given to the chairman; and when all the tenders are opened, mine is also opened. The committee then will not let the property go for less than I have valued it; but in nearly every instance the parties themselves have bid more.

6108. Will not the effect of this alteration be ultimately considerably to increase the value of the property belonging to the City?—I think it will. Those frontages are sold and made a deduction from the outlay.

6109. The area of the City estate is not increased by the population?—It is not so at all.

James B. Bunning, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

6110. Has your attention been attracted to the sufficiency of the great thoroughfares of the City for the increased traffic of the present time?—Yes; the committee scarcely ever meet that the subject is not discussed; the difficulty is to know where to begin in the first place, and next to know where the money is to be obtained to carry out any improvement.

6111. The City is locally situated between the eastern and western extremities of the metropolis, both of which are generally increasing in size, as well as between the northern and southern extremities?—Yes.

6112. The thoroughfares remaining for the most part unchanged, their width not being increased, except by very slight improvements, of course the traffic must increase as the population of the metropolis increases?—No question of it.

6113. Therefore, in consequence of no change taken place in the City, the great City thoroughfares year by year become more unequal to their traffic?—No doubt of it.

6114. Have you made any observations which would enable you to estimate the amount of obstruction which now occurs in the great thoroughfares of the City; have you ever placed persons to count the number of carriages or vehicles which are stopped on certain days?—I have not done so; it has been done, I believe, but not by me. I experience the inconvenience daily.

6115. Take, for example, Cheapside; I suppose there must be few days in the year in which at some portion of the day an obstruction does not occur at Cheapside?—I think Cheapside will be very much relieved when Cannon-street is opened, it will be opened very shortly; the committee were extremely anxious that it should have been opened before Messrs. Berens and Blumberg make a claim for something like 100,000*l.* for their property. We had nineteen meetings before it was settled. On the 1st or 2nd of February, I think, we shall commence pulling down that property, and I think we shall get through shortly.

6116. Are not there frequent obstructions between St. Paul's and Temple Bar?—Yes.

6117. In summer when London is fullest, there must be constant obstructions in the whole line of communication?—Yes; and I think the removal of Temple Bar will obviate that in some measure.

6118. Temple Bar does not obstruct the roadway to any great extent, does it?—I think it does. There would be room enough for one more carriage if that were removed.

6119. Ludgate Hill is a very narrow passage, is it not?—Yes.

6120. Do you conceive that the funds at the disposition of the City are sufficient to enable them without extraneous aid to put the great thoroughfares of the City, particularly those running east and west, in a satisfactory state?—I should think their funds are inadequate to it.

6121. Has it ever occurred to you to consider whether any means could be devised for raising some rate or tax upon the whole of the metropolis, for the purpose of widening streets which are metropolitan thoroughfares?—No; I have not considered the mode of raising the money.

6122. Do you think it would be desirable that some fund should be created in which the whole of the metropolis should have a common interest, and which should be applicable to public works, and particularly to widening streets in which all the inhabitants of the metropolis have an interest?—I imagine the preference would be given by the public to a continuation of the coal tax, rather than that any direct taxation should be put upon them for improvements.

6123. Is it your belief that the present coal tax is a tax which it is desirable to perpetuate for that purpose?—I should imagine so.

6124. Have you had any means of observing whether it is a tax which the public willingly pay, as being appropriated to general metropolitan improvements?—It has been so much brought before them recently, that I think objections have been raised where they otherwise never would have been thought of. It is a tax paid by persons who hardly know that they pay a tax, it is so exceedingly indirect.

6125. So far as you have had any means of observing that portion of the coal tax which is not expended by the City, that is to say the produce of the 8*d.* and the 1*d.* duty, do you believe that those improvements have been fairly distributed over the metropolis and properly executed?—Yes. I should imagine that more has been done in the City than over the metropolis generally.

6126. That has been partly derived from the produce of the 4*d.* duty. I am now speaking of the produce of the 8*d.* and the 1*d.* tax?—I cannot answer that question. I have not entered into the detail of how the money was expended.

6127. Has your attention been at all directed to those metropolitan improvements which lie out of the limits of the City, executed out of the produce of the coal tax?—I have had nothing to do with them.

6128. You have formed no opinion with respect to the manner in which the rest of the coal duty has been expended?—No. I have before me a map (producing the same,) showing the line which was proposed in conjunction with the improvements going on westward in 1846, and at this moment it is being revived. I may add that I have recently erected for the corporation the orphan school at Stockwell, for the reception of 150 orphans of freemen.

James B. Bunning, Esq.

6129. What will be the expense of the new cattle market?—At the present moment I should say about 300,000*l.*

6130. Including the cost of the ground?—Yes. If a larger amount of lairage is put upon the ground, or if a hide market is placed there, of course the expenses will be increased.

6131. Is that expenditure made under contract?—Everything.

6132. How do you set about getting a contract?—A contract was entered into for the draining. Some six or eight respectable builders were written to, the lowest tender being taken. The contract for the sheep penning, the bullock lairs, and the ironwork was by public tender.

6133. Is that the usual way of transacting business in your office?—It is the invariable practice.

6134. Do you consider yourself bound always to accept the lowest tender?—When parties are written to, because it is considered you would not write to a man unless you considered him equal to carrying out the work. When it is by public tender, the committee have the option of accepting it or not.

Mr. F. Woodthorpe.

Mr. Frederick Woodthorpe having been sworn, was examined as follows:

6135. What office do you hold connected with the corporation?—I am one of the minuting clerks in the town clerk's office.

6136. How long have you held that situation?—Since 1838.

6137. What are the duties which you have to perform?—I attend to minute the proceedings of the several committees, and keep that record under the direction of the town clerk.

6138. Do you mean that you act as secretary or clerk to those committees?—Yes.

6139. To how many committees do you act in that capacity?—To the Thames Navigation and Port of London Committee, to the Consolidated Committee, to the Police Committee, to the General Purposes Committee, to the Markets Improvement Committee, and to other casual committees when required.

6140. Are you able to act in that capacity to all the committees which are appointed by the common council?—No.

6141. How are those duties performed when you do not attend?—By the other minuting clerks, of whom there are three besides myself.

6142. Your duties are somewhat analogous to those of a committee clerk of the House of Commons?—Rather more than those of a committee clerk of the House of Commons, because we have to minute every proceeding, and as far as possible, though not to take the words, yet to give the meaning of evidence given before the committee, so as to assist in forming the resolutions. We also have to draw the reports under the direction of the town clerk, which is not the case in the House of Commons.

6143. In that way you become acquainted, no doubt, with the business transacted by the different committees which you attend?—I do.

6144. Will you state what is the establishment of the town clerk's office; how many clerks are there attached to it?—There are four minuting or committee clerks, Mr. Firth, myself, Mr Welton, and Mr. Barber; there are also four copying clerks, and there is a clerk employed in sorting the papers and books, and keeping them in order and regularity, Mr. Farmer, and there is one messenger.

6145. Can you state what the entire annual cost of the establishment is?—The allowance for the cost of the establishment is about 1,800*l.* a year, exclusive of the allowance to the party I have just named, Mr. Farmer, which is a recent addition.

6146. The office is in Guildhall?—It is.

6147. Is there any retiring allowance of any kind to the clerks engaged in the City?—There is not any actually provided for.

6148. Is it usual to make some allowance on the retirement of a clerk after a certain number of years service?—After many years service a clerk naturally looks to consideration at the hands of the corporation, and I believe it is usually rendered.

6149. Not upon any definite scale?—Not any.

6150. Each case is considered upon its own ground?—Yes; and there being no general rule that a retiring pension should be granted, many members of the corporation have from time to time considered, whether they should not establish some system of causing their employees to insure their lives.

6151. At present the situation would be very much like that of a clerk in a banking house where there would be no claim, but the firm would naturally feel bound to consider equitably the case of any servant who had been long in their employment?—I believe that would be so.

6152. There is no system of annual deduction from the salary in order to create a fund for superannuation allowances?—There is not.

6153. You stated that you attended the Conservancy Committee?—I attend the Thames Navigation and Port of London Committee, and they practically have a great deal of conservancy business before them.

Mr. F. Woodthorpe.

6154. What are the duties of that committee?—The duties are somewhat divided, though nominally joined. One portion is the Thames Navigation, which is carried on under Acts of Parliament relating to the river westward of London Bridge; the other is the Port of London eastward of London Bridge; but the committee and the corporation generally consider that though there are separate Acts of Parliament for the two branches of the service, they are intimately connected, and that the Port of London is not restricted merely to that portion upon which the tonnage dues can be at present expended.

6155. How often does that committee meet?—Their regular meetings are once a month. I speak of the grand committee. At each meeting of the grand committee they appoint a sub-committee for certain purposes, and they meet upon the average about twice in the course of a month.

6156. Practically it may be said that there are three meetings of the committee in a month?—Yes; but of late years that number has been materially increased. I merely mention what is the regular mode of transacting business. The number of meetings has been materially increased, and in the year 1852 they had upwards of eighty meetings.

6157. Is there much business transacted by that committee?—A vast deal.

6158. Without going into great detail, can you give the Commissioners an idea of what the nature of the business is which they transact?—The business is carried on in a very regular mode. The first proceeding is to appoint their sub-committee. The committee then receive applications from parties who are desirous of having accommodations in the river, making embankments or driving piles, the regulation of private moorings for a temporary purpose, steam-boat piers, and other works of that kind, which are constantly occurring. The proceedings of the sub-committee during the previous month are read and considered by the grand committee, and either sanctioned or otherwise.

6159. Does it often happen that they are set aside?—Very seldom. They also receive communications at every meeting from persons occupying warehouses or engaged in trade on all parts of the river on various subjects. They then receive reports from their officers, the water bailiff, Mr. Leach, the engineer, and Mr. Rowland, the principal harbour master.

6160. Is the business generally of an important kind?—Exceedingly so.

6161. Is it urgent; are there questions which require immediate consideration and decision?—There are sometimes.

6162. Is it your belief that the Navigation Committee do much which tends to keep the Port of London in an efficient and commodious state?—I think they do, as far as their means will admit.

6163. There means are very limited, are not they?—Their means are very limited, excepting for specific purposes, for which certain sums are devoted, such as the tonnage duty.

6164. What are those specific purposes?—The principal funds are the tonnage duty fund, the Thames Navigation Committee fund, and the rental fund.

6165. What are the specific purposes to which they are applicable?—The purposes to which the tonnage duties are applicable are explained in the Acts of Parliament; they are for the improvement of the moorings of the Port of London, and for carrying on the harbour service. They are not applicable in any way to the actual improvement of the river, except in connection with those matters.

6166. Do you think that that fund is sufficient for those purposes?—It is quite sufficient with economical arrangements, such as have been adopted by the corporation.

6167. What are the purposes to which you say the present funds are inadequate?—The Thames Navigation fund is very inadequate.

6168. What is the object of that fund?—The Thames Navigation fund is applicable to the locks and towing paths on the upper parts of the river.

6169. Is there any fund by which the shoals in the river can be removed?—Not any; except when the corporation advance the money out of their own funds for that purpose.

6170. That is one of the purposes for which the present funds are inadequate?—Quite so, unless the tonnage duty fund were rendered applicable to those purposes.

6171. Would that fund be sufficient?—It would certainly not be sufficient for the entire work, but it would materially assist in carrying on improvements in the river.

6172. Are the present shoals serious impediments to the navigation at certain states of the tide?—Upon such practical points, of course, I should desire to defer to the opinion of gentlemen who are occupied in daily work upon the river; but it comes under my cognizance a good deal.

6173. From the information which is before the committee which you attend, do you believe that the shoals which impede the navigation at certain states of the tide are numerous?—They are; I believe they have been very much increased, in consequence of the extent to which the water now ebbs, compared to what it used to do before the removal of old London Bridge. That is the case with the shoals lower down, as well as above bridge; the water decidedly ebbs lower than it used to do.

6174. Has the removal of old London Bridge made a great difference in the ebb and flow of the tide?—A very material difference.

6175. London Bridge operated to a great extent as a dam?—It did.

6176. It prevented the tide from running up, and also from running down, to a considerable extent?—It did.

6177. That change has effected the flow of the river, both up and down, to a great extent?—To a material extent.

6178. And I suppose that has increased the expense of maintaining the river, has not it?—It has, decidedly.

6179. Does the corporation take any charge of what may be called the police of the river traffic, with regard to the over-crowding of steam boats, and matters of that kind?—They do as to the crowding of steam boats; the Court of Aldermen have power to pass byelaws for the regulation of that traffic.

6180. Is that power at all exercised under the control of the Navigation Committee?—Not at all; it is with the Court of Aldermen.

6181. It is considered as a mere matter of police?—It is.

6182. Are any of the members of the Navigation Committee, persons who have any peculiar acquaintance with navigation, or the state of the Port of London?—There are several of them who have.

6183. Do they attend very regularly?—Very regularly indeed.

6184. More so than the rest of the members?—Possibly more so than the other members.

6185. Have they been members of the Navigation Committee for some years?—One gentleman to whom I refer, has been a member for five years, Mr. Phillips.

6186. What particular means has he had of becoming acquainted with questions of navigation?—He has been an extensive lighterman upon the river Thames for nearly forty years.

6187. Have you seen the evidence which Mr. Matthews gave to this commission?—I have.

6188. Has the case of his client ever been before the Navigation Committee?—It has.

6189. Can you give the Commissioners any information upon the subject of his complaint?—I can. I am able to detail the entire proceeding.

6190. Will you have the kindness to inform us what your view of the case is?—The water bailiff, in the performance of his duty as watching encroachments made without permission, reported that some material was being thrown into what is known as Block House Dock, at Gravesend. Mr. Wharton, the freeholder of the adjoining property, also communicated with him upon the subject. The Navigation Committee took the matter into consideration, made inquiry, had a report, with plan, by their officer, and eventually instructed the City solicitor to take proceedings against the parties. When he was so instructed, Mr. Oakes, who claimed to be the freeholder of the adjoining property on the shore, also put forward a claim to the ground of the Block House Dock, and stated that his tenant was executing those works with his permission; but upon being informed that the corporation proposed to take proceedings to prevent the encroachment, he said he would order the work to be stayed, and would put in a formal application to embank the premises. The committee thereupon suspended proceedings until he did put in his application. He put in his application as the owner of that particular spot, as well as the freeholder of the property adjoining; but he asked permission of the corporation to embank the premises in the usual way. The corporation entertained his petition, viewed the premises, and heard the parties, when Mr. Simmons, the tenant of Mr. Wharton, who had previously communicated upon the subject attended, and seriously objected to any work for filling in that dock, claiming that it was an ancient public water-way. They had opportunities on either side of explaining the grounds of their claim to the committee; the committee felt that they were so conflicting, that they should not do their duty by operating on either side; they therefore declined to give Mr. Oakes a grant for the embankment, and they declined to take any part for Mr. Simmons in removing what had already been done, believing that it was far more a question between the parties themselves than for the Navigation Committee, it not really affecting the public navigation of the river.

6191. Subsequently there was a litigation, was not there?—There was. Mr. Matthews applied to the corporation for the assistance of their officers in giving information as to the matter in litigation, and the committee readily acceded to his request, and instructed their officers to give him every assistance.

6192. Then he says, having obtained a verdict, the City declined to remove the obstruction. Will you explain to us why it was that the City did not interfere at that subsequent stage of the proceeding?—I believe, though I state this not from actual resolutions upon the books, the principal reason was this; the matter was not of such great importance to the general navigation as to induce their interference unless a clear case of right could be shown; they felt that interference on either side might prejudice the rights of the other party, and they expressed the opinion, that though they would not make a grant of the embankment to Mr. Oakes, yet the filling in of the dock would be rather an advantage than detrimental. They felt, therefore, that it would be rather inconsistent to commence proceedings against the parties as if for a nuisance, when they had already expressed an opinion, that instead of being a nuisance, it would be rather an improvement.

6193. The rights of the parties seem to have been decided by two decisions, one at law, and the other at equity; the rights of the parties, therefore, were clearly defined?—No doubt.

Mr. F. Woodthorpe.

6194. You say, with respect to the alleged obstruction, the view taken was that it was rather a benefit to the river than a detriment?—That the filling up of the dock would be rather an advantage than injurious. The committee were not generally satisfied that there was any such advantageous use, either to the public or to Mr. Simmons, individually, as to meet their interference.

6195. Would the Navigation Committee have had the power of removing that obstruction, without taking proceedings at law?—I do not think they would; at all events, I think their power to require its removal would have been, to an extent, so doubtful, that they would have proceeded by indictment. For example, if the party, upon notice being given to him to remove it, had not done so, the committee must have instructed the water bailiff to take a staff of men and remove it themselves.

6196. This person seems to have been under the impression, that the Navigation Committee had the power of removing the obstruction without ulterior proceedings?—They could only have done it even then by asking the Lord Mayor for his authority for the water bailiff to act.

6197. The Lord Mayor would act on the advice of the Navigation Committee, probably?—I presume he would; but under the present circumstances, I believe the Navigation Committee would have prepared an indictment, instead of instructing their officer to abate the nuisance as in former times.

6198. (Chairman).—What are the duties of the Consolidated Committee?—The Consolidated Committee was appointed for the purpose of communicating with the Government, and of carrying on suits which had been instituted either by or against the corporation on several matters, and generally to consider the affairs of the Corporation, and to interfere where it should be actually necessary.

6199. It is a kind of governing committee, is not it?—It is more of an advising committee.

6200. It has considerable executive duties with large discretionary powers conferred upon it, has not it?—Yes.

6201. For instance, we have been told that in the case of any expenditure of money for particular purposes, it is at the discretion of the Consolidated Committee, whether that should take place or not?—Not without authority from the Court of Common Council. I do not mean to say that they could not, in their discretion, spend money for specific purposes which might appear to come under their general reference; but in most cases I apprehend they would apply to the court like any other committee.

6203. When the repayment of the money advanced by individual members was authorized, was not that by the Consolidated Committee?—The only instance of that kind, I apprehend, was a payment of the sum of 250*l.* to Mr. Scott, and a payment of 280*l.* to Mr. Remembrancer.

6204. In a case of that kind, would the Consolidated Committe authorize an expenditure of that description, without going to the common council for its authority to do so?—They considered that they had authority.

6205. Do you mean that they had previously obtained authority?—Under the general terms of their reference, they considered that they had authority without specifically reporting to the court upon that particular case.

6206. That their general terms of reference were sufficiently wide to give them a discretionary power of expending money in that way?—They so considered.

6207. The common practice is for the committees of the common council to make orders for payments for purposes within their reference, is it not? For instance, the Navigation Committee would make orders for payments for purposes connected with the navigation of the river, without going for specific authority in each case?—That is the case. Might I be permitted to qualify my previous answer, with respect to the Consolidated Committee drawing money? I believe at the time those warrants were drawn, a report, which has been referred to before this commission, with respect to publishing the proceedings of the Court of Common Council, had been confirmed by the court, which decidedly gave them, beyond their general reference, those additional powers of drawing money.

6208. How is the expenditure of all those committees audited or checked?—Generally speaking, the expenditure comes under the cognizance of the court; but it is audited by the committee itself, whenever necessary.

6209. Is there no audit out of the committee of the accounts of the committee?—The whole of the accounts come before the City auditors.

6210. There is no previous and separate examination of the accounts of each separate committee?—No; except by the committee itself. In the case of trust funds, they are always carefully audited.

6211. To whom are those accounts rendered by the committee in the first instance?—In some cases, as in the case of the Thames Navigation Committee, they are rendered only to the chamber. I believe a return is made to Parliament of the expenditure of the tonnage duties' fund.

6212. What are the duties of the General Purposes Committee?—Principally to look after the Mansion House. But during the last two years they have had a very important matter under their consideration—an inquiry into the charges made, and the privileges maintained by the porters and meters of London.

6213. In the instance you have stated of the expenditure of money with respect to the press, was the discretion of the committee unlimited as to amount?—No express sum was mentioned by the court.

6214. Are you cognizant of the negociations which have gone on between the City and the trade, on the subject of metage?—I am.

6215. We should be glad to hear from some person, an account of the state in which that negociation is at present. Can you make that statement?—It is hardly sufficiently concluded to say that it is actually agreed on, but there has been a meeting of the sub or select committee of the General Purposes Committee with the members of the corn trade at the Mansion House, under the direction of the Lord Mayor as governor of the porters. At that meeting several suggestions were agreed to, which appear to be consonant with the feelings of the trade, and such as the corporation might fairly entertain.

6216. The object of the negociation has probably been to bring about a sort of compromise between the City and the trade?—Very much so.

6217. The footing of the compromise has been that the system of compulsory metage should be retained, and the trade have suggested certain conditions by which the working of it would be alleviated. Is not that the form which the negociation has assumed?—That is very much the form. It is rather the matter of charge that they object to. I can state distinctly that gentlemen of the trade, who gave evidence before the committee, almost unanimously spoke very highly of the system, both of metage and porterage, but they thought the charges too high.

6218. Did they speak highly of the system of porterage?—They did.

6219. Did not they think the system of metage a great deal too complicated as well as too high in amount?—They thought it was too complicated certainly, but the principal objection was the amount.

6220. Then they objected both to the form and to the amount?—It is so divided in its heads, that they certainly did object to that.

6221. Is there any other place in England where there is a compulsory system of metage?—I am not aware.

6222. Is that a point which has been inquired into by your committee?—It has been incidentally mentioned.

6223. You are not aware of there being any other corporation which has a similar right?—I am not.

6224. Looking to the great number of committees which there are connected with the business of the common council, is not that the result of the great complication of the affairs of the corporation, and the variety of trusts which they have to discharge?—Certainly. They have a vast and most multifarious business to transact.

6225. It seems rather the result of the great number of heads under which that business is divided than the actual business to be transacted, does not it?—The actual amount is very great.

6226. Is not the extent of that amount chiefly occasioned by this great sub-division rather than by the nature of the business itself?—It is a sub-division which is considered highly desirable, in order that matters may not clash one with another.

6227. What are the duties of the Police Committee? What amount of superintendance do they exercise over the police?—They have no superintendance over the actual executive force; but they superintend the supply of clothing and the various articles of store, and they have the supervision of the station houses.

6228. Is there any advantage in taking those things out of the hands of the commissioners?—The corporation decidedly considers so.

6229. Those are matters which in the metropolitan police are in the power of the commissioners, are not they?—I believe they are.

6230. In the corporation those are taken out of the hands of the commissioner, and managed by a committee of the common council?—They are.

6231. In your attendance upon the committee have you observed any advantage to arise from that division of labour?—I have not observed the slightest disadvantage.

6232. Have you observed any advantage. It would at first sight appear that the commissioner would be likely to be the best acquainted with what clothing and what stores were required for the police?—The committee consider that the duties of the principal officer of any police establishment should be confined to the executive management of the force. The supply of materials and the arrangement of money matters, in connection with that supply, are considered to be better under the control of the committee of the corporation.

6233. The idea is that it is managed with more economy by a committee than it would be by the superintendent himself?—They so consider, and with more efficiency also, they being subject to a very strong popular control through the Court of Common Council, who are annually elected.

6234. Probably the duties of that committee are not very onerous?—They are not now. They were at the commencement of the operation of the Act. They have also the arrangement of the rating. I do not mean the actual rating of the inhabitants; that is done in each ward; but they supervise all the rate books, and where objection arises, they make alterations if necessary.

6235. They supervise the assessment?—They do. They also supervise the receipt and the expenditure of money, and regulate all the collections.

6236. Is every member of the common council compelled to take his turn upon one committee or another?—It is as nearly as possible divided among the members, so as to render to each as much duty as can conveniently attach to one person. That is done at the commencement of every year.

6237. Is there any competition to be named on particular committees, or upon what principle is the selection made?—We are not positively acquainted with the mode in which the different wards arrange for members being placed upon committees; that is regulated among the members themselves. The returns are sent in to the town clerk; they are arranged in a tabulated form at a previous meeting, and the common council actually appoint.

6238. The common council always accept the recommendation of the wards, do they generally?—In some instances they make alterations, as they did yesterday, when the annual appointment of the committees came before them. In some instances they placed other members upon particular committees than those who had been recommended by the wards.

6239. Is there any other point which you wish to speak to?—I am not aware of any.

Mr. John Sewell.

Mr. JOHN SEWELL having been sworn, was examined as follows:

6240. What situation do you hold connected with the corporation of London?—I am clerk of the chamber.

6241. The chamber is the Chamberlain's Court?—It is.

6244. What is the particular business which is under your control?—I have not been clerk of the chamber the whole time I have been connected with the corporation. I have held three appointments. I was elected in 1809 as assistant to the clerk of the chamber. In 1831 I was elected assistant clerk of the chamber; and in 1842 I became clerk of the chamber.

6245. By whom were you elected?—By the Court of Common Council. My duties are to receive presentments, and to examine the several testimonials of all persons claiming to be made free. To make out copies of freedom, and official entries of all persons admitted to the freedom. To engross the official records (on stamps) of the admission of all persons to the freedom; and to prepare alphabets of the same. To enrol the indentures of apprentices and turnovers, and make alphabets of the same. To certify to the chamberlain, previous to the administering of the declaration on the admission of freemen, the respective necessary testimonials. To attend the chamberlain on his hearing the complaints of masters and apprentices; to take down minutes of the examination of the same; and to make out commitments to and discharges from Bridewell, and indexes of the proceedings. To enter the names of all persons presented to the Court of Aldermen by the wardmote inquests for carrying on business in the City, not being free thereof; the date of the summons, the date of hearing before the chamberlain, the orders made thereon, the time allowed (if any) by the chamberlain for taking up the freedom; and also the date of every action sued, commenced, or prosecuted by order of the chamberlain, and the result of such action or actions, and make indexes of the same. To bind apprentices to such freemen of the City of London as may not be free of any company of the said City. To keep an account of the various fees payable to the corporation, and to the officers entitled, on admission to the freedom. To examine the City's plate and regalia, and report the state of the same to the comptroller of the chamber, previously to the swearing in of the Lord Mayor, in order that the City's plate indenture may be prepared, and with the comptroller to witness the execution thereof; and to attend at the Mansion House on making over the City's plate to the Lord Mayor elect.

6246. What is the salary attached to your office?—Unfortunately, mine are fees; I am the only officer under the roof of Guildhall who is paid by fees. My fees vary very much, on account of the continued discussion in regard to the freedom of London. Since 1842 there have been continual discussions, and at the present moment I am very deficient in my receipts. The terms of my election were the following: this is the report of the committee presented to the common council:—"We are also of opinion, with reference to the "future emoluments of clerk of the chamber, that the fee payable to the person who may "be elected to the said office should in future be 6*s.* 8*d.* on each admission to the freedom "of the City by redemption, and 13*s.* 4*d.* on each admission to the freedom of the City by

" patrimony and servitude, in addition to the several small fees upon emoluments, turn" overs, bindings, certificates, translations, searches, hearings, renewed orders and commit" ments, which said several fees, upon the average of the last five years, will produce an " annual income of about 568*l.*, as under, viz., admissions to the freedom by redemption,
" 435 at 6*s.* 8*d.*, 145*l.*; admission by patrimony and servitude, 519 at 13*s.* 4*d.*, 346*l.*;
" sundry small fees as above enumerated, 77*l.* 9*s.*; total, 568*l.* 9*s.* per annum.
" And we are of opinion, and recommend that the expense of providing the vellum, and " engrossing on stamps the official records of the several admissions to the freedom of this " City, should be included in the before-mentioned allowances; that the clerk of the " chamber should be held responsible for the due performance of all the duties which now
" are or may be hereafter required of him, and provide at his own expense a competent
" person in the said office, so that the business of the same may be properly transacted in " the event of his unavoidable absence."

6247. After making those deductions contemplated in that arrangement, what do you think the anticipated value of the office might have been fairly estimated at?—About 500*l.* a-year.

6248. What is the amount of the annual receipts which you now derive from that office?—I have not, on the average, received above 400*l.* a-year; scarcely that; between 300*l.* and 400*l.*

6249. That has been from the diminution of the number of freedoms?—From the agitation of the question, whether they would continue to summon parties, or whether they would enforce freedom. Various questions of that kind have been agitated.

6250. In the event of freedoms not being enforced, your receipts will be greatly diminished?—Very greatly diminished; they are so at the present moment; in fact, I earn nothing to speak of at present. They have not fallen off so much as I should have thought they would; for the last seven years there have been 679 freemen admitted on the average every year.

6251. Do you know how many were admitted last year?—Eight hundred and eighty-three. That was consequent upon the large number of parties who were suddenly ordered to be summoned; I think as many as 4,000 It was suddenly done. A bill was brought into Parliament two years ago, which was lost, and the corporation then determined to enforce the freedoms. The objection of most of the respectable parties who came forward was, that they said they should be most happy to take up their freedom, but would they then be made liable to serve as common councilmen, aldermen, or sheriffs? I said, " Yes." Then they said, " We should have no objection to give you 50*l.* to exonerate us from the " freedom."

6252. Was the object of the City, in instituting those proceedings, to enlarge its constituency?—It was.

6253. Not to obtain a revenue?—Certainly not.

6254. In the event of the freedoms not being compulsory, are you of opinion that they would be very little taken up in future?—It is merely the liability to serve the office that prevents it. In the case of the Brewers' Company, there are several of the great brewers who are freemen and liverymen of the Brewers' Company, and they will not take up the freedom of the City, though they might save some pounds a-week in the City tolls, because they would make themselves eligible to serve in those offices.

6255. No person can be elected a common councilman or an alderman without his consent, can he?—Yes; but the liability to the shrievalty is the principal thing objected to.

6256. You have no doubt that that state of things exists?—It has been continually manifested. The freedom of the City in many cases is sought after; it is a great pleasure to see apprentices coming after their time has expired to take up their freedom.

6257. Do you know anything of the chamberlain's jurisdiction in cases of apprenticeship?—Yes, I always attend him upon such occasions.

6258. What is the nature of that jurisdiction?—The chamberlain sits as a magistrate in his court; he hears the cases; a summons is first taken out by the master, or, if the apprentice complains, by the apprentice. The case is heard before the chamberlain, and after hearing the evidence, he adjudicates. If a boy requires a reprimand, which is very frequently the case, he very kindly reprimands him, and orders him home to his duty; if the boy comes a second time, he sometimes threatens him with punishment, but the chamberlains are always very loath to commit, unless under very peculiar circumstances.

6259. Sir John Key informed us that the majority of the cases were complaints of masters against apprentices?—Decidedly.

6260. Are the cases of complaints of apprentices against master very rare?—They are not very rare, I should think; the others are probably ten to one.

6261. In the case of a complaint of an apprentice against a master, what protection can the chamberlain give?—Our court is an intermediate court below the Mayor's Court; if we cannot settle any complaint in our court, we refer the warrant to the Mayor's Court, and there the action is brought on the covenant in the indenture.

6262. You give him no actual assistance, but you advise him to bring an action?—We very seldom find a master but obeys the mandate of the chamberlain; I scarcely know a case in which a boy has been obliged to bring an action under such circumstances.

6263. Is it your belief that the jurisdiction is beneficial in its results?—Certainly; having been in the office many years, my time is almost constantly taken up by consultations in the case of boys who come and complain of their masters. I persuade them to get the masters to come to me; they generally come; we talk the case over for half-an-hour; it saves the chamberlain the trouble and the annoyance of doing so. In five cases out of six, I may say, I arrange them.

Mr. John Sewell.

6264. The chamberlain and yourself act as a sort of court of arbitration between masters and apprentices?—Yes; it saves them from the necessity of going to law.

6265. It is a jurisdiction which is peculiar to the City, is it not?—It is. The chamberlain can only adjudicate with respect to apprentices bound to the freedom of the City.

6266. Is there any other part of your duties upon which you wish to make any statement?—No. The judicial department is the principal department; in fact, it takes up the whole of my morning. After four o'clock, I am generally obliged to remain till five or half-past five to complete my other duties.

6267. The committals to Bridewell are very rare?—Very rare indeed. We have a place in Bridewell which is appointed to the reception of those apprentices; they are not allowed to mix with the criminal part of the prisoners. Very frequently we have very distressing cases of fathers bringing their sons who are apprenticed to them, and those boys have been sent to Bridewell at the request of the father. In about three days we have penitent letters, and the matter is all forgotten. The commitments, on the average of the last seven years, have been about twenty in the course of the year.

6268. Are there any females ever committed to Bridewell?—No, never. I have had a few females bound apprentices who have taken up their freedom, but we have never had them before the chamberlain, except in one instance—she was merely reprimanded.

6269. There are a great many female apprentices, are there not?—Not bound to the freedom of London. Ours is a peculiar indenture, by which the master binds himself to find sufficient meat, drink, apparel, lodging, and all other necessaries according to the custom of the City of London. The bindings within the last seven years, have been about 427 a year.

6270. Has the number of bindings diminished?—I do not think the number of bindings very much diminishes. In 1847, there were 401; in 1848, 441; in 1849, 358; in 1850, 394; in 1851, 447; and there were last year about 500. In regard to the binding of apprentices, the custom of London prevents their being bound for any less term than for seven years, and they must also be bound, according to the custom of London, between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one. Now the term of seven years, when an apprentice is fifteen or sixteen, is continually objected to, and I should take the liberty to suggest that it be altered in this way, viz:—If the party applying to be bound is fifteen, let his indentures be drawn for the term of six years; if sixteen for five years; and if seventeen for four years, at their option. This would be a very satisfactory alteration for them, and they would then be out of their time at the age of twenty-one years, whereas an apprentice is often twenty-three or twenty-four before he is out of his time, to entitle him to his freedom of the City of London, by virtue of his service.

S. R. Goodman, Esq.

SAMUEL ROBERT GOODMAN, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

6271. What situation do you hold connected with the corporation?—I am principal clerk to the Lord Mayor.

6272. How long have you held that situation?—Since the year 1843.

6273. Is it an office which is continued from one mayoralty to another?—Yes.

6274. What are the duties of your situation?—My duties are to attend the Lord Mayor or sitting aldermen at all times when they exercise the duties of magistrates, and generally to advise with them upon all criminal and parochial cases. To take minutes of all informations, examinations, charges and complaints heard before the Lord Mayor or magistrate. To superintend the preparation of all depositions and recognizances in cases of felony and misdemeanour. To advise with the Lord Mayor or aldermen respecting official letters and documents, to reply to those which relate to the magisterial duties, and to forward others to the different officers of the corporation to whose departments they more immediately relate. To inspect the several documents brought for the signature of the Lord Mayor, requiring the mayoralty seal, and to see that the acknowledgements of married women are taken in the forms of law. To prepare all precepts for wardmotes for the election of aldermen, and such elections of common councilmen as may arise during the year. To attend to the various applicants for relief, and generally to advise upon all cases whenever required by the Lord Mayor or magistrate, and to perform such other duties as they or either of them may from time to time consider requisite. To superintend the various officers connected with the Mansion House. To check the account of the cashier daily, and also the accounts of fines and fees paid by prisoners sent to the prisons. To keep a book and enter therein all articles given to the police, which are not claimed.

6275. You are a sort of legal adviser to the Lord Mayor?—I am.

6276. What are the duties you perform in the court where the Lord Mayor sits as magistrate?—I examine the witnesses.

6277. Do you advise the Lord Mayor upon the questions of law?—Upon questions of law I advise him, leaving matters of fact and expediency to the magistrate himself.

S. R. Goodman, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

6278. Are you a solicitor?—No. I was articled to Mr. Clarke of the Central Criminal Court.

6279. What is the salary attached to your office?—My salary is 500*l.* a year, and 150*l.* in lieu of certain freedoms.

6280. Are there any other emoluments?—I receive about 50*l.* a year for copies of depositions. The whole of my income from the office is 700*l.* a year.

6281. Is your whole time given to the duties of the office?—It was not on my first appointment, but it is now entirely; my whole time was given to it as far as was required at that time, but I held also a situation in Mr. Clarke's office for several years after I went to the Mansion House. I continued in the indictment office to assist there after I went to the Mansion House.

6282. You have now no official occupation except in connection with the City?—The business has increased so much that my whole time is now devoted to it.

6283. What are the hours at which the Lord Mayor sits in the magisterial court?—He takes the chair at twelve o'clock.

6284. Does he sit as long as there is any business to be disposed of?—He always sits till two; if the business continues till after two o'clock, he sits beyond that hour. It is very seldom that it is over by two o'clock; the court is kept open till the business of every applicant is attended to, but never closed before two.

6285. The court is not often over before two?—It is quite an exception for the business to be finished before two, the day before yesterday we did not close till ten minutes before five; it entirely depends upon the business.

6286. How many days in the week does the Lord Mayor sit?—He sits every day unless other courts require his attention.

6287. The court is always open?—Yes.

6288. And there is another court in Guildhall?—There is.

6289. There are two petty sessional courts constantly open?—Always.

6290. In the absence of the Lord Mayor does another alderman attend?—Yes; that is provided for generally the day before. If there is a Court of Aldermen or a Court of Common Council upon the list, the Lord Mayor provides another alderman to attend for him.

6291. Is there anything which you wish to state to us?—I should rather wish to state something respecting the expenses of our court in explanation of some charges which have been made against us. I have seen statements made that our court is more expensive than the police courts of the metropolis generally. I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to the facts as they really are. The gross amount of expenditure upon the court for the salaries of the four clerks, the officers and the gaoler, the stationery and printing, coals, candles, incidental expenses for witnesses where parties are not committed for trial, and miscellaneous expenses, is 1,738*l.*

6292. What is the establishment of the court; there is yourself, and who else?—There is myself and an assistant clerk, a cashier, and what we call a summoning clerk; those are four clerks in attendance on the court. Then there is the messenger, the gaoler, the side door keeper and the front door keeper.

6293. What is the gaoler?—The keeper of the lock-up attached to the court; we use that for the reception of prisoners during the sitting of the court. Then there are two officers of the name of Forrester, who attend at the Mansion-house, who are not immediately connected with the justice-room; they receive together about 300*l.* The marshals who attend the Lord Mayor are state officers appointed by the Court of Common Council, and not by the Court of Aldermen, and they have nothing to do with the justice room.

6294. Do you know what are the expenses of the other court?—I do not; Mr. Wood is here, and he will be able to state.

6295. By whom were you appointed?—By the Court of Aldermen.

6296. By what tenure do you hold your office?—I presume during good behaviour.

6297. It is not an annual appointment?—It is not; the offices in the appointment by the Court of Aldermen are not so. May I be allowed to call the attention of the Commissioners to the subject of the recovery of tithes in the City?

6298. To what tithes do you refer?—Under the 37th of Henry the Eighth, there was a tithe of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound upon the City parishes generally.

6299. Upon the rental?—Yes, upon the rental; but that tithe only remains now upon about eleven parishes.

6300. Is it upon the rack-rent or some old valuation?—It is generally made upon the average of the poor rate.

6301. Then it is very productive?—Yes; but the mode of recovery, is that which I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to; it is perpetual imprisonment, and that by the order of the Lord Mayor. The Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Henry the Eighth makes the tithe recoverable before the Lord Mayor, as Lord Mayor. No subsequent Act has touched that question.

6302. Does that say that any person not paying his tithe shall be subject to perpetual imprisonment?—It says, he shall be imprisoned till he has agreed with the curate for his tithes.

6303. That is till the money is paid?—There is no limit to it by the Act of Parliament.

S. R. Goodman, Esq.

6304. Is that ever enforced?—The imprisonment has never been enforced since I have been in the office; we have been several times asked to carry it out.

6305. Do you mean that that has always been effectual in producing the money?—The order for payment has been effectual in producing the money or causing a settlement. I mention it for this reason, that in an adjoining parish the tithe may be a very small amount, and the mode of recovery may be by distress, or in the event of there being no distress, then by imprisonment by the recent Act of Parliament, not exceeding three months; so that in one class of tithes the imprisonment cannot exceed three months; in the other class of tithes the imprisonment may be for an indefinite period.

6306. In those thirteen parishes which you mention, are the tithes payable to the incumbent?—Yes. I think now the number of parishes is only eleven. St. Botolph's Bishopsgate has a local Act. At the Fire of London, a great portion of the City being burnt, it became necessary to obtain an Act of Parliament with respect to the parishes which were burnt; the tithes of no other parishes were affected by that.

6307. Those tithes are in the nature of a rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound; in fact precisely similar to a poor rate, or a borough rate, or a police rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound?—That is the operation, but it is not carried out in the same way.

6308. Instead of a rate leviable by distress upon the goods of the occupier, there is a power of imprisonment?—Yes; imprisonment alone, without the power of distress.

6309. If the occupier does not pay, he is brought before the Lord Mayor, and if the Lord Mayor thinks fit he can commit him till the money is paid?—That is so.

6310. The power seems to be excessive?—That was my object in calling it to your attention; many of the poorer class who have been summoned complain very much of it.

6311. The clergyman would, no doubt, be able to collect his tithes if he had the ordinary power of distress, without any power of imprisonment at all?—That would be the proper mode of recovery, I apprehend.

6312. Has any attempt been made to alter it by legislative enactment?—The question was brought before the Government in 1830.

6313. The corporation have no interest in the matter?—No; it was only in reference to the public complaint which is made by parties, that I referred to it.

6314. The Lord Mayor is called on to exercise a jurisdiction, to which a reasonable objection may be made?—Yes; and it is a very unpleasant duty to him. He would rather pay the amount in many instances out of his own pocket, than enforce the remedy.

6315. Does the same law obtain, do you think, in other parts of England?—No.

Thomas Wood, Esq.

THOMAS WOOD, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

6316. What is your connection with the corporation?—I am chief clerk of the justice-room at Guildhall.

6317. You were formerly an alderman of the City of London, were not you?—I was.

6318. What are the duties which you perform in the court to which you are attached?—Very similar duties to those described by Mr. Goodman. I did not receive notice to attend here till late last night, and being so ill as to be scarcely able to attend here to-day, I could not go round to obtain my printed form. There are some duties personal to the Lord Mayor, and incident to his office, which Mr. Goodman has to discharge, which I have not.

6319. Your duties, so far as you are clerk to the magistrates at Guildhall, are similar to those of Mr. Goodman in the other court?—Yes.

6320. What is the establishment of your court?—There is myself, two assistant clerks, a receiver, a summoning officer, a gaoler, and a messenger.

6321. What are the duties of the receiver?—The receiver receives all the fines which are paid into the office.

6322. He is the same officer as Mr. Goodman called a cashier?—Yes.

6323. Are your duties similar to those of Mr. Goodman; do you examine witnesses?—Yes.

6324. You advise the magistrates on questions of law?—It is very seldom that that occurs; there is more said about it than is real. The Acts of Parliament generally are handed up to the magistrates, and if they have any difficulty, they ask the clerk any questions they may desire upon them; it is the duty of the clerk to advise them to that extent. It has been reported that the business is done by the clerk; that is far from being the case.

6325. Were you a professional person before you were appointed?—Yes, I have been upon the roll of attornies and solicitors from the year 1807.

6326. Is there any observation which you wish to make?—No further than as regards the expenses of the office. Our expenses are about 150*l.* less than at the Mansion House. I mention that because I have seen it reported that we exceed the expense of the metropolitan police, whereas I find for the eleven metropolitan offices the charges are 44,000*l* a-year.

6327. What are the hours the court sits?—The court sits from 12 till the business is finished. Sometimes it is not finished till five or six or seven o'clock; sometimes it is not later than two o'clock, but that is rather the exception than the rule; every day's business brings with it its own duties.

Thomas Wood, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

6328. The magistrates sit according to rota, do not they?—They do.

6329. One alderman sitting every day?—Yes, sitting a week at a time.

6330. Has the business of the court a tendency to increase?—It has increased in one way, and decreased in another. It has increased in consequence of the great number of Acts of Parliament enlarging the summary jurisdiction; it has decreased in certain descriptions of crime, but in others it has also increased; upon the whole, I should say the criminal business would be rather upon the decrease, but not much; there has been a slight decrease comparing one year with another for the last few years. The summary jurisdiction which is very wholesome and very much resorted to, which is the best test of its value, is greatly upon the increase.

John Clark, Esq.

JOHN CLARK, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

6331. (Chairman.) What situation do you hold connected with the corporation?—I am clerk of the peace for London and Southwark. I also hold the office of clerk of the Central Criminal Court, and that is by the appointment of the court and not of the corporation of London.

6332. The City of London, being a county, appoints a clerk of the peace?—Yes.

6333. What are your duties?—To prepare and issue precepts for holding the several quarter sessions, and summoning the jurors. To prepare and issue writs to the sheriffs and bailiff to return jurors for the trials of indictments when required. To issue writs of subpœna to compel the attendance of witnesses to give evidence. To attend the sessions and enter and record all the proceedings of the court. To prepare and pass bills of indictments to be preferred to the grand jury, and to enter the pleas, verdicts, and judgments thereon. To make out lists of the trials and business to be done. To make abstracts of all indictments for trial for the use of the court. To make out all orders made by the court. To file all recognizances and convictions returned to the sessions, and also petitions and appeals, and draw up and enter the orders made thereon. To take affidavits, and to administer the oaths of qualifications for officers, and to enter the appearances and defaults of the parties bound by recognizance. To make out a calendar of prisoners convicted, acquitted, and discharged by proclamation, and those touching whom any particular orders are made by the court, a copy of which is delivered to the keeper of the respective prisons in which such prisoners are confined, and to discharge the recognizances of such persons who perform the conditions thereof, and put in process to the sheriffs or bailiff at the end of each session the recognizances of persons who make default, and also all fines, issues, and amerciaments set and imposed by the court, and to deliver a copy thereof yearly to the Court of Exchequer. To make certificates of indictments found, and copies of indictments or records and other matters when required. To return writs of error and certiorari. To file certificates of surveyors under the Building Act. To file notices of persons who keep printing presses, and deliver out certificates that such notices have been filed, and also to file notices of freemasons' lodges. To file and enrol amongst the records of the court the rules of building and loan societies, and to deliver out certificates of such enrolment. To make a return to the secretary of state, after the end of each session, of all prisoners committed or held to bail, shewing the nature of the indictments presented against such of them as are indicted, and the verdicts thereon, together with the judgments of such as are convicted. To make an annual return to the secretary of state of all applications to the justices in petty sessions under the bastardy laws. To make a monthly return to the secretary of state of all convictions of juvenile offenders transmitted to the clerk of the peace. To prepare and issue precepts for and to attend special sessions for licensing victuallers, billiard-table keepers, and dealers in game (this duty is included in the 4th paragraph of this answer, and applies to quarter sessions and not to special sessions) and for hearing appeals against poor-rates and other purposes, and to record the proceedings at such sessions, and make out such orders as are consequent thereupon. To prepare and issue to the ward beadles notice of the holding of the special sessions for poor-rate appeals, and for licensing victuallers and others. To prepare all licences to victuallers, billiard-table-keepers, and dealers in game. To prepare licences to passage brokers under the Passenger Act. To receive and hold the custody of plans and other documents directed by Acts of Parliament or by the Houses of Parliament to be deposited with the clerk of the peace, and to attend persons requiring to inspect the same and to carry out the directions of such Act of Parliament with respect to such documents. To attend the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council or committees of such courts when required, and to make returns of various kinds to them, and also to the Houses of Parliament and other parties having authority to require such returns.

6334. What is your salary?—I have no salary; I am paid entirely by fees.

6335. What is the average amount of your receipts by fees?—The return which I made, commencing with 1848 and ending with 1852, averaged, I think, about 350*l.*; in the year 1852 it was 340*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*

6336. Is that from all the sources connected with your office?—As clerk of the peace

John Clark, Esq.

20th Jan. 1854.

for London and Southwark. Out of that amount about 300*l.*, in round numbers, was received for fees as clerk to the licensing magistrates, and 40*l.* as clerk of the peace.

6337. A complaint has been made to us of the system which has prevailed at the Old Bailey of taking fees for the admission of the public to the gallery, varying according to the amount of interest of the trial; have you any knowledge of that practice?—I believe the practice exists, but it is a practice with which the court, as a court, has nothing to do. The money is received, I believe, by persons appointed by the sheriffs, and a part is paid to the sheriffs.

6338. You know nothing about it?—Nothing at all. It is not in any way with the sanction of the court.

6339. Your duties at the Central Criminal Court are paid for separately, I suppose?—They are.

6340. Does that come from any corporation fund?—Not at all. I said I received nothing as clerk of the peace, but as clerk of the Central Criminal Court I do receive from the corporation of London a sum of 30*l.* per annum to find a clerk to pay orders of costs which are made by the Central Criminal Court. The Act which established that court, the 4th and 5th of William IV. chapter 36, directed that the treasurer, or some known agent of the treasurer, for the respective counties, that is the counties of London, Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, should attend the justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery during the sitting of the court, to pay all such orders. Some considerable inconvenience was found by the treasurers of the respective counties, and an arrangement was made by them to pay to some individual whom I might name a sum of money per year to take that labour upon him. The City of London have paid now for some time past the sum of 30*l.* per annum, which I hand over to the clerk who pays those expenses.

6341. Is there any other statement which you wish to make to the Commissioners?—I am not aware of any, except that I understand the magistrates are said to license free vintners, many of whom keep brothels and houses of that kind. I believe such not to be the fact. There are not above two or three free vintners who are actually licensed as publicans, and as free vintners they have only authority to sell wine in their own houses, and not spirits.

6342. Have the vintners no privilege with respect to the retail vend of spirits and wine?—Of wine they have. A free vintner, in his own house, may retail wine without a licence.

6343. Do you happen to know whether that has led to any abuse?—I am not aware of any.

6344. You attend the licensing magistrates?—Yes.

6345. Would not you be likely to hear on those occasions if there were any complaints of particular houses?—Before the general licensing meeting in each year, the Common Council of the respective wards have meetings, at which all complaints, if there be any, are discussed, and in all cases in which complaints have been made against publicans, the matter is discussed at the licensing meeting, and if the complaints are sufficiently strong to induce the magistrates to withhold the licence, they do so.

6346. Are there many applications for licences which are refused?—Of old licences there are not, unless upon very strong grounds.

6347. For new houses are many licenses granted?—I should say for new houses the licences are seldom granted, unless a strong reason is shown for granting a licence for an additional house.

6348. Are many applications made for licences for new houses?—I cannot state the number; there are certainly a considerable number of applications each year. I have understood that some remarks have been made as to the committals by the aldermen. I have made a return to the Court of Aldermen showing the average number of convictions and acquittals, and the convictions in London, as compared with the committals, certainly bear a very fair proportion to those which come from the police courts.

6349. Out of a certain number of committals by the aldermen, the number of convictions is as great as out of a similar number of committals by the police magistrates?—It is greater, I think.

6350. When a bill is not found is the person discharged immediately at the Old Bailey?—Not till the grand jury is discharged:

6351. Is the practice the same upon the circuits?—I believe it is. The prisoners are not discharged until the grand jury have been discharged, unless by special application.

6352. They are not discharged immediately the grand jury come in and state they have ignored the bill either at the Old Bailey or on the circuits?—No.

6353. Do you know whether that practice originated at the Old Bailey?—I have always supposed the reason for the prisoner's not being immediately discharged to be, that the rejection of the bill was not a discharge from the offence itself, but that another bill might be presented.

6354. At the same assizes?—I believe, of late, a rule has been laid down that a second bill for the same offence should not be presented.

6355. At the sessions at Exeter a learned counsel stated that it was a practice which had originated at the Old Bailey. He sent up a statement making a complaint against the corporation of London as being the persons who originated the practice?—It is quite mpossible that they could have originated it. The aldermen are only some of the commissioners named in the commission, and they seldom interfere at all, never acting in the absence of some legal commissioner.

John Clark, Esq.
20th Jan. 1854.

STEPHEN WILLIAM LEACH, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

S. W. Leach, Esq.

6356. What situation do you hold connected with the corporation?—I am engineer of the Thames navigation and of the port of London. I am also principal receiver of tolls, arising out of the western part of the navigation, under the jurisdiction of the City, and I receive the rents and fines for projections on the bed of the river.

6357. What is the amount of your salary?—I hold several appointments under the corporation. I am paid separately for each. As engineer to the Thames navigation, I receive 300*l.* a-year;—as engineer to the port of London, I have received 100*l.* a-year;—as receiver of tolls, I receive 131*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.*, paid to me by poundage. I have an allowance for house rent, and for coals and candles, of 40*l.* a-year;—commission on the sale of gravel raised from the bed of the river, 3*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*; the poundage I received for the collection of rents and fines for accommodations on the river, was 20*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*; making together 594*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* That was subject to deductions for the salary of a clerk, and travelling expenses of 149*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, leaving the net amount 445*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* Since that time, in the course of last year, my salary as engineer for the port of London was spontaneously on the part of the Navigation committee increased.

6358. By how much?—250*l.* a-year.

6359. What may be considered the present emoluments of your office, allowing for deductions?—About 700*l.* a-year.

6360. Are you allowed to take other professional business?—My time is fully occupied for the City.

6361. Do you take your instructions from the Navigation committee?—Entirely.

6362. In what way do you chiefly perform your duties with regard to the river?—Taking the western navigation first,—that extending from Staines to London bridge—I have the care of all the works, all the locks, weirs, towing paths, and everything of that kind. It has been the practice of the Navigation committee to keep a staff of workmen for those repairs; it is always necessary to have a number of skilful men at hand, in order to meet any emergency which may arise; therefore on that account they have always been in the habit of employing a staff of workmen of their own, rather than of contracting for works.

6363. Does the City of London maintain all the towing paths up to Staines?—Yes.

6364. Where do the towing paths commence?—At Putney.

6365. Are there any locks between Putney and Staines?—Six.

6366. Are those maintained by the City?—They are.

6367. You inspect the towing paths and the locks, and point out any repairs or alterations which are necessary?—Yes; and then I superintend them. I have also to design any new works which may be required, and to carry them out. At times a very considerable amount of attention is required to bills brought into Parliament affecting the river Thames. I have to examine all such, and advise the committee upon them. Then, of course, I have to attend every meeting of the committee. That disposes of my duties above-bridge.

6368. Do you do anything between Putney and London Bridge?—Very little at present, as far as engineering works are concerned.

6369. So far as any interference of the City takes place between those two points, who is it that guides them by any observation or survey?—I have to advise the City upon any engineering question.

6370. Do you interfere in any question which does not involve engineering matters?—No. In case of encroachments upon the river, there is an officer whose duty it is to watch them.

6371. What officer is that?—The water bailiff. His duties extend throughout the whole jurisdiction of the City.

6372. He is a very efficient officer, is not he?—He is.

6373. A statement has been made as to materials having been thrown into the river at Blackfriars Bridge; do you know anything upon that subject?—Yes; the Navigation committee referred it to the water-bailiff and to me, to examine whether any impediment had been created to the navigation by those materials being thrown in. I made as accurate an examination as I could, and I satisfied myself that it was impossible that the vessel which had received damage could have touched the bottom at that place.

6374. You think she must have touched the bottom higher up?—Yes; and we had the evidence of watermen who saw her in a sinking state before she arrived at the bridge.

6375. What sort of vessel was she?—A small iron steam boat; one of those which ply at the halfpenny fares. There is another class of duties that I have to perform above-bridge—that is, receiving the tolls which are taken upon the Thames navigation. Those are tolls granted by Act of Parliament for barges navigating upon the river up to Staines

S. W. Leach, Esq.

6376. How do you collect those tolls?—They are collected at the different locks, and at another place in the tideway also.

6377. You collect them by your collectors?—I collect them by my collectors, but I have the supervision of them, and I may state that there is not a single barge passes subject to toll which does not undergo my own check; in most cases seven or eight times over.

6378. Those tolls are probably collected at the locks in other navigable rivers?—I expect in the same way.

6379. What are your duties below bridge?—I have the general superintendence of all engineering works in the river below bridge. I have to advise the Navigation committee upon all projections into the river, the removal of shoals and every other work which is proposed to be carried on, and to superintend all such removal of shoals and other works.

6380. Are there many shoals in the river which impede the navigation?—There are several.

6381. Whereabouts?—Beginning from the neighbourhood of Erith, they extend up the river more or less to London Bridge.

6382. Would the effectual removal of them be a work of great expense?—It would.

6383. Are the funds at the command of the Navigation committee sufficient for their removal?—Not as they are distributed at present; they are confined to certain objects by Act of Parliament, and it is not considered that they are applicable to the general removal of the shoals.

6384. Would they be sufficient for that purpose if that restriction by the Act of Parliament were removed?—I think they would.

6385. You think the operations of the Navigation committee are at present impeded by Act of Parliament restrictions on the appropriation of their funds?—Decidedly so.

6386. Do you think the state of the river is becoming worse?—I think it is.

6387. Materially?—Yes, but slowly; more particularly in the upper part of the river; in the Pools themselves perhaps less so, though from the alteration in the mode of carrying on trade in the river, the inconveniences are more felt.

6388. Has not the removal of old London Bridge produced a great effect upon the flow of water up and down the river?—A serious effect, and the effect is still going on.

6389. Can you describe to us the extent of that effect?—As far as the navigation is concerned the effect has been very injurious, and it has led to the sinking of Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges.

6390. Is not some effect produced upon the ebb and flow of the tide below bridge?—Yes.

6392. The effect of the removal of London Bridge is that the river clears its bed more completely than it did, is not it?—Yes.

6393. It carries down a greater quantity of silt into the sea?—I do not think that arises so much from the removal of London Bridge, as from the constant action of the steam-boats.

6394. Does not the tide run down with greater velocity than it did before?—It does.

6396. The water becoming more muddy through the action of the steam-boats, of course a greater quantity of silt will be carried down?—Exactly so.

6397. I will read to you the statement of one of the witnesses before the Commission the Rev. Charles Dalton, who is rector of Lambeth. He speaks of the part of the parish of Lambeth being at certain high tides submerged, and he adds; "Mr. Edwards's statement "I understand to be this—that none of this inconvenience took place before old London "Bridge was removed, and that it is caused by the greater freedom of the water coming "up through London Bridge. Since I received the letter from the secretary to the Com- "mission I have made a great deal of inquiry of the watermen on the river, and I am "told that before London Bridge was built this did not take place. The City of London, "I believe, are not responsible for repairing the banks of the Thames, but as they built "London Bridge it is argued that it was their duty, before they did so, to take care to "require the holders of property to raise the banks and provide for the consequences "which would ensue.—On taking down old London Bridge, which operated as a dam, you "think they ought to have guarded against the consequential damage of the alteration?— "That is the argument which is used." Do you believe that the amount of damage done to the property on the banks of the Thames, since the removal of London Bridge has been considerable?—In individual cases there may have been very considerable damage done, just in this way, that higher tides flow up the river now than used to do before the removal of old London Bridge—therefore, they may flood the surrounding country and do mischief.

6398. Is it a fact which comes within your knowledge?—It is a generally received opinion, by those acquainted with the state of the river, that it is so. I do not think there is any record to prove it accurately.

6399. Is it the duty of the City to embank the river so as to prevent the river flooding the country?—Certainly not.

6400. That is no part of their duty as conservators of the stream?—Certainly not.

6401. What do you conceive to be the main duties of the corporation as conservators of the river Thames?—Chiefly to prevent encroachments upon the bed and soil o the river, or to regulate them.

6402. To see that nothing is done on the banks to impede the navigation?—Yes.

6403. Is that a very important duty in regard to the navigation of the river?—Yes, it is.

6404. The conservancy has very little to do with the stream itself, has it?—Inasmuch as the conservator regulates the encroachments upon the bed and soil of the river, it has very much to do with it.

6405. The conservancy has very little to do with the current of the water itself, has it?—That rather depends upon the extent to which the conservator's duty is thought to go.

6406. Do you think it is essential that the control over the soil and bed of the river should be combined with the duties of conservancy?—Decidedly, it is very important that they should be united.

6407. Are you acquainted with the state of Blackfriars Bridge?—Yes.

6408. In what state is it?—It may be said to be in a very dangerous state now; it is propped up, but there is no security against its settling further at any time.

6409. Do you think it was the removal of old London Bridge which affected it?—I have no doubt about it whatever.

6410. How long has it been in its present insecure state?—About two years.

6411. The more complete flow of the tide has loosened the attachments and foundations of the bridge, is that the case?—No, not exactly. I believe the received opinion about it is this, that the bridge itself in the first instance was built upon improper foundations.

6412. What is the date of Blackfriars Bridge?—It is between eighty and ninety years old; it was merely built upon a kind of frame-work with nothing more to secure it. At the time it was built the river ebbed out to a less extent than it does now, the bed of the river was also higher than it is now. At that time there was an equilibrium between the pressure of the piers themselves and the surrounding bed of the river aided by the then existing depth of water; the removal of London Bridge has caused the bed of the river to become lower and the depth of water to become less; the equilibrium therefore has been destroyed, and as the piers stand upon clay which is compressible their weight has caused the settlements which have occurred. The same is the case with Westminster Bridge.

6413. In the event of rebuilding those bridges, is it likely to affect the river more or less, according to the manner in which it is done?—If the bridges are rebuilt I apprehend the foundations will be taken down to a much lower level; in fact proper foundations put down.

6414. Would that affect the ebb and flow of the river?—Not at all.

6415. It is not likely that anything done with respect to those bridges will materially affect the ebb and flow of the river?—Not at all.

6416. The foundations of Waterloo Bridge are quite secure, are not they?—I do not consider them so.

6417. Is Blackfriars Bridge in as bad a state as Westminster Bridge with regard to its foundations?—I think it is.

6418. What is the state of Southwark Bridge?—I have never heard any complaint about it.

6419. You believe that to be solid?—Yes.

6420. Has not the removal of London Bridge very much affected the freezing of the Thames?—It must have tended to prevent it.

6421. The Thames has never frozen since the removal of London Bridge, has it?—I cannot say that I have seen it myself in London; higher up I know it has done so.

6422. It has not frozen over this year, has it?—It has not. I should state, as the question of the subsidence of those bridges has been mentioned, that having that circumstance before them has operated with the Navigation committee to deter them from going on with the removal of those shoals, which interfere with the mooring of the tier of ships, with the rapidity that they otherwise would have done. The scouring of the river has taken place to the greatest extent towards the centre of it, and there its effect in the subsidence of those bridges has been chiefly shown; it has appeared to the Navigation committee that if they had deepened the moorings for tiers to a considerable depth at once the same effect might have been produced upon the heavy warehouses at the sides. They have therefore gone very cautiously to work; they have improved the moorings to a great extent in the river, but they have been advised to go on cautiously, so that the same effect which has been produced upon the bridges shall not occur with the warehouses.

S. W. Leach, Esq.

6423. Do you think, upon the whole, the duties of the conservancy and the protection of the river are efficiently exercised by the City with their present powers?—No; they have not sufficient powers.

6424. What alteration would you recommend to be made? What additional power would it be desirable that they should possess?—In the first instance they require funds.

6425. Without going to any great expenditure, what addition to your funds do you think would be desirable?—I was directed by the committee, two or three years ago, to estimate what works were really required in the shape of deepening the river.

6426. What is the present annual expenditure for the purposes which you have been explaining?—That takes place under two or three different funds. I will first state to the Commission what the state of the funds, under the Navigation committee, is at present. I will take first, the upper navigation. In the year 1777, the first improvement in the navigation took place. The corporation themselves, out of their municipal revenues, contributed 10,000*l.* towards certain works in the river, nothing having been done before that. Parliament, after that, gave them a toll, but there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the state in which the navigation was. The corporation then resolved to grapple with the question, and, in the year 1810, they went to Parliament for sufficient powers. They built the six locks which have been mentioned, and did other works, and incurred a debt of 175,000*l.* in doing so. For a length of time, the increase of trade on the river did not answer their expectations, and the fund became 15,000*l.* in debt. The corporation advanced that 15,000*l.* Afterwards the trade assumed a more flourishing state, until in the year 1848, they had reduced their debt of 175,000*l.* to 134,500*l.* About that time, the railways came fully into operation, and through their competition with the river, a great falling off in the tolls has taken place. In the year ending Michaelmas, 1839, the amount the corporation received for tolls upon that part of the river was 15,823*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* In the year 1852, it was 7,158*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, being a difference of nearly 9000*l.* They have the interest, of course, to pay upon the debt, and the works to maintain. The fund, therefore, may be said to be almost in a bankrupt state. Seeing that that was the state of the fund, the corporation within the last three years have, on one occasion, authorized an expenditure of 5,000*l.*, and on another, 10,000*l.* in addition, out of their own funds. That is the state of what is called the Navigation fund. Another fund, which the Navigation committee have the management of, is that of the rents and fines arising from projections and accommodations on the river. That amounts to about 800*l.* or 900*l.* a year. That is expended almost entirely in the removal of shoals, and in other works connected with the navigation. The third fund they have control over is the tonnage duty fund. That is a fund arising from tonnage on shipping entering the port of London, and is at present confined to paying the expenses of maintaining moorings in the river, and paying the harbour master and the necessary staff.

6427. That is about 17,000*l.* a year, is it not?—It is.

6428. That is, in fact, the principal fund that the Navigation committee have to rely on?—It is.

6429. But its application is very limited?—It is.

6430. Your view is that those restrictions should be removed, and that it should be applicable to the general purposes of the Navigation committee?—I think it is very likely that the shipowners might complain of so general an application of it. I think so far as the tide flows, and so far as vessels can be made to go which pay these dues, this fund ought to be applicable.

6431. Suppose it is desirable to remove a shoal, how is that paid for?—Either out of the corporation revenues or out of this little rental fund.

6432. Then, in truth, unless you resort to the corporation estate, you have no adequate fund for such purposes?—No.

6433. You must either have the general funds of the corporation, or go to a fund which the government is now contesting with you?—Yes.

6434. There is no fund of a secure nature which is applicable to the purposes of the removal of shoals?—There is not.

6435. Will you proceed to state what, in your opinion, would be the amount of revenue which ought to be effected to keeping the river in a good state and providing for the removal of shoals?—I will first of all mention the estimate I have made of the amount required for the removal of shoals. With respect to the western navigation, as far as the flow of the tide extends above London Bridge, I estimate that 40,000*l.* for dredging is required for putting the river in a state that sea-going vessels would be able to make use of it. To deepen the moorings where the tiers lie now, in addition to what has been already done, a sum of 18,000*l.* is required, and to remove the shoals generally in the river, and deepen the channel, so that vessels could come to the tiers, would cost 180,000*l.* more.

6436. Have you made any calculation what for some years to come would, in your opinion, be the annual expense in order to keep the river in a proper state for navigation?—I have not. I think, after those works had been carried out, the expense would be trifling if they were judiciously done, but then again there is a very heavy expense required to put the locks and weirs I have spoken of in an efficient state. They were all built of timber, and they have been built 40 years, and are in fact worn out.

6437. Is their condition of importance to the general state of the river below?—It is of great importance to the land adjoining, and it is also of importance as affecting the back water of the Thames. That was a subject which received the attention of the Tidal Harbour Commissioners to a very great extent, some years ago; and they deemed it of the utmost possible importance that the natural back water of a river should be maintained in the best possible state.

S. W. Leach, Esq.

6438. What in your opinion would be the sum requisite to put those locks and weirs in a proper condition?—There are two of those locks which the Navigation committee have just given orders shall be replaced by new ones. That is under an arrangement with certain water companies, which under the powers of Acts of Parliament, intend to derive their supply from the upper part of the river. That abstraction of water renders it necessary to rebuild two of those locks, so that the rebuilding of two of them is provided for. The others are in that state, that anything in the shape of repair would be thrown away upon them; it would be far cheaper at once to rebuild them, which would cost about 20,000*l.*

6439. In authorizing the abstraction of water, has its effect upon the river been thoroughly considered?—Yes, it has. The Navigation committee retained the services of Mr. Walker and Sir William Cubitt, to judge whether the representations which I made to them upon the subject were correct. I believe they fully concurred in what I had said, and in the anticipations I had formed as to the extent of the damage which would be done.

6440. What is the general purport of those recommendations?—The rebuilding of those locks, and the performing a very considerable amount of dredging, involving an expenditure of about 30,000*l.*

6441. That being done, are you of opinion that no injury would accrue to the river in general?—Certainly; except it may be from the abstraction of so much back water; but I do not think that that will practically be an evil.

6442. The City have no connection with any water company, have they?—None whatever.

6443. Nor with any water supply?—No.

6444. Is there any other point to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—Perhaps there may be one or two points which would have been far better explained by the principal harbour master, had he been able to attend. Unfortunately, he is ill; but there are two or three subjects which have been referred to by former witnesses, which, I think, require that the Commissioners should be fully informed as to the facts of the case.

6445. With respect to the statement of Mr. Powles, in answer to Question 1034, that the care of the navigation of the river is entirely intrusted to the corporation, have you any remarks to make?—The mooring of vessels in the river, and the whole conduct of the harbour service in the river, is defined by certain byelaws. Those byelaws have to be approved by the Trinity House, in the first instance, and by one of the chief justices afterwards. They go into the utmost possible detail as to the duties of the harbour masters.

6446. The harbour masters have to carry those regulations into effect, have not they?—Yes; but their duties are defined with the utmost possible minuteness by those byelaws.

6447. The corporation do not finally make the byelaws under which their officers act?—They make the byelaws; but the byelaws have to be approved by the Trinity House, before they are carried into effect.

6448. The officer who carries them into effect is the City's officer?—Yes. Question 1045 is, "By whom are those harbour masters appointed?" The answer is, "By the common council; by what is called the Navigation committee." Neither the common council nor the Navigation committee have a single word to say in the appointment of the harbour master; it rests entirely with the Lord Mayor. The harbour master then has to undergo an examination at the Trinity House; and they certify whether or not he is fit to be harbour master. It only rests with the Navigation committee to allot him his station, and to appoint who shall be superintending harbour master.

6449. Do you think the harbour masters are highly efficient officers?—Highly so.

6450. Is it the fact that none of the aldermen are members of the Navigation committee?—It is not the fact. I think there are twelve of them members of the Navigation committee.

6451. Do they frequently attend?—The aldermen do not attend so frequently as the commoners do.

6452. Is it the case that the Navigation committee is so constructed as to exclude mercantile men?—Not at all; it is the fault of mercantile men themselves if they are excluded. Those who complain of the constitution of the Navigation committee are most of them electors of the City; and it is their fault if they do not send those whom they consider proper men into the common council.

6453. Do those members of the committee who have no professional knowledge of matters connected with navigation interfere much in the business?—Yes.

6454. In what way can they advantageously interfere? How can traders who have never directed their special attention to those subjects judge of an engineering point connected with the navigation of the river?—They cannot perhaps judge of an engineering point, but they sit more as a jury to receive the evidence they can get upon points, and form the best opinion they can upon them. If you are to judge by the results, I think they show that they perform their duties properly. With respect to the service with which I have been most connected, the upper river service, if you are to take absence of complaints as an evidence, it may be said that they perform their duties well. They have had sufficient power to carry out the works properly on the river since the year 1810, and I am aware of scarcely a single complaint having been made against them from that time to this; so far from that, the general opinion among carriers on the river has been that it would be very much for their benefit if the jurisdiction of the corporation were extended to Reading instead of stopping at Staines. That opinion has been expressed to me over and over again.

S. W. Leach, Esq.

6455. Do you attach any value to those official visits which the members of the committee pay to points on the river—Yes.

6456. In what way are they beneficial?—I will take the most extensive one they make; that is one which by their standing orders is made in the month of May every year. At that time I have to lay before them a detailed report, with the estimate of the works which I consider necessary to be performed in the river. They go through those items seriatim, and I have to point out the spots where the works are to be done. In many cases they can as well judge as I can myself of the necessity of them. They order them or otherwise, as they think proper, and afterwards they make another visitation to see if those works have been carried into effect.

6457. I suppose they chiefly must rely upon your judgment in matters of that kind?—In engineering matters, decidedly.

6458. A suggestion has been made by Mr. Powles in answer to Question 1049, as to a compound committee, formed of members of the Trinity House and members of the corporation. He is asked, "Your proposal is to make a compound committee, partly of "members of the common council, and partly of persons connected with the Trinity House "and other public bodies representing the navigation. You would not take the power "entirely out of the hands of the common council, and create some new superintending "authority?" He says, "I would not take the power out of the hands of the cor- "poration, but I would make it compulsory upon them to admit into that body persons "elected by such commercial bodies as I have indicated, so that, whether we may or may "not be members of the common council, we may be represented there. Then the diffi- "culty would be got over of mercantile men not being able to attend to municipal affairs, "because they might be called into action in cases where they can be of no use." What do you think of that suggestion?—I think the Navigation committee, as it is constituted now, is much more independent than such a body would be. I think that if some body must be added to the Navigation committee, possibly the Trinity House would be the least exceptionable, because they are most independent, but circumstances arise which show that it is perfectly necessary that the Navigation committee shall be as independent as possible of local interests. In a case we had last year, the London Dock Company wanted and obtained powers from Parliament to make a new entrance to that dock. That involved the removal of a tier of colliers, and of course it attracted the attention of the coal trade, who feared that their interests would be injuriously affected. I can conceive, if there had been a representative from the London Dock Company on the Navigation committee, there would have been a jealousy on the part of the other dock companies, who might think that this removal of a tier of colliers was giving an undue prerence to the London Dock Company. As it was, the independent position of the Navigation committee enabled them to effect an arrangement satisfactory, I believe, to all parties.

6459. If the Navigation committee were formed of persons interested in the trade, you think they would not be sufficiently independent to decide with justice?—Quite so.

6460. On the other hand the body may be so independent as to have neither interest nor knowledge of the question, which is the charge made against the present Navigation committe; how far do you think that charge is merited?—My own opinion is that it is not merited; but supposing it were, I apprehend any difficulty of that kind might be met by having a board of reference. If a person felt himself aggrieved, or any interest felt itself aggrieved, by the management of the Navigation committee, there might be a body to whom appeal might be made.

6461. The control of the navigation of the river seems to be a subject which involves a great deal of technical and special knowledge. It is alleged that the Navigation committee, who are merely a committee of the common council, have not a sufficient amount of special knowledge of the subject to render them competent to administer such concerns. You being a professional person, acting under their control, what is your opinion?—It is a precisely similar case to that which daily arises. Take the case of the boards of directors of railways. They do not pretend to exercise judgment upon the engineering questions which are continually brought before them.

6462. Directors of railways are not very fluctuating bodies, whereas the Navigation committee is a fluctuating body, is it not?—Yes, it is.

6463. You think, by the advice of professional and skilled persons which they receive, they are competent to manage the affairs which are intrusted to them?—I do. It is always their habit, if a question of particular importance presents itself, to go to the very highest authorities they can upon the subject. S. W. Leach, Esq. 20th Jan. 1854.

6464. Is there anything else which you desire to call to our attention?—There is one point upon which the Commission have been somewhat misinformed; and that is, in the evidence of Mr. Martin Pratt, the secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company, in No. 2,462. By a provision in the Admiralty regulations themselves, those regulations cease as soon as a vessel comes within the bounds of the port of London; and then the regulations which the byelaws point out begin to take effect. Those regulations as to lights have been approved by a most competent body, as far as the lights are concerned,—viz., the Trinity House.

6465. Then, in fact, there is no conflict of regulations?—There ought not to be any difficulty. It is the fault of the person showing the lights, if there is any.

6466. There is no conflict of regulations?—Not at all.

6467. If parties do not show the proper lights, they do not obey the regulations?—Precisely so. The different regulations which are spoken of do not apply to the same part of the river.

Adjourned to Tuesday next, at twelve o'clock.

Tuesday, 24th January 1854.

The Right Hon. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P. in the Chair.

The Right Hon. James Stuart Wortley, M.P., was further examined as follows:— J. S. Wortley, M.P. 24th Jan. 1854.

6468. Is there anything in the evidence which you have already given, to which you are desirous of calling our attention?—Yes. When I was asked upon a former occasion as to the propriety of a public body like the corporation of London producing their documents and their titles except upon compulsion, I referred to a circumstance which I believed to have occurred, and which I had a strong impression was somewhere recorded, namely, that in an instance of that kind where, without compulsion, the corporation of a large town had produced their documents, it had led to the taking of a technical objection to their title, which resulted in the forfeiture of their property; and when this was mentioned before Lord Eldon, he had rebuked them for taking that course. I then said I believed the instance to which I referred was the town of Hull. I have made inquiry, and I find it reported in the case of Cock v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Chatham, 8th Vesey, Jun., page 140. The corporation alluded to was not the corporation of Hull, but the corporation of Newcastle upon Tyne. This case was upon an analogous point but not altogether the same, and the object was to compel a corporation to produce certain documents in which other parties were interested. In the course of the arguments the defendant's counsel said, "The ground of defence is that perhaps those deeds might dis-" prove their title to these very lands, as in the instance of the Newcastle case. Lord " Chancellor. This is a very important case. I admit the Newcastle case is a good lesson " upon this subject of production; they produced their charters to satisfy curiosity, some " persons got hold of them, and the consequence was that the corporation lost 7,000*l.* a " year." Since that I have written to the town clerk of Newcastle, Mr. Clayton, who will be known to some of the Commissioners as a man of great distinction in his profession, and I have from him full particulars which, however, with the leave of the Commission I will not mention in public, but they fully confirm this statement of Lord Eldon. It appears that there was an action in which the corporation of Newcastle were the plaintiffs and it was in consequence of having voluntarily exposed their charters that their rights were disputed. Lord Eldon was himself a counsel in the case, and therefore it was that he had a knowledge of the facts. It turned out that in consequence of their having so exhibited their title an objection of a purely technical nature was taken, and the result was a loss to the corporation of 7,000*l.* a year, which they had enjoyed for centuries.

6469. Was that property in land or was it in the nature of tolls?—It was in the nature of tolls. There is one other matter which I wish also to correct, with reference to the negociation in 1847, as to the suit about the bed and soil of the river. I produced upon the last occasion a Bill which I stated to be the final terms of the compromise between the Government and the corporation of the City. On looking to the clause which constituted the new board, the chairman will recollect that he was surprised to find that, in point of fact, though it transferred the conservancy to the new body, that new body in all respects derived its existence from the corporation. I find I was mistaken in the copy of the Bill. I had the Bill as it came from the first recommitment and not from the second. In the second Bill an alteration was made and it was provided, after naming the Lord Mayor and three other aldermen and some of the common council members of the board of conservancy, that the remaining five out of the fifteen should be elected by the corporation but subject to the approval of the Crown, the avowed object of that being to give the Crown power to object to those persons being other than persons independent of the corporation. Therefore it gave the Crown a direct power of nominating in fact, though by the circuitous mode of a veto, five of the members of the board of conservancy. The second clause is, "that the Lord Mayor for the time being of the City of London, shall be " one of the conservators; that three others of such conservators shall be aldermen of the City

J. S. Wortley, M.P.
24th Jan. 1854.

" of London, and shall be elected by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen of the said City in " the inner chamber; that six other of such conservators shall be members of the common " council of the said City, and shall be elected by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of " the said City in common council assembled; and that the remaining five of such conser- " vators shall be elected by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in " common council assembled, subject to the approval and provisions herein-after mentioned," and then by the 8th clause it is provided. "That if the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons " in common council assembled, shall not within three months after the commencement of " this Act, have elected five persons who shall be approved by the said superior board on " behalf of Her Majesty, and in like manner—if when a vacancy shall occur in any one of " the five persons who are to be so elected by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons in " common council assembled, subject to the approval of the said superior board on behalf of " Her Majesty, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons in common council assembled, shall " not, within six weeks after such vacancy has occurred, have elected a person to supply such " vacancy who shall be approved by the said superior board, then and in either of such cases, " and from time to time as often as the same shall happen, it shall be lawful for the said " superior board, on behalf of Her Majesty, to appoint such persons or person as they may " think fit, to be such conservators or conservator,"—so that it gave virtually to the Crown the power of naming five persons upon that commission.

6470. At present I presume every member of the Conservancy committee is a member of the common council?—That is the case. At present the Lord Mayor is conservator on behalf of the corporation, the conservancy, in fact, being managed by a committee of the common council. In consequence of the notification which I have mentioned, there was some hesitation on the part of the City whether to accept that term of the compromise or not; and I have here the proceedings of the Court of Common Council upon it. In the first instance there was a Court of Common Council held, and they refused to accept that modification by a majority of thirty-three to twenty-four; but the division being close, another notice was given upon the subject, and eventually they acceded to that arrangement by a majority of forty-eight to twenty-one. This was very near the end of the session, and the Bill appears not to have gone further. Then the proceedings in the suit were resumed, and the negociation went off. Upon that occasion, the Court of Common Council resolved, "That in order to carry a Bill, so important to the public as the "Thames Conservancy Bill, it is under all the circumstances expedient to accede to the "suggestion, that the conservators should consist of the Right Honourable the Lord "Mayor, for the time being, three aldermen, to be appointed by the Court of Aldermen, "six commoners, to be appointed by the Court of Common Council, and five freemen and "citizens, to be also appointed by the Court of Common Council, such five freemen "and citizens to be subject to the approval of the Crown."

6471. That gave virtually and really the appointment of those persons to the Crown?—Yes. And at that time the City were, to the extent I have named, willing to acquiesce in it. I must so far guard myself as to say that I have no authority to intimate that they would consent to it now. I must abstain from expressing any opinion upon that subject one way or the other.

6472. Will you allow me to refer you to the evidence of Mr. Powles on the subject, in page 111 of the evidence. He says "I have lately had occasion, within the last three or "four months, with one or two other gentlemen, to attend the Navigation committee on "matters of business; and on looking round the room, it was impossible, with all due "respect for those gentlemen, not to see that they had no qualification whatever for the "duties they had to discharge. But they have a good harbour master, and therefore the "business is well done. Now, many years ago, the corporation itself brought a Bill into "the House of Commons for regulating, or improving, in some way, the conservancy of the "river. It was proposed in the House of Commons that a clause should be inserted in the "Bill that the Trinity House and each of the great Dock Companies should appoint a "member on that Navigation committee. As soon as that clause was propounded in the "House, the corporation withdrew the Bill. I think that in that they showed an "exceedingly unwise and narrow policy; because, in the first place, there is no emolument "attaching to the performance of those duties, and in the next place, the body could "not but be improved by introducing into it intelligent men, who would be put "there either by the Trinity House or by the Dock Companies." Mr. Powles seems to be under the impression that there was a jealousy on the part of the corporation towards the commercial bodies, such as the dock companies; and when that clause was inserted, the City withdrew the Bill. According to your statement, that does not appear to have been the case?—I take for granted that Mr. Powles was speaking, as I was on the last occasion, from memory merely, and certainly he is mistaken in the fact he has here deposed to. The fact was, the City eventually consented to the only modification of the board, which was proposed. It was not in the House, but in committee, and was proposed by myself. I having no connection with the corporation at the time, moved the resolution in the committee, upon which that arrangement was adopted, which was afterwards acceded to by the Court of Common Council; but I remember the question being very fully discussed in the committee, and some members of the committee contending for putting the chairmen of the dock companies, or persons connected with the shipping interest ex officio, upon that board; other members of the committee, of whom

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

I was one, objected to that, and preferred that the Crown should have the power of nominating those persons; and on this ground, viz:—that if they were put on the board it would only be substituting a class of interested persons, that they would come to protect particular interests, such as the interests of the dock, an establishment of which they were officers or members; and in fact, that they would come to serve their private and commercial interests, rather than promote public objects. With regard to the present Navigation committee, there are some men upon it, no doubt, who have a great knowledge of the subject. I believe at this moment the gentleman who will succeed to the chair of the Navigation committee, in the usual order this year, will be a gentleman of great experience upon these subjects; but speaking generally, no doubt the committee consider themselves rather as a jury, to be guided by their harbour master, to hear what his opinion is, and as men of sense and men of business generally to act upon his representation, and judge of the wisdom of the course he recommends. If they were all persons connected with the river, they would have their separate interests, and not be so likely to act together, as if they had no other motive influencing them than a regard to the public benefit.

6473. The effect of the arrangement to which you came with the Government, so far as it was completed, was, as I understand, this,—that the whole of the funds at present under the control of the Navigation committee should continue to be applied to the conservancy, and that in addition to those funds, there should be whatever profit might be made from the right which the Government are now contesting with the City in the soil of the river. The Government was to grant that right upon the condition that the whole of the proceeds should be applied to the conservancy?—Precisely so.

6474. And this compound fund, the fund composed of these two branches of revenue, was to be managed as at present by a committee of the common council. Are the commissioners to understand you that that has been a matter which has been much considered?—No, not in detail. The whole of the proceeds of the river, amounting at present to only 1,100*l.* a-year, were to be paid into a fund for the specific purpose of being applied either to the conservancy of the river, or being handed over to the Government to improve the banks and approaches to the river. The Government has to be permitted to fill up the blank which we left, with half or two thirds, or even the whole of that income, if they chose to take it.

6475. Did you consider at all the question whether the fund which would be so constituted would be sufficient for the proper maintenance of the conservancy of the river?—Yes, that has been well considered; it is manifest that the sum is wholly inadequate. It is a great mistake to suppose, as is supposed by many people who are uninformed on the subject, that the corporation take a part of the proceeds of the river; even a very distinguished person very conversant with finance, lately told me, when talking about the river, that he had always supposed the profits of the river were very large, and that the corporation derived great benefit from it. So far from that being so, the 1,100*l.* a-year is a mere trifle compared with what is really required, and which in truth is paid out of the corporation funds. When the suit began there was a sum of 60,000*l.* about to be applied to the particular purpose of carrying out Captain Bullock's report. Of course if you take the conservancy from the City, you must find funds somewhere else for the support of the conservancy. You cannot take the conservancy out of the hands of the City, and still call upon them to spend their general funds in the maintenance of the conservancy.

6476. Has any estimate ever been made of the sum which may probably be required for the proper maintenance of the conservancy?—I am not aware whether any estimate has ever been made of the annual sum likely to be required, but in the year 1846, there was a report published of the works which Captain Bullock and Mr. Walker recommended, amounting to 60,000*l.*

6477. Those works would be done once for all probably?—Some of them, I presume, were the removal of shoals which from time to time grow up again. I believe there were some of them about which there was a difference of opinion among water engineers whether their removal would be a benefit or not. At that time, no doubt, if the suit had not been commenced, a very large sum of money would have been laid out; the consequence of the suit has been that nothing has been done, comparatively speaking, for the last ten years.

6478. I suppose there is no doubt that the present state of litigation between the Crown and the City is very detrimental to the proper maintenance of the river?—Extremely so, and it was upon that high ground that Lord Seymour, with the authority of Lord John Russell and the heads of that Government, took up the subject as a matter of policy.

6479. When you were last before the Commission you stated that you wished to reserve some remarks which you were desirous of addressing to us upon your own court. Are you now prepared to make those observations?—I am. I hope I shall not detain the Commissioners more than a very short time, but as reference has been made to the state of the City courts, I think the real facts should be accurately stated, as far as I can state them. One witness referred to the Central Criminal Court and to the jurisdiction and proceedings in that court. That is not a corporation court, although the corporation is to a certain degree connected with it, and supplies the funds which pay the judicial salaries. I do not know how far the Commissioners will therefore take notice of that court, or of its proceedings. I refer to the evidence of Mr. Pulling. I confess I agree with him very much that the result of recent legislation has been in the wrong direction. At the time that the Central Criminal Court was established, the jurisdiction of the courts of Quarter Sessions within the metropolitan districts was confined to simple felonies; the consequence was that all burglaries, housebreaking, and compound felonies were tried at the Central Criminal Court, and perhaps the Central Criminal Court, taking the present staff, was overburthened, occasioning inconvenience and expense. The remedy applied was by an Act passed two years ago, restoring to the Quarter Sessions their jurisdiction in those confirmed felonies, and leaving to the Central Criminal Court only those more serious cases which are now tried there, diminishing the labours of the Central Criminal Court, increasing greatly those of the Westminster Quarter Sessions, and no doubt effecting an improvement so far as the delay and expense is concerned, but in other respects I think the effect has been extremely injurious. For my part I think if it could be managed it would be very desirable to concentrate the whole of the criminal jurisdiction of this metropolis in one court, that court sitting almost permanently; Her Majesty's judges, of course, only attending occasionally as they do now, and an apportionment of the labour being made between the judicial officers who may be there. The consequence of the other course is this, that the Court of Quarter Sessions, which sits weekly, sits at the same time as the Central Criminal Court. Occasionally, a witness is absent because he has to be at the sessions, which, however, does not often happen. When we want information about a prisoner as to what prisons he has been in, it often happens that the police officers and gaolers who could give information are away at Clerkenwell, attending the sessions. But there is a more serious evil which occurs to an extent which is lamentable. There is but one bar, and can be but one bar, whose interest it can be to follow this branch of the profession, the consequence is that the same bar to a great extent practises at the sessions as at the Old Bailey. It is impossible for them to foresee when their cases will come on, or make any discrimination so as to refuse one case and accept another. The result is that briefs are handed over from one counsel to another, just as it suits the convenience of counsel, and the conflicting sittings of the courts; and persons who retain counsel are deprived of the advice they have a right to reckon upon. It amounts in some cases to great injustice to prisoners,—an injustice however which is often inevitable as far as counsel are concerned. At the very last sessions Mr. Justice Cresswell was complaining loudly—the counsel for the prosecution was taken away in the middle of the case, and the result was that in a complicated case public justice was as nearly as possible defeated. I do not see myself any objection to concentrating the whole jurisdiction in one court. Why the assistant judge of the court at Westminster should not come and assist us I cannot see. There must be some increase of the judicial staff at the Old Bailey; but if that were done there is no reason why the court should not sit from week to week, and dispose of everything. You could then make arrangements for fixing a list of cases for trial upon particular days, and greatly diminish the expense of each. If in addition to that there were a modification of the grand jury law, though not an abolition of the grand jury, there would, in my opinion, be a great improvement effected.

6480. That appears to be Mr. Pulling's recommendation. In Question 1916 he is asked "The effect of that alteration of the law has been to take business from the Central "Criminal Court, and restore it to the Middlesex Quarter Sessions?" He says "Yes." "That "change is in your opinion in the wrong direction?—Yes. I would rather confine it to the "Central Criminal Court, increasing the staff and appointing assistant judges to that "court."—Precisely so. I very much agree in that recommendation. Our labour at present is considerable, though it is diminished from what it was when I was first appointed.

6481. Supposing the Lord Mayor and aldermen of the City of London were to be excused altogether from attendance at the Central Criminal Courts, the same objection would apply, and the same circumstances would occur about counsel not being able to attend, would not they, if the law continued with respect to the quarter sessions as it now is?—It would make no difference. There is one other suggestion which is worth consideration, I think; that is, whether it is worth while to keep up the quarter sessions of the City of London, at which, by the charter, it is necessary to have a quorum of four magistrates. I sit there as assessor to the Lord Mayor, and there must be three aldermen present besides the recorder. We try very trivial cases; we call together a great many gentlemen as jurymen and grand jurymen, for very little purpose, and I see no reason why that jurisdiction should not be transferred to the Central Criminal Court. With respect to the Lord Mayor's Court, my opinion is, that if we were assisted by the authority of Parliament in making a few alterations, that court is capable of being made of great value to the inhabitants of the metropolis. It has all the powers of the superior courts, with some exceptions. It has the same jurisdiction as the superior courts; it is free from all the objection which has been made to the extreme intricacy and nicety of pleading which has of late years caused complaints, and it is a cheap court at the present time, in which a great number of cases might be disposed of.

6482. The Lord Mayor's court consists of the recorder trying with a jury?—Yes; but the court being a customary court, of course, though we have power like other courts to alter our practice, we cannot alter the customary proceedings; therefore, within the corporation itself, unless it were under the charter of Edward III., which gives us the power of altering something in the corporation, provided the alteration be for the benefit of the public, we have no power of altering the proceedings in that court. Our power under that charter is so doubtful that we should hardly venture in so grave a matter to proceed upon it. With the assistance of the deputy-registrar, who is a barrister and a very valuable officer, and thoroughly acquainted with the business of the court, I have done my best to introduce all the improvements which were possible without the assistance of Parliament. Originally, and by custom, there were four common pleaders. You have had some evidence to the manner in which their exclusive privileges have ceased; but I am happy to say, by a late arrangement with the only two remaining common pleaders who had any claim, and in which they behaved with great liberality, all difficulty upon that subject has been removed, and the court is now open to all counsel. If the Commissioners wish it, I can give them a detail of the mode in which the exclusive rights of the common pleaders have been disposed of; but perhaps I should only be detaining them unnecessarily. One great difficulty we have had in the Lord Mayor's Court has been from the customary existence of an exclusive practice in four attorneys whose interests are vested, and valuable interests, and therefore of course must be fairly considered. There were four of those attorneys in the year 1837 who held their offices by purchase, with the right of alienation; their names were Williams, Remmell, Carter, and Ashley. In the year 1841 Mr. Williams died, having made a defective alienation. The City solicitor, upon that, was elected to fill that vacancy, without any right to alienation or any right to compensation, in order that the privilege should be abolished, the object being merely to fill the vacancy so that the corporation might deal with it as they pleased. In 1848, Mr. Carter died; his alienation was also disputed as not being perfect. The consequence was a compromise; the alienee consented to surrender his title on condition of being appointed without any right of compensation or alienation in future. There are therefore two of those gentlemen who have no such rights. In 1850, the third attorney, Mr. Remmell, sold his right of alienation to the corporation; they bought it up; he still has the exclusive right for his life, but his right of alienation has been sold to the corporation. There is now therefore Mr. Pearson, who was elected to fill the office for a time; Mr. Orton, appointed under the agreement I have mentioned in the year 1848; Mr. Remmell, who has only a life-interest in the exclusive practice; and Mr. Ashley, who has the exclusive practice for his life, and the right of alienation. I have by me what may be called the pedigrees of those offices, and the title traced through the different persons of whom they have been purchased from time to time, showing that in the olden times those offices were regularly sold. It has been a great object with the corporation, and since I have had the honour of holding office I have endeavoured to press it on, to come to some arrangement with those gentlemen for throwing the practice open to the general profession. Negociations were conducted upon that subject by a committee, called the secondaries committee, and we were in hopes at one time that we could have agreed with those gentlemen to the amount they should receive to compensate them for the surrender of all their exclusive rights. I was myself consulted by that committee. On the other hand, I must do the attorneys the justice to say that they have always expressed, though not to myself, their willingness to submit to reference, or to almost any arrangement which I thought was right. But unfortunately the committee and the attorneys have not been able to come to an arrangement for reference or otherwise. The committee called upon the attorneys to make a claim. Naturally they made a claim, which they desired should not be too low, and probably more than they would have been willing to accept; the result has been, that the committee refusing to make any offer, the attorneys made a claim for the amount, which was submitted to me, and I was obliged to say that I thought it was extravagant. In the meantime, an Act of Parliament had passed admitting all attorneys to practice in the inferior courts. In a case which was argued in the Queen's Bench, of which one of the Commissioners is cognizant, it was decided that that Act applied to the Mayor's Court. Whether it was an inferior court or not, speaking generally, it was held to be an inferior court within the meaning of that Act. The negotiations I have referred to having failed, and seeing the delay which must very likely occur, I advised the Court of Aldermen, who had the power to do so, to act upon that judgment, and to throw the court open to all practitioners, the committee at the same time saying that at the end of the year they would again consider the compensation to the attorneys, and that when they could ascertain what their losses were likely to be, they would give them a liberal compensation.

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

6483. Has the court been actually thrown open?—It is actually thrown open to all attorneys, and in the next month the year will have expired, when the committee is pledged to come to a consideration of the question of compensation. Unhappily there has been a misunderstanding between the attorneys and the committee, and the attorneys were induced to take a step, which I think has been very unfortunate, both for themselves and for every one else. Mr. Remmell has brought an action against one of the attorneys admitted under the authority of the judgment of the Queen's Bench, for a disturbance in his office. There have been 131 attorneys admitted, and had it not been for that action, I have reason to know that a great many more would have been placed upon the roll formed for the conduct of the court. The action has been tried before Lord Campbell. His lordship expressed an opinion that the corporation ought not to open the court without giving compensation to those attorneys. The present state of that cause is this: they have agreed upon a case which is to be argued, in which the custom is found for an exclusive practice of the four attorneys; but raising a question again upon the construction of the statute admitting attorneys generally to practice in the inferior courts. That is coming before the Queen's Bench. Lord Campbell intimated, at the trial, that if it came before that court they should adhere to their former opinion, and the result will be that it will probably go at once to the Court of Appeal in the Exchequer Chamber. The consequence of all this has been very injurious to the court, and it may turn out to be injurious to the attorneys themselves. I hope not; but there is no doubt that many more attorneys would have been admitted, and the business of the court would have increased much more rapidly, had not it been for that litigation which makes foreign attorneys afraid lest they should expose themselves to a similar action.

6484. Is there any question respecting the power of the corporation to admit all attorneys, provided they compensate those who have existing rights?—Yes; there might be doubts about that power, but there would be no one else interested in disputing that power. The only question before the Court of Queen's Bench is, whether the Act of Parliament which enables all attorneys to practice in every inferior court applies to the Mayor's Court of London. If it does, not only the Court of Aldermen have the power, but they are bound by the general law to admit those persons; and acting upon that, we have made a roll in that court, and no less than 131 foreign attorneys have been admitted, and I have reason to believe that the number would have been 231 but for this unfortunate litigation. This very day, when I leave this Commission, I shall attend that committee again to urge the settlement of this negociation with the attorneys, so as to remove the existing difficulty in carrying on business there. I am bound to add that I have received every assistance from the Court of Aldermen and from the committee in making this change, and throwing the court open. The result of this change has been that even under the disadvantage of this pending litigation the business has largely increased. The entries of actions, from 1846 to 1852, were upon the average 903 per annum. Since the opening of the court only eleven months have expired, and no less than 1,506 entries have been made in the course of that time, showing that when the return for the other month is added it will probably come up to something very nearly double the number of entries recorded before. I have told the Commissioners already that I hold this court once a month; in one instance, since the change, I have been obliged to adjourn the court to a second day, and though the number is still not very great, the causes tried before me have about doubled also.

6485. Is the jurisdiction limited to causes of action arising within the City?—The jurisdiction is confined to causes of action arising within the City; that, in some cases, is inconvenient. Besides opening the court with the assistance of the deputy registrar, I have revised the costs of the court and the costs of the attorneys, and they have been greatly improved and reduced. The court therefore has become a cheap court; it is as cheap, I believe, as the County Courts. Besides that, acting upon the principle that I have power to regulate the practice of the court, I have made a number of rules going as far as I could in amendment of the practice, though not venturing to go into what I thought touched upon the constitution of the court, and the customary proceedings of the court. The consequence is that delays and surprises have been prevented, by which parties have been relieved, and the proceedings of the court rendered more satisfactory in that respect.

6486. The principal peculiar custom of the court is that of foreign attachment, is it not?—Yes; foreign attachment is a custom which is peculiar to the City of London and one or two other cities. In the City of London it is of great importance one way or the other; opinions are divided upon it. Some think it is a useless or mischievous custom, while others attach great value to it. That it is of importance is manifest from the fact that, upon the average of several years taken not long ago, the sums annually claimed in attachment amounted to 171,000*l*. A very small proportion of those come to trial. In the majority of cases the attachment has its effect of securing the payment of the debt, and certainly my experience leads to the belief that it is a valuable custom. I have seen very large sums recovered in many cases where not a shilling would have been recovered under any ordinary process.

6487. Do you think it would be a useful thing to introduce the custom universally, or do you think there is something in the peculiar circumstances of London which renders it peculiarly important there?—My opinion is that it would be a very valuable custom to extend to all great commercial communities. I do not think it is of much consequence in country districts, but in commercial towns I believe it is of importance. It exists, though under another name, throughout Scotland, under the name of "arrestment," and is, I believe, considered a very valuable remedy in commercial transactions; certainly in my experience large sums have been recovered by it which never could have been recovered otherwise.

6488. Could it produce any injurious consequences in country districts?—I know of none.

6489. There seems to be no reason why it should be a good custom in Lombard-street, and not a good custom in the Strand?—I cannot see any distinction, and I think that is the mode in which it should be dealt with. It was originally, perhaps, more applicable to London than to other places.

6490. Still there is nothing at present which remarkably distinguishes the City of London from other parts of the metropolis with reference to that custom?—I am not aware that there is, with this exception, that within the City there are more bankers. One principal use of the custom has been to attach balances in the bankers' hands. When a debtor leaves the country to travel, or because circumstances make it convenient for him to live out of the jurisdiction, then if he has a balance in his banker's hands, and his creditor finds that out, the creditor waylays Mr. Cox, for instance, the army agent, or some banker of that sort, as he comes into the City; he serves an attachment upon him, and gets his debt paid though the debtor may be in the East Indies or in America. It is complained of in some cases that there is a struggle between the creditors to get the debtor's property. If it be in contemplation of bankruptcy, of course the Bankruptcy Act will set aside the attachment if made within a certain time; but there may be cases in which there is a struggle between the creditors to obtain possession of the property. In that case, however, the law generally favours those who are vigilant and diligent, rather than those who sleep upon their rights, and I do not see much harm in such an advantage to the most active. There are certain objections to this custom as it is at present administered, which I think deserve great consideration. At present we are liable to a certiorari from the superior courts at any moment. That is the case, I am sorry to say, both with actions, suits in equity, and attachments; we are liable to a habeas corpus in actions, to a certiorari in attachments, and to a writ, in the nature of a certiorari out of Chancery, in cases of equity. It may be done at the last moment, so that I may have a case set down for trial, all the parties may be prepared, the briefs delivered, and every expense incurred, and it may be removed at once and without notice. Some limit upon that right would in all probability be very desirable. There is a difficulty about the attachment of goods. As the custom at present exists, goods which are perishable may be sold at once though under attachment; security is given, and the creditor is therefore secured in his debt. If the goods are not perishable the garnishee is not at liberty to sell; if he does sell, there is then a return of elongavit; that is, that the garnishee has removed or eloigned the goods out of the City; then the only process for ascertaining what the plaintiff is entitled to is by summoning another jury, to ascertain the value of that which the garnishee has sold, and which amount he is then bound to hand over. That is a very circuitous and inconvenient mode.

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

24th Jan. 1854.

6491. Goods may be always released by putting in bail, may they not?—The attachment may be dissolved by the defendant putting in bail, because the whole proceeding purports to be for the purpose of compelling appearance. The fiction is that the defendant being summoned, and not answering after four proclamations, the attachment issues. Therefore if he does appear, and puts in substantial bail, the attachment is dissolved, and then if the plaintiff succeeds he recovers against the defendant, and his debt is secured by the bail put in in dissolution.

6492. Is bail put in to the full amount of the sum sworn to in the action, or to the value of the attachment of the goods?—At present it is to double the value in goods as well as in money. The plaintiff swears to his debt or to the value of the goods, and till lately, the defendant could only come in to defend the action, in the first instance, upon putting in bail for double the sworn value either of the debt or of the goods. That has been very much complained of. It has attracted the attention of the deputy registrar and myself, and we have done as much as we think we can with our present power to remedy it, and I believe we have remedied it to a great extent. In the first place we have given power to the defendant to come in upon paying into court the amount sworn to by the plaintiff. The new rule which we have established is this:—"An attachment may be dissolved by bail, or by payment of money into court with the defendant's consent, when the sum in the garnisher's hands is larger than the debt sworn to by the plaintiff, by paying the amount of the plaintiff's debt so sworn to, or when the money in the garnisher's hands is less than the amount sworn to as the plaintiff's debt, then such sum as the court may direct." Of course the court would not direct any larger sum to be paid in than that which appeared to be in the garnisher's hands.

6493. Is that consistent with the custom?—I have considered that question, and I hope it is so. By this rule they may either give bail as they used to do, or pay into court either the whole amount claimed, if there is sufficient in the garnisher's hands, or such amount as the court may authorize, if the amount in the garnisher's hands is less than that which is sworn to by the plaintiff. I believe we have kept within bounds, but if that is doubtful, I only hope the Commissioners will recommend the legislature to give us some assistance to carry out that improvement. It has been suggested in a high professional quarter that it is a hardship upon the defendant not to be allowed to come in without giving bail to double the amount, and that the remedy ought to be to give the defendant power to come in on filing common bail, the attachment standing as security for the future. That we have considered very fully, and, upon the whole, we thought there were objections to it. In the first place, supposing the amount in the garnishee's hands to be less than the whole debt, and there is money belonging to the debtor in the hands of other garnishees, and therefore there are more attachments than one, the consequence would be that the defendant would be able to put the plaintiff to the expense of proving his debt in every attachment over and over again. That in itself would be a mischief. What we have done to meet the objection is this:—we have given power (and here again the same question, perhaps, might arise) to the defendant to appear within a year and a day upon filing common bail after judgment in attachment. That is, if the plaintiff succeeds against the garnishee, and ascertains that there is money of his debtor in the garnishee's hands subject to attachment, then, within a year and a day, the defendant is to come in by scire facias ad disprobandum debitum, as it is called. He may come in upon filing common bail, and therefore will be subject to no difficulty of that kind. The result is that the money having been attached in the hands of the garnishee is paid over to the officer of the court, security is given for it, and there it lies in his hands as a stake held for either the plaintiff or the defendant, according to the issue of the trial.

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

6494. If the attachment merely stood as a security, the defendant putting in common bail, would not that put the plaintiff in peril of the possible insolvency of the garnishee, whereas if the plaintiff were obliged to put in bail or the garnishee were obliged to bring into court the amount of the property attached, there would be greater security to the plaintiff?—Precisely so, and very likely the plaintiff might be put in some cases to the expense and trouble of two fruitless trials. He will first have to try with the defendant, and if he succeeds, to try with the garnishee, and perhaps fail after all, whereas by trying the question first with the garnishee, he ascertain whether there is anything worth suing for.

6495. Does it appear to you that the introduction of a greater number of attorneys to practice in the Lord Mayor's Court, who probably may not be acquainted with proceedings under foreign attachment and the custom of the City, and who are not under the control of the corporation, as the four attorneys in some measure were, may lead to collusions and frauds and difficulties?—I think that is possible, unless some greater authority is given by Parliament to me to prevent it. There is one other point upon this subject which is of very great importance if foreign attachment is to be retained. At present by the custom there are no costs in foreign attachment. The court has no power to order costs either to the plaintiff, or to the defendant, or to the garnishee. Upon the garnishee, no doubt, it sometimes tells very hardly; it does not follow that in all cases the garnishee should have costs, but there should be some discretion in the court to give costs where it thinks right; where the garnishee deals with the money improperly, or makes a vexatious defence, the court would not give him his costs, but where he is a mere stake-holder, and only holds the money and deals with it as he ought to do, there might be advantageously a power to give him costs out of the fund. Another imperfection in the proceedings of the court, both in actions and in attachment is, that there is no appeal; there is a very imperfect process of error, but there is no appeal, though perhaps when it is stated, as it has been stated, that the recorder is obliged to pick up the facts at the trial, and to decide the matter as well as he can, even in the most complicated questions on the instant, that perhaps is not quite correct, but something very much like it is the case; there is no difficulty in getting the consent of the counsel to state a case, and a case is sometimes stated and argued before me deliberately, and we take time to consider it, but generally speaking, there is no regular mode of appeal, and I apprehend that such a case can be stated only with the consent of the parties; there is ordinarily no means of remedy. In the case of "fraud" or "surprise," there may be a new trial moved, but still it is before me, and only in those cases. According to the custom of the court there can be no new trial except in those cases. It appears to me if the court is to be maintained it would be very useful that a power should be given to remove a cause for the purpose of moving for a new trial in one of the superior courts, perhaps the Court of Common Pleas, which at this moment is the least burdened with business, and the power should be then given of moving for a new trial or arguing special cases so as to give a supervision to the superior courts over the City court. If, however, there were a jealousy as regards the City customs, and as regards questions arising within the corporation itself, it would be a great improvement if power were given to move for a new trial before the recorder, giving power to the recorder in those cases to call upon the common serjeant and the judge of the sheriff's court to come and assist him in hearing them argued.

6496. You would have a motion for a new trial made before the recorder in all cases in which a motion for a new trial can be made in the courts at Westminster?—Yes; a right for moving for a new trial in all cases, but not before the recorder alone; either in the superior courts of Westminster, or in the cases I have adverted to, before the recorder, the common serjeant or the judge of the Sheriff's Court. There is, as I say, a process of error, but it is a very cumbrous and a very undesirable one. The course of that at present is this. It is called error to the Court of St. Martin's le Grand. That originated, I believe, in the fact that there was, where the post-office now stands, a portion of neutral ground, which was neither London nor Westminster, and which was a place therefore adapted for the purpose, to which the Queen's justices used to come; the process is a petition to the Chancellor, upon which a commission is issued out of chancery to the justices of Westminster Hall. In the last case that was argued in the year 1849, Mr. Justice Patteson was one of the judges. I find his name in the commission out of chancery. Then there issues a writ from the chancellor to the Mayor and aldermen to bring up the record to the court at St. Martin's le Grand. A precept issues from the justices at Westminster Hall, to the Mayor and aldermen to attend. The argument properly takes place at Guildhall, but for convenience it is usually adjourned to Serjeant's Inn. The writ is then proceeded on as in case of an ordinary writ of error, and in that way it is disposed of, but that appears to be a cumbrous and inconvenient course, and might with great advantage be altered. Then with regard to the jurisdiction of the court, I think it would be desirable to limit the power of removing causes to causes above 50*l.*, which is the limit in the County Court Act. At present any small cause may be removed at a moment's notice to the superior courts by a certiorari or habeas corpus.

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

6497. Is it a matter of course that a certiorari issues?—It is, I understand, practically so; but there might be some discretion exercised upon that subject, because a certiorari is not a writ of right like a habeas corpus, but in practice it issues as a matter of course. It issues out of the common law courts in cases of actions, and out of chancery in cases of suits in equity. The Commission is aware that this court has, besides its law jurisdiction, a perfect equity jurisdiction in matters arising within the City concurrent with the equity jurisdiction of the highest courts.

6498. Is that equity jurisdiction often exercised?—There are not above five or six equity suits in a year. None of these suits have come to argument before me, and in practice I believe they are almost confined to bills of discovery, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is money in the hands of garnishees.

6499. Is there any appeal in such cases?—No; there is no appeal—at least, there is no instance of it. I should suggest, therefore, that if anything is done by Parliament upon that subject, they should provide against causes under 50*l.* being removed. If the court is maintained, some regulation also might be provided for preventing suits in equity being removed, at all events, in small cases. There may be money attached in London, and if the defendant comes in after the verdict in the attachment, and it turns out that the contract upon which the debt arises took place out of the City, the whole of the proceedings are set aside. I do not see the use of that. The question is, whether he has money in the City; and if he has money in the City, if the attachment ought to prevail at all, it ought to prevail in all cases where money is found in the City, irrespective of where the contract takes place upon which the debt arises. There is another matter, which is, that the court, if it is to continue, requires additional power of amendment. Though under the provision which one of the Commissioners has adverted to, perhaps the Process Act might be extended to the Mayor's Court upon an application to the Privy Council. We have now a very limited power of amendment, and that may lead to some mischievous consequences. There are some other customs in the City of London, to which I will for a moment advert. One is as to distribution. On a freeman dying, half his property goes to the widow if there are no children, and one third to the widow if there are children. Under the statute of distributions, the widow has but one third in all cases. That sometimes leads to great difficulty and doubt; and I cannot myself see any reason for maintaining that distinction. I never heard of any value that was attached to it. It exists, but for my part, I do not see any benefit in it. There is another custom, which I think is of value, which is the custom that enables a femme covert to be a sole trader, 6500. Is that often enforced?—I believe it is often. She cannot make a bill of exchange, nor can she bind herself by bond; the reason applying to the bill of exchange being, in all probability, that the bill of exchange is of modern origin, and therefore the custom could hardly apply to that.

6501. Is the custom confined to the retail trade?—No, I imagine not. There is another custom, which is of some value—that all shops within the City are market overt. In the case of the sale of stolen property, for instance, the party who buys is protected, except in cases in which he is liable under the provision of statutes, which make it necessary to surrender property under some circumstances. There is also a customary law of apprentices, which, as the Commissioners have heard, is administered by the chamberlain, cases under which have sometimes come to the Mayor's Court. With respect to the position in which the deputy registrar is placed, he is a barrister. Since the fire at the Royal Exchange, when the records of this court were, to a great extent, destroyed, he has been the principal depository of the practice of the court, and is no doubt a valuable officer. He is, in fact, only the deputy of the town clerk, who is now the registrar. It has always been in contemplation to revise and remodel that office, and pay the town clerk by salary; and I have lately been urging the Secondaries committee, which has the control of this question, to alter that; to take the nominal registrarship from the town clerk, which he is quite willing to surrender upon the most liberal and handsome terms, and to make the deputy registrar the principal registrar, appointing some person in the office his deputy,—not for the purpose of doing the work for him, but because it is absolutely necessary that he should be there to take the oath. Affidavits cannot be sworn, except in the presence of the registrar or the deputy registrar. It has been suggested to make Mr. Brandon the registrar, giving him a deputy who should be his clerk in the office, the business now being quite sufficient for that, the fees in the court being ample and sufficient to provide each with a salary of about the same amount as the clerks of the county courts have, and persons of that description. That has been suggested; I hope it may be carried out. But if it is not, I think the Commissioners will see that it is a step which is desirable, if this court is to be maintained. My own opinion is that which I ventured to express at the outset, that with certain regulations and amendments, this court is one to which the citizens have been in the habit of resorting, and which they value as a court regularly sitting every month within their own limits, whose proceedings are less expensive and cumbrous than those of the superior courts of Westminster.

6502. Complaint has been made to the Commissioners of the practice in the court at the Old Bailey, of fees being taken from the public for admittance, the amount of which varies according to the interest of the trial. The consequence is, that when there is a trial which excites public interest very much, the amount of the fees is very large. Has that practice been brought to your attention?—It was brought to my attention in this way:—I was sitting in the court one day, when there was a great noise in the gallery. I inquired what the meaning of it was. I saw that the police were pushing a woman out of the gallery. I asked them what they were doing; they told me she had not paid her shilling. Upon that I made inquiry, and found that they did not admit any person into the gallery, except upon payment of 1*s.* I confess I was surprised, and I may say indignant. I desired them immediately to let any person of decent and respectable appearance into the gallery, particularly where he or she was a friend of the prisoner. I found, however, that I was exceeding my power, and that the matter was not within my control; that, in point of fact, the court was under the control of the sheriffs, which, strictly speaking, I knew to be the case; and not only so, but according to regulations of long standing, a fee was taken for admission to all the galleries of the court, and that had for a great length of time been divided between the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, and some one else—in point of fact, however, going to the under sheriffs. Mr. Sheriff Wire, I believe, who will be here, will be able to give you full information upon that subject. I think the fee is very objectionable in that form; the excuse for it, I understand, is, that it is absolutely necessary to have some police regulations in those galleries, otherwise they would be filled by none but the companions of prisoners, and great annoyance and inconvenience arise.

6503. Does not it seem to you still more objectionable that the fee should not be a fixed one, but should vary according to the interest that the trial may excite among the public?—It is alleged that the authorized fee is a fixed fee; whether the officers themselves extort more upon interesting occasions, I do not know. I apprehend there would be a reprimand for it if it were brought to the notice of the authorities. It is, however, objectionable, and more especially so, so long as we are confined to our present miserable court; for there is in the rest of the court no room for the public at all. Though nominally open to the public, the space which has necessarily to be kept for those concerned in the administration of justice is so limited, that there is, in point of fact, no room for the public.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

DANIEL WHITTLE HARVEY, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

6504. What situation do you hold in connexion with the corporation?—I am the Commissioner of Police, appointed under the Act of 1839, and have continued so from that period.

6505. What is the emolument attached to your office?—The salary by the Act of Parliament is not to be less than 800*l.* a year. Shortly before my election, the corporation determined that the commissioner should be furnished with a suitable residence in addition to his salary, and for four years subsequent to my appointment I was allowed 200*l.* a year in lieu of a house till one was found. At that period I allude to, four years subsequent to my appointment, a house was found, which is anything but what was contemplated; it is not a suitable residence. In 1846, the working of the City police was made the subject of inquiry by the Court of Aldermen, and also by a committee of the Court of Common Council, by each of whom I was requested to state the nature of my duties. Those duties were stated, and a minute examination into the operation of the system was made. The Court of Aldermen came to an unanimous resolution, based upon their entire approbation of the management of the police, that the salary of the commissioner ought to be 1,200*l.* a year, the increase to take place from the month of June previous. As the amount of salary rests with the common council, that opinion was certified to the police committee, and the police committee, after having gone into the working of the police very minutely, came to the unanimous and very gratifying resolution, which I have here, as to the manner in which the police was conducted, and expressed the opinion that the salary ought to be 1,000*l.* a year; and inasmuch as the house which had been provided did not correspond with the original intention, the commissioner should be allowed 200*l.* a year in lieu of a house; and looking to the extreme inconvenience and danger to his health of a permanent residence in the City, that he should be allowed to reside within six miles of St. Paul's. The 1,000*l.* a year was granted to be paid from that period, but the 1,200*l.* a year has never been paid, and is still due, nor has any provision been made for a house.

6506. Those are the whole of the emoluments attached to the office?—Yes, they are.

6507. Which is the clause of the Act which fixes the salary?—The third clause.

6508. Will you be so good as to state to us, generally, what are the duties which you perform?—Every candidate for admission into the force is strictly interrogated, and his qualifications tested by me, and, at the same time, his testimonials are narrowly inspected. Since my appointment I have so tested and dealt with upwardsof 4,100 men. No constable leaves the force, the cause of which is not invested and decided upon by myself. The examinations upon these occasions are frequently long, often adjourned, and sometimes of a most painful character. A monthly report is made by me to the Lord Mayor of the names of the men dismissed the force, with the cause of their dismissal, and though several hundred men have been dismissed, my decision has in no one instance been challenged. All the complaints against the police, or misunderstandings amongst its members, are investigated and decided by me. Every letter addressed to the chief office, or to the officers of divisions, is immediately brought under my notice, and the answer, when one is required, is suggested, and when of leading importance, is dictated by me. Conferences with deputations and with inhabitants are held with the commissioner almost daily upon matters of pressing interest; upon an average not fewer than 100 persons attend at the chief office daily upon police business. Each occurrence sheet from the several divisions is carefully read daily by the commissioner, and the necessary orders given in reference thereto. The superintendent, the inspector of reserve, and the inspectors of divisions, are in attendance every morning, that they may see the commissioner upon any subject requiring explanation or directions. The commissioner holds himself responsible for the good government of the several station-houses, and to this end visits them when desirable, issues orders, hears and determines all disputes, as well as adjudicates complaints made against, or claims made upon, the constables. The commissioner examines and signs every summons issued at the instance of the police; such summonses exceed 2,200 yearly. The commissioner almost daily visit different parts of the City to satisfy himself of the attendance and attention of the constables. The commissioner settles the return of the police statistics, and reports the same to the corporation, with such observations and suggestions as appear to merit attention. The position of the commissioner is one of continued and uninterrupted responsibility, incapable of being shared, and only under express authority capable of being deputed. The undivided responsibility is peculiar to the commissioner's office. In the metropolitan there is co-ordinate authority given to three commissioners.

6509. You have stated in the last particular you have read, a difference existing between your situation and that of the metropolitan commissioners of police; is there any other point of importance in which your situation differs from that of the metropolitan commissioners of police?—The men who are made constables in the metropolitan district are appointed by the Home Office; that is, so far as the Act of Parliament declares they shall be so. I dare say in effect they are for the most part appointed by the commissioners, but in the City the appointment is wholly with the commissioner, as is their discharge. He is amenable to no one, either in the one case or in the other.

6510. Is there any Police committee in the City which superintends the control of your actions?—Not of my office. Under the City Police Act the common council has the power to appoint a committee, and to depute to that committee, if it thinks fit, all its functions, so that whatever the Court of Common Council can do that committee can do, but what they can do relates to what may be considered the civil branch of the police, such as raising the finances and attending to the complaints of persons who may object to the rate, and all that applies to the financial branch. So far as concerns the working of the police in the appointment of men, and in dealing with them, and in making rules and orders and regulations, that is entirely confined to the commissioner; but so far as his power to make rules and regulations goes, they can only have effect when sanctioned by the secretary of state and by the Court of Aldermen. In the early stage of my appointment I made such rules and regulations, and here they are (producing the same). They have remained the rules and regulations from that time.

6511. I believe the rate of pay of the constables in the City has been raised, has it not?—Yes, since the first of January.

6512. Was that done by yourself, or was it necessary to resort to some other authority to sanction that step?—The application of the men for an increase of pay was made to myself; that was transmitted by me to the Court of Aldermen; it became a question whether it belonged to the Court of Aldermen or to the Police committee, one or both, to entertain and deal with that application. It was eventually dealt with, and a scale of increased pay, based upon my own recommendation, was sanctioned by the committee.

6513. That scale is considerably higher, is it not, than the scale of pay of the metropolitan police generally?—Yes, it is.

6514. Did you communicate at all with the authorities who superintend the metropolitan police before you made that increase?—No, we acted perfectly independently in that respect. I should say that circumstances might, and did, I believe, exist in the City, calling for an increase of pay which would not apply to the metropolitan commission. The class of men who are requisite in the City are in many respects, if I may use the term without being invidious, superior in their qualifications, certainly of body, inasmuch as we admit no man into the City police who is not five feet eight inches in height; the metropolitan commission admits them at five feet seven. That arises from the nature of their duties. We require strength, and we require appearance; for the nature of their occupation, especially along the thoroughfares of the City, Temple Bar to Cornhill, is one of such incessant exertion that men of muscular power as well as of great discretion are indispensable. The consequence is, that to obtain such men it becomes necessary to allure them by greater pay. Last year we lost between seventy and eighty of our best men, who went to Australia, or into situations by which their circumstances were improved. By advancing the pay of the men we are increasing our strength, but even at the present time the force is not up to the number requisite.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6515. Was no previous communication made to the metropolitan authorities when the City police was thus increased?—Not that I am aware of.

6516. Did not you think it desirable that there should be a previous communication made, with a view to enable the metropolitan authorities to consider whether any change should be made in the pay of their men or not?—I should have considered it undesirable in that case, because I should not appeal to the metropolitan commissioners to elicit their judgment upon any subject without being prepared to a considerable extent to adopt it. Now, no train of reasoning based upon their own policy could have altered my judgment, because my judgment was based upon necessity. If I had asked the commissioners of metropolitan police, What do you think of our increasing the pay of the men, so as to have no man at less than 20*s.* a week? it might have suggested itself to their minds: If you do this, it may be an undesirable example in our force. I should not have attended to that, because my duty is to protect the City, and I cannot allow seventy or eighty of my beats, each of which the inhabitants have a right to expect is filled up, to be vacant because it does not happen to correspond with the notion of the commissioners at the west end of the town.

6517. Do not you think, as a matter of public policy, it is of importance that the police of the metropolis generally should be looked upon as a whole in some respects?—That opens quite another question.

6518. Do not you think the authorities of the City, taking an independent course on such a matter as raising the pay of the policemen without consultation or even communication with the other authorities, might have a tendency to create discontent among those employed in the rest of the metropolis?—I cannot, of course, speak for the Court of Aldermen or the Police committee, but I should have deemed it, as commissioner of the City, much more important to conciliate my force than to consider how it might operate upon others; mine is a very exclusive responsibility.

6519. You feel bound to look to the City, and the City only, without much considering what effect your measures may have beyond the limits of the City?—I should have no objection if it had the effect of raising their pay; indeed I should have been pleased if it had that effect.

6520. Even supposing that is so, and supposing it would have been right to have made some addition to the rate of pay all over the metropolis, do not you think it would have been better that that should have been the effect of previous consultation among all the authorities entrusted with the care of the police, rather than that it should seem to be forced upon one part of the police by a step taken independently of them by another?—With every disposition to harmonious working, and I have never known an occasion on which there has been a clashing of interest between the two authorities individually, I certainly should not, in a case in which my conviction was so decided, have thought of putting my judgment to the hazard of an opinion which it might have been considered disrespectful to disregard.

6521. Have you met with any difficulty in the course of your official duties in your communications with the heads of the metropolitan police, or have your relations always been amicable?—Always amicable; I have never known an instance to the contrary; the instances have not been frequent when an appeal has been requisite; the most prominent was on the occasion of what were called the Chartist riots, when the forces were brought in contact, and when the best understanding was most important. So again in the case of the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington, we had interviews together, and nothing could be more harmonious than our views upon the subject.

6522. What is the extent of your jurisdiction?—I consider about a mile and a half in one direction, and a mile in another.

6523. It extends over the City proper?—Yes.

6524. Not over the river?—No.

25. Are the houses adjoining the river protected?—I am about to notice the evidence given before the Commission on that subject, seeing that Mr. Saward has said, what I did not suppose any human being could say, that a letter was written to my office, and no attention paid to it, because I can say with great truth that no letter remains unanswered 24 hours at my office. I thought fit to inquire into it. The reason Mr. Saward had no formal letter was, that I directed the inspector of that division to call upon him. He did so, and saw him. The gentlemen who were similarly circumstanced were also seen, and it was clearly shown to them that the property on which Mr. Saward required our assistance was private property. The Chatham-place has a yard behind it, extending the whole length of it; it is approached at the City, and by gates, which are closed every night as much as the private door of any house, and at the bottom there is a wharf. I do not see why the parties interested in it should not put up such a barricade there as would at all events impede intrusion, instead of leaving it open, as they do. Whatever course they may pursue, however, in that respect, we have nothing to do with it. I observe, Mr. Saward says he saw the commissioners of the metropolitan district, and by whom he was told that it did not belong to them. I hope I shall not be considered as pointing out any course which implies neglect in other directions; all I have to do is to defend the City. In the 5th section of the Metropolitan Police Act is this clause, "And "be it enacted, that the constables belonging to the Metropolitan police force shall have "all the powers and privileges of a constable in the counties of Berkshire and Bucking- "hamshire, and upon the River Thames, within or adjoining to the several counties of "Middlesex, Surrey, Berkshire, Essex, and Kent, and within or adjoining to the City of "London and the liberties thereof, and in and on the several creeks, inlets and waters, "docks, wharfs, quays, and landing places;" therefore the whole of the Thames along the City, as well as without the City, is under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

6526. The complaint to us was, that that space of ground between high and low water mark on the bank of the Thames was not protected; that it was not protected by the City authorities because they said it did not belong to them; that it was not protected by the river police, which is under the metropolitan authorities, because they did not seem to regard it as belonging to them, and the result was that it was infested by bad characters. Do you believe that practically it is unprotected, and that it is infested by bad characters?—I called upon Mr. Saward yesterday, and went over the locality, so as to be able to speak to it more correctly. Of course when a gentleman has his house broken into, and he loses a few spoons, he makes it a very serious affair; but I said to Mr. Saward:—"The result of my experience for 15 years is this, that though your house has "been broken into, and you sympathize with your neighbour who has had his house "broken into, I will venture to say that all you and others have lost within 15 years "does not amount to what it would cost to keep a private watchman for a year, and it is "not a locality which would justify sending men to walk up and down the shore among "barges and timber lying there night after night."

6527. What is the fact with respect to watching the ground which is between high and low water mark within the City jurisdiction?—We do not interfere with it except in the neighbourhood, for instance, of Blackfriars Bridge; a vast number of children descend the steps there, who strip and get on to the barges, and throw themselves into the water. This is unseemly and sometimes dangerous, and therefore our men occasionally look after them from the bridge, and walk down the steps and interfere when they think it may be desirable to do so; but so far as watching the strand in the same way as we do the street, we do not undertake it, nor consider it our duty so to do.

6528. Does the metropolitan police consider it its duty to watch this strand?—I do not think their constables walk upon this ground; they are constantly moving up and down the river, and from their boats see what is going on, and instances do occur in which, when they see a depredation on a barge, or on this ground, they apprehend the parties, and if it is in the City jurisdiction they bring the offender to our station.

6529. Do you believe that they consider it as under their jurisdiction, and that they exercise whatever degree of vigilance they think necessary under the circumstances of the case?—I have no doubt they do believe it, and think it incumbent on them to do so.

6530. Do you believe that any difficulty arises, or any inconvenience to the public, from any doubt as to the jurisdiction under which that strand is placed in regard to the police?—I should say not; we have never had any correspondence on the subject, nor do I think if I were a metropolitan commissioner, I should feel it to be incumbent to have constables walking up and down the dry land when the tide retires.

6531. You think that is not necessary for the efficient protection of the ground?—Certainly not, particularly in connection with the river force. On the Surrey side there is the same class of property; I would not say positively that there are no constables there, but I do not believe they have any.

6532. You do not consider that strip of land as within your jurisdiction?—No.

6533. What is the construction of the clause with respect to quays and landing-places within the City; are they watched by you or by the metropolitan police?—Most of those landing-places are approached by ways which are private property; they come into Earl Street, and into streets next to the Thames; and at night their gates are closed, and we have no access to those places, so that when a robbery does occur, it arises from the parties being able to get out of boats, then to find their way along the shore, and from thence to scramble up by those private ways, and commit their depredations without any interference on our part.

6534. If any person complains that his house has been robbed, in consequence of a thief approaching it by means of the land which is left dry at low water within the City, your answer would be that that is a portion of land which is not within your jurisdiction, and you do not watch it?—That is what we should say. If the metropolitan commission were to direct their men to come upon the wharves and landing-places, we should not interdict them.

6535. The Thames police is a river police?—Yes.

6536. Do the metropolitan commissioners ever send their policemen within the City on the dry land?—Never.

6537. It would be necessary if they acted upon this clause, and watched the strand to send them into the City?—Yes.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6538. They are not in the habit of sending any persons out of their regular beats within the City?—No.

6539. You do not believe that any attention is necessary, either in the law or the practice, with regard to the efficient watching of the strand on the river side in the City?—I do not; I do not mean to say if the two forces were made one force, the operation in that respect might not yield some advantage.

6540. The Temple is within the City for police purposes, is not it?—It is.

6541. Does your police go into the Temple?—No; at the beginning they expressed a desire to have their own constables; they close their gates every night, and it is the same as a private house in fact.

6542. They pay the police rate, do not they?—Yes; in the day time depredations are sometimes committed there by persons going into the chambers, and they are then brought to our station; whenever they want the services of our men, they are at their service.

6543. Does the system adopted by the Temple, of watching their own premises, produce any saving in your expense?—If the Temple were to call upon the police authorities to supply them with protection, looking at the fact that they pay as other persons do, we should comply, and if we could not spare men from our existing force, we must increase our force. They would be entitled to protection if they chose to give a notice that they require it.

6544. Do you happen to know what the expense incurred by the Temple is for their own internal police?—I do not.

6545. Are there any other localities in the City of London in the same situation as the Temple in that respect?—No. Serjeant's Inn is in the City, and we watch it; St. Bartholomew's is partly in and partly out of the City; there is a small district there which is extra-parochial, and it is a very nice question to whom it belongs.

6546. Practically, have they a police of their own?—No.

6547. You watch them, do you?—We do. Of course inconveniences occasionally arise as to the boundaries of the City and the metropolitan district; for instance, in Charter House-square, which is in that neighbourhood, there was a robbery some time since, which was made the subject of investigation. The thieves entered from behind. The back part of the premises and the access to the premises was in the metropolitan district, the house itself was within the City. Between the two, perhaps the occupier of the house might consider that he was a sufferer, but I am not aware of any material practical difficulty arising from it.

6548. Supposing it to be right and expedient to keep up the exclusive jurisdiction of the police in the City, are there any alterations which you think it would be desirable to effect, with a view to ensure the better co-operation of the City police with the metropolitan police generally?—I am not aware of any arrangement which it is desirable to make, based upon the recognition of their continued separation. I should say, that though I think all the evidence that the Commissioners have had before them testifies to the efficiency of the City police, it is capable of being made more efficient, and it ought to be more so. The accommodation at our chief office is very defective when compared with the large sum which the corporation pay; it is not of the class which the inhabitants of the City are entitled to have for what they pay. The chief office and the residence of the commissioner are one and the same thing. One is a part of the other, and there is no access to either but through a narrow passage, in which there is only one entrance and one exit. The consequence is, that if there were any serious disturbance in the City (and it is not correct, when looking at the working of a police, to exclude the possibility of such an occurrence,) if we had 100 men or any other number which prudence might suggest as desirable at the chief office, and parties connected with the disturbance chose to come into the Old Jewry in the prosecution of their purpose, it would be a question who would master the other, and at what sacrifice, because we could not get out except by efforts which it is painful to contemplate: nor could the commissioner or his officers have any communication with the chief authorities at the Mansion-house, except by fighting their way through the impediment. It has always, therefore, appeared to me that the chief office ought to have a separate entrance and a separate exit.

6549. That is an objection which does not relate to the system in the City, but to the buildings which are provided there?—It does not apply to the system.

6550. You think that the head police station in the City ought to be better than it now is?—Yes. If any merchant, or banker, or a gentleman of position, comes there, the probability is, that he is shown into a room more or less occupied by a dozen constables and some dozen persons connected with individuals who have served their period of imprisonment, and who come to claim whatever chattels may belong to them.

6551. How is it compared with the offices of the police in other parts of the metropolis?—I can only speak of the chief office in Scotland-yard, and there, as every one knows, there is an access in front, and another for all purposes of numbers from behind.

6552. You think the office is not equally good in the City?—It is not only not equally good, but it is not fit for the purpose. In another respect also the system might be made more efficient, but at the same time it would be attended with more expense, still it is such a desirable increase of usefulness as to render the question of expense unimportant. I refer to the desirableness of connecting our detective power more directly with remote places of commercial importance. It is, in my mind, one of the strongest, and perhaps the only strong reason that suggests itself to me in favour of the union of the two forces, that there would be a detective power which would be almost irresistible in its utility. When it is asked whether it may not be desirable to unite the City force with the metropolitan force, I should ask another question, whether it is not desirable to unite the metropolitan force with the City. That is, it ought to be a London police, and not a City police, nor a metropolitan police, because I apprehend, if you were now for the first time creating a police, in which the City should have no exclusive pretension, nobody would dream of putting the head of the City police in Scotland-yard. All the great business of the police, except what belongs to little furtive affairs, arises in the City. What the metropolis wants is a real independent detective force, which shall be efficient for its objects, in all places.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6553. If there were one general metropolitan police established you think the heart and centre of the system should be in the City of London?—Decidedly.

6554. What do you think to have been the reason for placing the head office of the metropolitan police in Scotland-yard?—I should say at that time it was a Government police. The City was moving on in its own way, and perhaps it was hardly a question at the time whether its jurisdiction would be assailed or not. The metropolitan police was very much a political police; at all events a police connected with the Home Office.

6555. An office was chosen adjoining Whitehall, and near the principal offices of the Government?—Yes.

6556. Do not you think there might be some advantages, without considering the police in the light of a political police, in the heads of the metropolitan police having an easy access to the heads of the executive Government?—It would not be inconsistent with that plan, that the office in Whitehall should continue. I would say, without giving any opinion about its desirableness, it would be one of the most pernicious steps that could be taken, as it regards the interests of the City, to merge the City in the metropolitan police without very important reservations; to make the City police a part and parcel of the metropolitan police, to engraft Fleet-street upon the Strand, and Cheapside upon Whitechapel, and Bishopgate-street upon Shoreditch, making one continuous authority, without reference to the peculiarity of the City and its relations, I think, would be most destructive to the security of the City. I have here statistics, which perhaps may be useful in illustration of this question. First of all, it is said the City is only a mile and a half in area; I see Mr. Hickson says so, whereas the metropolitan area is 700 miles, that is, it is as 1 is to 500; our population is 125,000; the metropolitan population approaches to 2,000,000. The City police consists of 579 persons; the metropolitan police, as appears by their last return, consists of 5,492. The City police, supposing the force was full, cost last year 43,341*l.*, or 74*l.* 17*s.* 1¼*d.* per man; that includes the whole expense. The metropolitan police cost 391,825*l.*, or 71*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* per man, making the cost of the City police 3*l.* 10*s.* 2¼*d.* a man more than the metropolitan. The question of uniting the City with the metropolitan police was the subject of investigation before a Committee of the House of Commons; upon that occasion the metropolitan commissioners, while they gave many reasons why they considered it desirable that the force should be one, stated that they considered it would require only 300 men to guard the City; that was the number that they considered would be sufficient for the purpose. Now, experience has told us that it requires the number which I have given you, 579. It is insisted that the union of the two forces would make the whole, at least as far as the City is concerned, more efficient and less expensive; those are the words of Mr. Hickson, whose evidence is entitled to consideration, because we all know he has given attention to the subject. As regards the efficiency, if the union of the forces were based upon a recognition of the necessities of the City, namely, that we shall have our 579, and they shall not be diverted by any special circumstance, then I am ready to admit, apart from any corporate feeling, into which I do not at all enter, there would be advantages arising to the City, provided at the same time that not only shall the same number of men be constantly awarded to the City as experience has found to be necessary with a view to the protection of the persons and property within it, but that there shall also be in the City a co-equal authority with the metropolitan commissioners; because, to expect that the merchants and bankers and tradespeople of the City of London, whose active and intense application to business we all know, when they want any assistance from the police, or have to make any representation to them, shall go down to Whitehall Place, is as much as to say that they must be without a police. It is only by experience that that can be determined. We have, upon the average, upwards of 100 persons come every day on some business or other to the chief office, in connexion with the police, and they are not contented with seeing my superintendent; they inquire for the commissioner, and they wish to see me; so that, if I may use the expression, ours is a sort of paternal police, and parties constantly desire to see the chief authority. Therefore, I say, if there were a commissioner or some person of suitable power always to be found in the City, as at present, and there were a recognition of the claim of the City to be protected to the extent which experience tells us is the proper extent, I can see some advantages which would arise to the City, which they do not now possess and cannot possess. They are of this class. We have no man who has not his allotted duty, and the consequence is, if any occasion arises in which his services may be required elsewhere, he is diverted from that allotted duty, and to that extent the protection of the beat or section which may be assigned to him is enfeebled. Now, this not unfrequently arises; for instance, the sessions to which the recorder has alluded takes place monthly. We have to send not fewer than a dozen men to keep order in the court, and the approaches to the court. Then, again, there will not be fewer than from twenty-five to thirty constables with cases. On Monday, which is generally the day when the court opens, there are eighteen of our number diverted to Smithfield; if it is on Saturday, there will be not fewer than thirty of our constables at the Guildhall, to give evidence in cases which are heard specially on that day, in reference to omnibuses, and cabs, and so on. The consequence is—it not unfrequently happens that from seventy to eighty of our regular force are thus disposed of. Now, there can be no doubt, if it were one force, and a certain amount of extra strength were brought to supply the deficiency, upon occasions like those of which I speak, the City, to that extent, would be benefited, because there would be a uniformity of protection. That is one of the advantages which would be connected with an union of the forces. But in further illustration of the indispensableness of looking at the City as a place which is not to be swamped in the metropolitan district, I must call the attention of the Commission to the number of persons that come into the City. The resident population of the City is 128,851. The number of persons who have business in the City, during the daytime, is 316,000. The number of persons passing through one street in the City (that is Cheapside), each day, is nearly 14,000; cabs, omnibuses, and other vehicles, is 52,100, and it must be remembered that those persons come, most of them, upon business, and many of them with large property about them. The consequence is, that there is a corresponding number of persons coming to the City every day, whose business it is to trade upon the capital of other people, to see what they can get hold of, and if we had not a police as numerous as I am speaking of, so that the whole of this crowd may be under the eye of the police, the depredations that would be committed are beyond all belief. Then comes the question: How does this force act in reference to the interests of the City? The number of persons taken before the magistrates by the City police for the ten years ending 1852, was 51,677. In the metropolitan police, 666,764. You will find in most of the comparisons the transactions have relation to the number of men; that is, for instance, if you multiply the number we take into custody by the number of our police, it will be about as 10 to 1. If you multiply 51,000 by 10, it will give you about the aggregate of the metropolitan cases. This takes place on an area of a mile and a quarter or a mile and a half; the other extends over 700 miles, according to Mr. Hickson's account. These statistics are not only useful, but they are just to be given in explanation of other matters in reference to the magisterial duties. When we look at the way this mass of criminals is dealt with, we find that there were discharged in the City 20,346, or about 39 per cent. of those apprehended. As regards the metropolitan district, they were discharged at the rate of 50 per cent., the numbers being 333,960; so that, in point of fact, looking to the number of persons who were dealt with when brought before the magistrates, if their punishment is to be considered as the test of the judgment exercised in dealing with each case, or as a test of discrimination in the constables who took them before the magistrates, it tells very favourably for the City police, because in the one case the number dealt with is much larger than in the other. So again with respect to those summarily convicted, the proportion is 52 per cent. in the City; in the metropolitan districts it is 42. Taking the committals for trial it is 4,113, or about 8 per cent. of those apprehended. In the metropolitan district it is 48,456, or 7 per cent. Tried and convicted in the City, 2,426, or about 84 per cent. In the metropolitan district, 37,480, or about 77 per cent. What I desire by these statistics is, to show that those criminals who are brought before the magistrates in the City are dealt with in a way that will challenge investigation compared with the decisions of the magistrates without the City. I am not venturing to give any opinion, though I have one, upon the broad question who ought to be magistrates; whether they should be unpaid or stipendiary; but this is the working of the system as coming under the cognizance of our office. The number of robberies in ten years in the City has been 15,415; in the metropolitan district 122,761, or about 8 to 1; that is, as far as figures go, in favour of the metropolitan police; because, taking one in ten to be the guide, their robberies have been as only one to eight. But I should say, that every robbery in the City is almost sure to be recorded. First of all, it takes place on a spot which is so completely within the sphere of the police, that a man does not become indifferent to his loss before he can tell his story. If he has lost his handkerchief or his watch, he runs to the police directly; hence, there is scarcely a robbery in the City which is not pretty well known. It is otherwise in the metropolitan district, especially in the more distant divisions. If a person is robbed between Stamford Hill and Edmonton, he has to find out where the police station is, and unless it is a matter of serious importance, he thinks it is better to let the case pass. I mention this for the purpose of showing that all events in the City are sure to be known; not so out. Then, as to the value of property stolen and recovered within that period within the City, the loss by robberies in ten years has amounted to 117,313*l*. This includes the robbery at Rogers's. Of that sum of money we recovered 66,277*l*. The metropolitan police lost 377,800*l*., and recovered 86,770*l*. That is, we recovered 56 per cent., and they recovered 23 per cent. I hope I shall not be considered as giving these statistics with a view to what might be regarded an ungenerous contrast; I only desire to put before the Commission the working of the City police, with a view to meet the objections of those who fancy that it might be much more efficient under another form. It is a very remarkable fact, but though there are between 300,000 and 400,000 people going in and out of the City daily, entering the banks to take and to receive money, and engaged in other monetary transactions, and though there are not fewer than from 700 to 1,000 persons come into the City daily, from Southwark and other places, whose object is to seize whatever they can obtain; who are looking in all directions for some stray person who, perhaps, was never in London before, or some old lady with a dividend, looking about and wishing to know which is the way to St. Paul's, the whole loss which is sustained in this way I would guarantee for 30*l.* a day. Then, with respect to the number of summonses, there is not a summons issued against any person of which the police have to do, which is not first sanctioned by myself, in order to guard against summonses being taken out and dealt with unknown at my office. It was found in former days that a summons could be taken out by a constable; he could show it to the party whom he charged as an offender, and he might quietly settle the matter without anybody knowing anything about it. The practice now is that there is no person summoned in whose case the summons is not first authenticated by myself, and a return of the result of the summons is reported to the chief office, from whence this statistical information is obtained. The number of summonses for 10 years in the City was 21,857, of which number 18,350 of the parties were convicted. In the metropolitan police the number was 36,967, being not double our number in the whole of the metropolitan district; of that number there were 31,944 convicted, giving to the metropolitan police an advantage of 3 per cent., inasmuch as we have 83 per cent. convicted, and they have 86 per cent. Then as to the expense of the police, and what might be in the view of some a saving: at the present time the rate which is levied upon the City to meet the entire expenses of the police is 7*d.*; which is sufficient to meet the additional pay to the men; so that if we have our force full, and the men are paid by the new standard, 7*d.* in the pound is ample to realize a fund to meet all charges.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

6557. The City also makes an allowance from its own funds?—Yes; the corporation is, for that purpose, the Government; it does for the City just what the general Government does for the rest of the metropolis; besides which, in the case of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington, the City paid 2,000*l.* out of their own funds. The metropolitan police is at this time assessed at 6*d.*, which, against the City, is a difference of 1*d.*, or 4,000*l.*, but, in effect, they, the metropolitan, do pay 7*d.*, and for this reason. The rate in the City is levied by the committee, who pay all the expenses attending the collection. In the metropolitan police the different parishes are called upon to pay a net sum of money equal to the 6*d.*, but what it costs them to raise it is an additional charge.

6558. What you mean is, that the one is the net and the other the gross payment?—Yes, precisely so; and though I do not speak with great accuracy upon this subject, I am told by persons who are subject to the metropolitan rate, that is in effect 7*d.* Supposing the City were united to the metropolitan district, under the notion that it would be an economical arrangement, I say it would be a great loss to them, because at this time the inhabitants of Marylebone are paying very nearly as much as we do, and I much question whether they have half our strength; that is, whether they have 300 men for their money, where we have 579 for ours; we also have a chief authority in the City, no other district having that advantage.

6559. You have the advantage of having a small area, and a rich and dense population?—Certainly 6560. If you were thrown together with districts which have a large area and a thinner and not so rich population, you would be losers?—In that respect we should, and it would be beneficial to the others; others would get the benefit of our income; the question is, whether we should get the same amount of protection. I am quite satisfied that, unless there was some reservation to that effect, the consequences would be highly mischievous.

6561. Do not you think any public authorities for the metropolis which did their duty would make it a primary object adequately to protect the City?—No doubt.

6562. It is supposing gross neglect, is not it, to presume that they would not do so?—They would take it up with the experience of the past. There is no motive which can be suggested, which would lead those to whom the exclusive administration of the police was entrusted, supposing the City was incorporated with the metropolitan district, not to be as eager to protect the great interests of the City as any other part. I only wish to lay before the Commissioners the result of my experience, should there be on their part any view to other arrangements. Possibly, if it were all united, there would be a saving of some small portion of the machinery, perhaps 2,000*l.* a year.

6563. Does any difficulty or interference now arise between the City jurisdiction and the metropolitan jurisdiction?—I have inquired a good deal upon that subject; the answer of my officers is this, that there is not so much jealousy between the respective forces who are upon the confines of the different districts, as there is between our own officers in reference to their own divisions or beats; that is, if a City constable comes into the beat of another man pursuing some object or other, it annoys that man upon whose beat he comes more than if the metropolitan police came into the City; the jealousy is stronger between men of the same force than it is between men of other forces.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6564. There is now the power, is not there, under Act of Parliament, of acting interchangeably upon the confines of the two jurisdictions?—No, I think that is misunderstood. Under the City Police Act, upon an emergency, with the consent of the Secretary of State, our men may go into the metropolitan district, and a metropolitan man may come into the City with the sanction of the Lord Mayor, but it is only upon emergencies.

6565. In the case of the pursuit of a common thief or a pickpocket just upon the frontiers of the City, cannot a City constable pursue him into the metropoliton district?—Yes, and so he does; my detective men go as much into Marylebone as they do into the City.

6566. The man is not a constable out of the City, is he?—Yes, if he has reasonable cause.

6567. From your statement this appears to be the state of things: that with regard to petty cases there is no difficulty on either side in pursuing a delinquent beyond the jurisdiction either of the City or the metropolitan police, as the case may be; and that with regard to great occasions, such as public riots and so on, the two forces may be interchanged upon application to the Lord Mayor and the Secretary of State?—Yes, upon emergencies. I do not know how far the Commission will take cognizance of things that would merely improve the City police, irrespective of any larger object, but I would call your attention to this, which is a very serious inconvenience. The commissioner must be incessantly at his post, unless he is allowed to be away by the sanction of the Secretary of State and of the Lord Mayor; and then with that sanction he can appoint the next person in authority. The consequence is, that in 15 years I have only had three holidays of any duration; to obtain this sanction upon any occasion for a short time would be impracticable; because while I was running to the Secretary of State to say that I was going to Brighton, I should go to Brighton three or four times before I should get his consent; therefore the commissioner is either obliged to be incessantly at his post, or, if he leaves it, he is subject to all the responsibilities which may arise in his absence, without his absence being authorized. Therefore, if the City police is to continue, there ought to be some person of equal authority under the particular circumstances.

6568. Are not the metropolitan commissioners obliged to be at their post?—Yes; but there are two, and they can mutually arrange their periods of absence. There is another point which I should wish to mention, which is really a very serious evil, and that is the existence of what I call an interior irresponsible police. At the Mansion House there are officers, who, if they are not clothed with all the powers of police, are exercising police functions, and that very much to the prejudice of the ordinary police. In the metropolitan district no man can be a constable who is not sworn in by the metropolitan commissioners, and amenable to the metropolitan commissioners. At the Mansion House there are officers who have been there for years; and as the Mansion House is generally known to be the seat of justice, if a person has any complaint of a robbery or a forgery to make, and he goes to the Mansion House, there are persons there who will soon elicit what he wants, and if it is a matter of importance, a forgery or a large embezzlement, or anything that suggests advantage, it is immediately taken up by those parties. They can exact from the party making the complaint whatever they may please; they may say: I think there ought to be no time lost in my going to America or to the Continent.

6569. Who are those officious gentlemen?—There are such men. If the question is asked by the complainant, What will it cost me? they say, perhaps, Begin by giving us 50*l.*, and we can apply for more hereafter.

6570. Are those men holding any official situation?—They are old officers of the corporation, paid 150*l.* a year each, but they are amenable to nobody.

6571. Are they persons now employed by the corporation?—Yes; I speak of the two Forresters. The practice acts very perniciously; it acts unjustly to the public and the police force. If a man goes there, the question is asked, What can I do for you? He says, I have lost my watch. Was it of any value? No; except that it was a family watch. You had better go down and see the police, is the reply, and he is turned over to our men. Supposing it is a forgery of 1,000*l.*, he is told, "Step in, sir," and he is immediately attended to. These officers are amenable to nobody, and the consequence is, that the system acts very prejudicially upon the minds of our men, because they fancy that the cream of the cases is lapped up by other persons.

6572. They pick their cases?—Yes.

6573. Who are the parties you allude to?—They are old officers who were connected with the Mansion House before the Act passed.

6574. I suppose they are now the servants of somebody at the Mansion House?—They receive 150*l.* a year.

6575. Are they under any control?—I am not aware of any.

6576. Have they any office in the Mansion House, or are they merely lounging about the door?—They are always to be found or heard of there. I do not know that they have a regular office.

6577. Have you ever brought the subject under the notice of the authorities?—I have mentioned it to some gentlemen of the Court of Aldermen, and they say, if they are removed, others will not be appointed in their place; others will say, we are not going to part with such good fellows as these; we must have some men of our own.

D. W. Harvey Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6578. How many of them are there?—There are two; but I should say, that there are a couple of hundred constables sworn in at the Mansion House exercising the functions of constables, but not amenable to any one.

6579. Not under your authority?—No.

6580. Are they sworn in by the Lord Mayor?—Yes, as special constables. Under the Metropolitan Act the commissioners have the power of appointing those men, and of discharging them. Every constable at the metropolitan offices is controlled by the metropolitan commissioners; it is otherwise with us. There are men at both the magisterial offices in the City whom I have nothing to do with.

6581. In your opinion, this double system is very objectionable?—In every way. It would be objectionable even if under control, but it is still more so when it is irresponsible.

6582. Such as it is, is it under the control of the Lord Mayor?—I have no doubt if any complaint were made of those parties to the Lord Mayor, or to any alderman, he would take notice of it. These men are very good men, and very excellent officers.

6583. Will you have the goodness to explain what is the extent of interference of the committee of the common council with the general management of the police?—They do not at all interfere with the police, except so far as raising the funds, and also receiving from me from time to time reports which I may have to make. To-morow, for instance, there may be communications from me, upon half a dozen things—a man has to be superannuated, or a constable has died, leaving a wife and children to be provided for; such cases are dealt with by the committee.

6584. Do they deal with all cases involving expenditure?—Yes.

6585. Who settles the contracts for the police?—The committee.

6586. You have no control over the contracts?—No, except to complain if the articles which are supplied are not proper.

6587. Who has the power to settle what the clothing is to be?—The commissioner has the power to determine what the clothing shall be.

6588. Who decides upon the rate of pay?—The committee.

6589. The recent increase in the rate of pay was made by the committee then, not by you?—It was at my instance.

6590. It was made by their authority?—Yes; if they had differed from me it must have remained.

6591. They gave the order by which the increase of pay was given, and the matter was considered by them before it was done?—Yes; I submitted to them a scale, and it was a matter of grave consideration. Many of them intimated what has been intimated to-day: "Do not you think it is undesirable at the present time? There is a commission sitting, "who may look into these things." Or, "is not it desirable to know what they are doing at "the west end; have you come across either of the metropolitan commissioners, or would "you be willing to inquire?" I should at once have said to such an inquiry, "We have nothing to do with the metropolitan commissioners."

6592. I suppose the view taken by the committee and by yourself was, that your primary duty was to look to the efficiency of the City police, and whatever were the incidental consequences which might arise from any measure taken with that view, you were not responsible?—We looked entirely to the efficiency of the City police.

6593. Are there any private watchmen in the City, who are constables?—Yes, there are some, and they are sworn in, in the way I speak of.

6594. Not being under your control?—No; but there are some constables under my control. For instance, at the Post-office; the Post-office have six or eight of our men.

6595. Men furnished by you?—Yes; if any person comes and says to the chief officer, "I am about to pull down my premises; can you spare us a constable to watch the "buildings in progress?" I say, "Yes; but you must pay a scale which has been fixed by "the committee, and that money is paid to the chamberlain."

6596. Are the Temple watchmen, for instance, constables?—I do not think they are.

6597. Do you think it is desirable that there should be those constable, independent of you, all over the City?—It is very undesirable.

6598. It is not the case in any other part of the metropolis, is it?—It is not.

6599. There are some private watchmen in London; are they constables;—I have here a list of the places to which metropolitan constables are sent. The commissioners receive 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* a year from those sources.

6600. The parties apply to the metropolitan police for constables, do not they?—Certainly; the metropolitan police are empowered to swear constables for the special purpose of protecting the Palace. There is some particular form of oath in that case.

6601. They are answerable for the general maintenance of the peace, and the security of property in the metropolis?—Yes; and therefore, they ought to have the agents of their administration under their control. We had an instance the other day, illustrative of the evil of a contrary system. A man was sworn in by the parish authorities in Bishopsgate-street. This man has been their constable for years. There was a complaint made of a brothel, which was brought under the notice of the authorities; it turned out that this constable had been receiving his 5*s.* or 10*s.* a week to be quiet for years. I had no power upon this being mentioned to me to summon the man, and I was obliged to make it the subject of complaint to the authorities, who will dismiss him. Constables of that description could take a person into custody, and discharge him for a consideration, without its being known to us.

D W. Harvey, Esq.

24th Jan. 1854.

6602. Are there any other powers exercised by the committee of the common council over the police, besides those which you have enumerated?—No; their maxim has been all the way through: Mr. Commissioner, everything is in your hands; you are answerable for the peace and safety of the City.

6603. You think your control over the City police is not less extensive than that of the metropolitan commissioners over their police?—I should say my powers are greater. I appoint our men; I can dismiss the men without reason if I please.

6604. Do you think the appointments are better managed in the City than they are in the metropolitan district?—I am not prepared to say that they are better managed.

6605. The system is better, you think?—I should be very sorry to suggest any comparison; I only say that ours is as good as I can make it.

6606. With regard to the parts of the metropolis which surround the City, you were speaking of the advantage of having a superintendent of police always on the spot; the district of the metropolitan police extends to the east of the City, does not it, considerably?—Yes.

6607. Did you ever hear of any inconvenience arising from the distance between those parts and the principal office of the metropolitan police?—I have never heard of any; each district is presided over by a superintendent, who is for that purpose the chief of that district; what subjects he brings under the notice of the commissioners I am not prepared to say. I take for granted that his views and recommendations at all events are received with attention, and probably he may be armed with authority to deal with certain cases; but I am not speaking now from any personal knowledge.

6608. You are aware that when the City Bill was first introduced it was not proposed to have any superintendent at all, but to govern the police by a committee of the common council?—I think I am.

6609. The superintendent was an after-thought?—Yes, if the other views prevailed before. I do not mean to say that now the independent working of the City police is acceptable to all. I think that what is termed popular control would, in some instances, be palatable.

6610. That is to say, that there should be more control in the hands of the common council?—Yes; and I think they would like very well to have the commissioner before them at times, and to have a word or two to say, but I am not of opinion that it is desirable.

6611. There never has been any Parliamentary inquiry into the City police since it has been established, has there?—Never.

6612. There was a Committee of the House of Commons, which sat in the year in which the Act passed?—Yes.

6613. That committee examined into the question of the desirableness of a separate system for the City police, and they came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to have a separate system for the City?—Yes.

6614. Was this their first recommendation, "That for the better prevention of crime, "the detection of offenders, and the preservation of the peace, and the more effectually to "promote these objects in conformity with the principle of the 10th George the Fourth, "c. 44, 'An Act for Improving the Police in and near the Metropolis,' (Sir Robert Peel's "Act), it is expedient to consolidate the several constabulary forces of the metropolis, "including those of the City of London and the river Thames, under one authority, "responsible to the Secretary of State for the Home Department." That recommendation, however, was made before the present system was in existence, and with reference to the old unimproved system of the City, was not it?—There was an intermediate improvement; there was a superintendent appointed, whom I retained for a time as my officer.

6615. That committee states the principal objections which were then advanced on the part of the corporation of the City of London against the consolidation of their police with the metropolitan police; the objections are only four, and I will read them to you, and ask you to state whether you believe those to be objections which are still entertained:—"First, that the City so differs in its localities, and the nature of its property, "from other parts of the metropolis, as to require a separate and differently regulated police "force for its protection." Is that a reason which is still held to be in force?—I do not know whether it is so held. I think there is nothing in it, because all the constables that are engaged are pretty much unconnected with the City, and have their duties to learn, and they must perform them.

6616. Your argument about having a superintendent upon the spot partakes of this reason, does not it?—I mean in reference to the persons who come to the chief office, who require all kinds of information and assistance. I do not speak with reference to the officers themselves.

6617. The second reason is, "That it would be a great inconvenience to the inhabi- "tants of the City to be obliged to apply to the commissioners at Whitehall in cases of "complaints against constables?"—I have endeavoured to enforce the truthfulness of that objection.

6618. The third is, "That the taking away the power of appointing and managing its "own police, would be an interference with the charters and privileges of the City?"—That is rather a legal question.

6619. Fourthly, "That the inhabitants would sustain a great pecuniary loss by being "deprived of the contribution which is now made from the corporation funds towards the "expense of the City police?"—Whatever the City now does the Government must do if the force were united. The corporation would be gainers of upwards of 10,000*l.* a year, and the Government fund would be incumbered to that extent.

6620. With regard to the crowding of the thoroughfares, that is one of the principal reasons why it is necessary to have a greater staff of policemen in the City than in the rest of the metropolis. Have you ever made any calculation as to the extent to which the great thoroughfares of the City are obstructed?—I should say the great obstruction is in the neighbourhood of Cornhill and Cheapside especially, and the streets leading to both; they are Fleet-street and Newgate-street. Newgate-street at times is blocked up. At four o'clock in the afternoon you would suppose that everything must come to an end; there is a line of omnibuses and carriages and all descriptions of vehicles, and you would fancy that the whole thing was unmanageable.

6621. I suppose if the new street is constructed in continuation of Cannon-street, that will be a great improvement?—It will ease Cheapside, but it will not ease Ludgate-hill unless they have a diversion down to Blackfriars, which I understand to be in contemplation.

6622. Since the great increase in the size of the metropolis, the old thoroughfares of the central part of the City have become inadequate to the traffic, have they not?—Decidedly; they must ease the great thoroughfares in some way or other.

6623. Have you ever placed persons to observe how many obstructions occur in the thoroughfares in the course of a day or a week?—We have such statements; the information is pretty well implied in the number of summonses. Those summonses are, in nine out of ten cases, for loitering or for some offence under the Hackney Carriage Act. There is another reason which I will just mention why we require more policemen in the City; the City is deserted at night; and I am satisfied that persons leave the City comfortably, because of their confidence in the police. I have a return made to me daily of the number of doors which are found open or insecure, and I should say in more than half the cases the premises are unoccupied; parties leave their houses with a little trumpery latch or lock to secure, as they fancy, thousands of property, and as the police walk round so frequently, it is scarcely possible for any great robbery to be committed. To show that the City police has been efficient when its powers were most taxed, I may mention that when Her Majesty came to the Guildhall, when the Prince came to open the Coal Exchange, when Her Majesty came to open the Royal Exchange, when the Chartist riots took place, and upon the late occasion of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, we have been found, in concurrence with the other City authorities, adequate to the duties to be performed.

6624. Upon those occasions did you derive any assistance from the metropolitan police in general?—No.

6625. None of the metropolitan police entered the City upon any of those occasions?—No. The subject was discussed upon the occasion of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, and it was suggested, in a polite way, that they would take charge of Fleet-street and Ludgate-hill, in continuation of their own police, which, for obvious reasons, we declined. We thought ourselves competent to that part of the duty. If we had suggested: We shall be glad to have 200 or 300 of your men in the neighbourhood of Barbican or towards Finsbury-square, or other unattractive scenes, I do not suppose we should have had them. In truth we did not require them, for the Government is always prompt and ready to give us every assistance. Upon that occasion Lord Hardinge said to me, "How many "men do you want?" I think we had 1,000 foot and 500 horse. The Government is always most eager to assist us.

6626. You stated that even supposing it was thought right to keep up a separate police in the City from that of the rest of the metropolis, there might be advantages in uniting the detective force of the two police bodies?—Yes, if that could be done. If there were a detective force which should be a London force, it would be very desirable.

6627. Do you think it would be possible to separate the detective force from the common police so completely as that suggestion supposes?—Not to have it under two branches, I think.

6628. At present you have a detective police particularly attached to the City under your control?—Yes; and there is another in the metropolitan district.

6629. I understood you to say, that with regard to the detective police, you thought you had seen that its utility was crippled by that division?—I consider that the detective police of the City might be made much more effective, if it did not impose upon the City a greater expense than perhaps that portion of the metropolis ought to bear, and hence the desirableness of its being one detective force.

6630. Do you mean that the detective police in the City is not quite so strong as, for the public interest, it ought to be?—It is strong for its immediate purposes, but not so strong as a detective police ought to be. I would have under the executive authority, let that authority be what it might, two or three men at each of the outports and great towns.

D. W. Harvey, Esq.

6631. Do you mean that the arguments for concentration apply very strongly in the case of the detective police, however they may apply in the case of the ordinary police?—Yes, let the control be whatever it may, I think such a detective police might be established in London as would render it scarcely possible for any large offender to escape.

6632. What is the expense of the detective police now in the City of London?—There are twelve men, and they receive 30*s.* a week. In the metropolitan district, I think they receive two guineas a week.

6633. Then you appear to pay your detective policemen less, and the ordinary policemen more, than they do in the rest of the metropolis?—Yes.

6634. Can you state any reason for that difference?—No, except that they pay what seems fitting to them, and we do the same; we move quite distinctly and independently With the best feeling towards each other we are perfectly distinct.

G. W. K. Potter, Esq.

GEORGE WILLIAM K. POTTER, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6635. What situation do you hold in connexion with the corporation of London?—I am secondary of the Poultry compter. Since the death of my colleague in July last I have performed the duties of the two offices. I was appointed in the year 1831.

6636. What are the duties connected with your office?—I have a statement of the duties here, but they are the same as those of undersheriffs in all other counties, with one or two exceptions. One exception is that the secondary has to attend meetings of the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council when matters relating to the business of the sheriffs are under consideration, and to aid the Lord Mayor and sheriffs with their counsel in the maintenance of the peace of the City, and also, under the Registration Act, to prepare the register of voters for Members of Parliament, otherwise all the other duties relate to the under-sheriffs.

6637. Can you give the Commissioners any information respecting the election of sheriffs?—I superintend the election.

6638. Can you explain the system by which the imposition of fines is regulated?—Yes; the fines come down to me in the long writ and the sessions process. The fines imposed by the superior courts and by the Central Criminal Court come to me in the long writ, and the fines of the sessions by the sessions process.

6639. In the case of estreats do they all come to you?—Yes.

6640. Do you mean for your own profit?—No; I collect them. I account to the City solicitor, and hand them over to him upon the account being settled.

6641. In the case that was specially brought before us, in the case of Mr. Gray, you received those estreats?—Yes; and I handed them over to the City solicitor for the corporation.

6642. Do you mean that they merge in the general corporation funds, or is there anybody who has a special claim upon them?—I understand that they are ultimately handed over to the sheriffs, but I always looked upon it as a fund belonging to the corporation.

6643. Have the sheriffs any claim upon those funds, either by custom or otherwise?—It was new to me when I lately heard that they have any such claims. I believed that the money belonged to the corporation, but that it had been handed over to the sheriffs by the corporation. I never knew till lately that the sheriffs ever had any real claim to the money.

6644. In Mr. Gray's case he said he had applied to you about it?—Yes; he was wrong in saying that he did what he did at my request; it was rather my recommendation as to the course which he should pursue.

6645. What is the salary attached to your office?—It entirely depends upon the fees. I gave 5,000*l.* for the office, under an arrangement with the late secondary, who sold the office to the corporation for 8,000*l.* or 8,500*l.*—the corporation found 3,000*l.* and I found 5,000*l.*—but upon this arrangement, that should I be disturbed in my office the 5,000*l.* was to be returned to me.

6646. Have you the right of selling your office?—No.

6647. If you were to resign the office the Common Council would fill up the vacancy?—Yes.

6648. What are the emoluments of your office?—The receipts of the office are about one-third what they were when the sheriffs' fees were settled. I was, at the time of my appointment, debarred from taking more than the legal fees, which were then very small. My income was made up for one or two years to 1,000*l.* by the corporation.

6649. Did you make any stipulation with regard to the emoluments of your office at the time you paid so considerable a sum?—That I was not to receive less than 1,000*l.* a year.

6650. Do you receive any express authority from the sheriffs year by year?—I do not.

6651. Then you hold your office by custom?—Yes.

6652. Are not you, in effect, executing that which is, properly speaking, the duty of the sheriffs?—Yes.

6653. Without any express authority from time to time?—Except by the corporation; I am sworn in before the Court of Aldermen.

6654. You act only in the City?—Only in the City.

6655. There are separate under-sheriffs for the county?—Yes.

6656. So that the separate jurisdiction of the sheriffs in the City and in the county of Middlesex never clashes?—No.

6657. Are there separate under-sheriffs in each district?—Yes; the judges of the Sheriff's Court are, in strictness, under-sheriffs of London.

6658. You perform the duties?—I do, of under-sheriffs.

G. W. K. Pott, Esq.

24th Jan. 185

Mr. GEORGE PAYNE, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Mr. G. Payne

6659. What office do you hold in connection with the corporation?—That of police receiver.

6660. What are the duties of that office?—To examine and certify each item of an expenditure of the police funds amounting to about 40,000*l.* per annum. To examine and work up all arrears on a collection exceeding 30,000*l.* per annum levied on 16,000 houses, with a net rental of 1,115,000*l.* To give attention to inquiries on difficulties arising between 30 rate collectors, and the changing occupiers in the several wards, and to make out all summonses and warrants against defaulters. To prepare and enter into books for the Police committee particulars of the state of all the police and ward rate collections; And to submit to each deputy, quarterly, a written report of the state of the collection in his ward. To receive the half police rates on empty premises, and arrears of rates recovered after accounts were cleared; fees on summonses and warrants for the recovery of rates; accounts drawn on police pay-sheets and not paid; and also the proceeds of the sale of old clothing and stores; and duly to account for the same. To see that contracts for stores entered into by the Police committee are carried into effect; and that police clothing stores and stationery are properly delivered, both as to quantity and quality. To regulate minor articles of expenditure at the seven police stations, and to visit each station from time to time. To see that the stores, clothing, goods, and furniture purchased by the Police committee are neither wasted, wilfully damaged, nor misapplied. To examine and pay all rates, taxes, minor repairs, and petty expenses for the station houses and general service. Further, to keep all accounts, checks, vouchers, and transactions entered in books, and arranged so as to admit of prompt and convenient reference. Also to attend all meetings of the Police committee and sub-committees.

6661. By whom are you appointed?—By the Police committee.

6662. What is the salary attached to the office?—350*l.* a year.

6663. How long have you held the situation?—I have held that of police receiver from the year 1841. I held before that the appointment of chief clerk to the police. In the year 1838 the corporation employed 100 men, and each ward arranged its own nightly watch. At the end of 1838 the nightly watch was done away with, and the corporation appointed two officers, a superintendent and a chief clerk, with a force of 500 policemen. I was appointed chief clerk; the force was got into working order, and on the 17th of August 1839, the City Police Act was passed, with power to appoint a commissioner. In 1841, I was appointed police receiver, or more properly police comptroller, as the rates are paid by the collectors into the chamber of London.

6664. Who has the power of making the assessment upon which the rate is founded?—It is made in each ward, by the alderman, deputies, and common councilmen of that ward.

6665. Do they put the different assessments together, so as to constitute one assessment?—Yes.

6666. Do you know whether this assessment is made up to the full value of the rental?—Not quite to the full value.

6667. What proportion does it consist of?—It is nominally to the full value, but I have reason to know that it is not always to the full value.

6668. Do you believe that the assessment in the City is as high in relation to the annual value, as the assessment in the rest of the metropolis?—Quite as high.

6669. So that a comparison between the poundage rate in the City, and in the rest of the metropolis, would be a fair comparison?—Quite. The assessment is continually changing from year to year and generally on the increase.

6670. Is there any statement which you are desirous of making to the Commissioners?—A statement was made by Mr. Elliott at Question 1087 to this effect:—"The City "police might be well managed for 25,000*l.* a year in addition to the cost of all the rest of "the metropolitan police." In another portion of his statement, he says—"Now, sup-"posing that the metropolitan police commissioners, who would be pretty good judges, "might be a little wrong in their calculation, it is but fair to say that the citizens of "London lose 10,000*l.* a-year by their separate police jurisdiction." At the time the metropolitan police commissioners estimated that the expense would be 25,000*l.* per annum, they proposed to employ in the City only 300 policemen, and then they would have rated the City of London in common with the metropolitan Police districts a clear 6*d.* in the pound; but in order to raise a clear 6*d.*, 6½*d.*, or 7*d.* in the pound must be assessed on the ratepayers. From the books of the Police committee it appears that, taking the ten years ending 1852, the average amount of police rate assessed in the City of London, including losses and the expense of collection, was 6½*d.* in the pound, being the same or less than the metropolitan police rate; the average number of men actually on duty in the City for the same ten years was 545, or an excess of 245 men over the number of the metropolitan estimate. The cost of the excess of 245 men at 70*l.* each per annum, would be 17,150*l.* The metropolitan commissioners derive one fourth of their expense from the Consolidated Fund. The corporation paid one-fourth of the expense of the City police, or 9,785*l.* per annum out of the City cash. Deducting 9,785*l.* contributed from the corporation funds from 17,150*l.*, the annual expenditure for the additional men, it would leave a balance of 7,365*l.* per annum in favour of the ratepayers. Therefore it is but fair to say that the ratepayers in the City of London gain 7,300*l.* a year by their separate police jurisdiction. With 300 policemen for the City of London, a rate of 4½*d.* in the pound would be sufficient. The difference in the City of London between the ratepayers' management and the Government management, is 17,000*l.* per annum in favour of the ratepayers' management.

Mr. G. Payne.

6671. Do not you think that there are other circumstances besides the difference between the Government management and the ratepayers' management, which might render the cost of the metropolitan police greater in proportion than that of the City police?—If men are employed at a distance, or on another service, the ratepayers must pay for duties which are not done within their districts.

6672. If the area is small and the population is rich, will not that produce less expense than a larger area with a less wealthy population?—We have some very considerable areas in the City with a very poor population.

6673. The whole area is very small?—It is of course; we have, however, more than 61 miles of streets. With regard to the collections, I am quite prepared to show that the Police committee have the whole matter most completely under their control. I have annually to make a report to the Police committee of the state of these things. Perhaps the last report which I made I may put in.

The witness delivered in the same.

Mr. W. Burbidge Richardson.

Mr. William Burbidge Richardson having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6674. Are you chief clerk in the comptroller's office?—Yes; and an attorney and solicitor.

6675. Mr. Saunders the comptroller, being unable to attend the Commissioners from ill health, are you acquainted with the whole of the business of his office?—I am.

6676. Can you state to the Commissioners what the salary and emoluments of the comptroller are?—The salary is 1,500*l.* a year, partly received from fees, the balance being paid by the Court of Common Council, as arranged by the court in 1845.

6677. His receipts are never greater than 1,500*l.* a year?—No; except in the year 1852, when the leases of the Conduit Mead Estate fell in; he then received in addition to his 1,500*l.*, 1,230*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*

6678. His salary was nearly doubled then?—Yes, for that year only; the circumstance can only occur once in fourteen years, on the renewal of the leases I have mentioned.

6679. Is there any receipt beyond that?—No.

6680. Is he employed by the Irish Society?—No, he has nothing to do with the Irish Society.

6681. What are his duties?—His duties were defined by the Court of Common Council upon his election by the court in 1841. He attends to the Law Conveyancing department of the corporation, which, in consequence of the City improvements, has been very extensive of late years. The average amount of the purchase monies for the improvements for the last six years has been 187,571*l.* per annum, averaging 258 titles and conveyances; he also attends to the business of the City Lands committee.

6682. He manages all the property of the City in houses and lands, and he also has the superintendence of the City markets?—He attends the City Lands committee as secretary and conveyancing solicitor, and carries out all the business relating thereto.

6683. What duties does he exercise in respect to the markets?—He attends as secretary and conveyancing solicitor to the Markets committee, and also transacts the business in relation thereto.

6684. He attends to the receipts from the markets?—Yes; of the clerks and collectors.

6685. He does not exercise any control over the markets themselves?—No, the committee have the control, the comptroller only exercises a general superintendence to see that the collectors do their duty.

6686. Are there any other duties besides those?—He completes the purchases for all the City improvements after the committee have settled the claims.

6687. Does he act under the direction of committees of the common council?—He acts under the direction of the City Lands committee, the Markets committee, the City Improvements committee, the Markets Improvement committee, and the other committees of the court in relation to the law conveyancing of those committees, embracing the preparation of every variety of deed and document, and also as secretary to the City Lands and Markets committees, as I have before stated.

Mr. W. Burbidge Richardson.

6688. He would not take any important step in either of those matters without the authority of one of those committees?—No.

6689. He is for the most part a ministerial officer, and does not exercise any great discretion of his own?—Except in the law conveyancing business, there he acts as a solicitor in the ordinary course of professional practice. There are now in the office 97 freehold titles under investigation, and conveyances to be prepared in reference thereto, and many important leasehold titles.

6690. The distinction between his duties and those of the City solicitor are, that the City solicitor attends to all questions in litigation?—Yes; both in common law and in equity; the comptroller does all the conveyancing part of the business.

6691. The comptroller has nothing to do with the Bridge House Estates?—No, they have a separate comptroller.

6692. He sends in an account of the amount which the City property ought to produce to the chamberlain's office in order that the chamberlain may compare it with the receipts?—He delivers to the court annually a statement of the amount which the chamberlain ought to receive during the year, in respect of every rent and source of revenue of the corporation belonging to the City's cash, contained in four very large volumes.

6693. Is there any further explanation which you wish to give?—The comptroller has the custody of all the title-deeds and leases of the corporation; there are 2,475 existing leases, of which he has the care. I have some returns of the business of the office, which with your permission I will read. It has been stated by some persons, that the office of comptroller is a sinecure. These returns will shew the very important and extensive business of the office. The profits of the office, if charged in the usual professional manner, would, I think, realize about 6,000*l.* per annum. I find the total amount of the purchase monies for the purchase of property during the last six years, has been 1,125,426*l.*, averaging as I before stated, 187,571*l.* per annum; the number of houses let for the last six years, has averaged 273 per annum; the number of applications for leases, has averaged 110 per annum. References from the Court of Common Council, 70; and reports to the Court of Common Council, 64. The comptroller has attended Courts of Aldermen and Courts of Common Council to the number of 53 per annum; the City Lands and Markets committees to the number of 70; other committees to the number of 150 per annum; the average time occupied being three hours a sitting. I find, that as to leases, bonds, and various legal instruments, the average per annum has been 566. I have prepared myself to give the Commissioners, should they require it, any further information respecting the property and revenues of the corporation.

Mr. Josiah Temple.

Mr. Josiah Temple, having been sworn was examined as follows.

6694. What are your duties connected with the corporation?—My principal duties as keeper of the Guildhall, are to take charge of the Guildhall, and the several offices and buildings connected therewith. To attend all Courts of Aldermen, Common Council, and Common Halls. To attend the corporation on presenting addresses to Her Majesty and any of the Royal Family. To issue summonses for the Courts and Committtes of Aldermen, and Courts of Common Council, and to summon and attend the several committees of the corporation; also to deliver reports, minutes, and other documents ordered by the Courts of Aldermen, and Common Council and Committees. To take down the names of the aldermen and of the common councilmen, as they enter the Court of Common Council, and also on divisions in the court. To prepare the several courts of law for their sittings, also the rooms for the Courts of Lieutenancy and Commissioners of Sewers, and the committees meeting at Guildhall. To provide and pay for the candles, brushwood, turnery, and other necessaries of a domestic nature, for the use of the Guildhall and courts of law. To pay for all advertisements in the several newspapers for Common Halls and Courts of Common Council, and for the City Lands committee, on account of the letting of the City property; also for the newspapers provided for the reading room, Guildhall, and the offices; and courts and committees of aldermen. To keep an account of the receipts and expenditure incident to the office, and lay the same before the City Lands committee quarterly for audit, and generally to perform such other duties as the Court of Aldermen and Court of Common Council. and the committees may from time to time require. I beg to state to the Commissioners, that I was appointed to my office on the 31st of May, 1847. My brother and my father held the office the previous 57 years. Before my appointment in 1847, I held the situation of first assistant for 21 years. I am admitted by the Court of Aldermen, and sworn.

6695. How are you paid?—I am paid by salary and emoluments amounting upon the average to 412*l.* per annum. I have an official residence and an allowance of coals and wood.

6696. You referred to the purchase of newspapers for the use of the corporation, some statement has been made to the Commissioners as to your having a discretionary power of buying newspapers; can you explain that?—It has been my duty to order 300 copies of a newspaper, after every Court of Common Council, containing the best account of the proceedings, and if any two or three papers have the same account, then by rotation. I deliver them to the Court of Common Council and the officers, amounting to 280. The balance I send to the Town-clerk's office.

Mr. Josiah Temple.

24th Jan. 1854.

6697. You furnish each member of the common council with a copy of the newspaper?—Yes.

6698. You say you select that newspaper which gives the fullest account of the proceedings of the common council?—Yes.

6699. How do you ascertain which gives the fullest account?—It is done by the newsman early in the morning, in order that the members may have them early.

6700. You leave it to the newsmen to decide which has the fullest account?—Yes.

6701. You do not make the selection yourself?—No.

6702. Does that system continue?—Yes.

6703. Is there any other point you wish to mention?—I wish to give the Commissioners an account of the sum of 1,000*l.* which I received in 1852, which appears in the City cash statement for that year. I received that sum by five warrants of the City Lands committee of 200*l.* each. My disbursements in 1852 were the following:—I paid for assistants, 412*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*; for beadle and watchmen at Guildhall, 358*l.* 6*s.*; for gazettes, newspapers and parliamentary papers for reading room, Guildhall, also newspapers for officers by virtue of their office, 97*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.*; charwomen for work at Guildhall, 73*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*; firewood for Guildhall and offices, 45*l.* 15*s.*; advertising resolutions of common council and common halls, 31*l.* 12*s.*; wax and tallow chandlery, deed wafers, &c. 28*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*; turnery and sundry expences of a domestic nature, 26*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*; buckets for Lord Mayor and sheriffs, 16*l.* 16*s.*; binding newspapers and periodicals, 17*l.* 5*s.*; sundry postages, messages, and cab hire, 14*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*; sweeping chimnies in Guildhall, 9*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*; making a total of 1,131*l.* 15*s.*; I have credited to this account the following sums, which I have received, viz;—fees on account of verdicts in courts of law, 70*l.* 16*s.*; ditto on sealing bonds and leases, 49*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; on companies meeting at Guildhall, and references, 61*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*—making 182*l.* 12*s.*; which, being deducted from 1,131*l.* 15*s.*, leaves the total amount of net expenditure, 949*l.* 3*s.* The balance is carried to the next quarter's account, the accounts being audited quarterly by the City Lands committee. I think it my duty to state that the number of summonses and notices issued from my office to the members of the corporation and others in 1853 was 43,900, and the number of reports, minutes and other documents was 18,100.

Mr. Henry Gentry.

Mr. HENRY GENTRY having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6704. We understand you wish to make a statement with respect to some proceedings taken against you by the City on account of you not taking up your freedom?—Yes.

6705. Will you state what you have to complain of?—I complain of the power which is entrusted to the corporation to prosecute a small tradesman, a retail dealer, in the manner they have done. It is very unreasonable and very oppressive.

6706. Has that power affected you in your own case?—Yes; I have had my goods taken from me.

6707. In what manner?—I was summoned. I think first there were thirty-four summoned. I appeared before the chamberlain and stated my case. I put in my plea, and the reason why I objected at the time to take up my freedom.

6708. When did this take place?—In the former part of last year.

6709. You appeared before the chamberlain in the early part of 1853?—Yes.

6710. What passed before the chamberlain?—I told him I had been a very severe sufferer—my losses have been very extensive, being a retail dealer in provisions. I live in the neighbourhood of the City improvements, contiguous to the new street, and in the course of these last four or five years they have removed nearly the whole of my customers, so much so that we now take scarcely a pound a day ready money, where we took formerly 9*l.* or 10*l.* I was compelled also to take down a portion of my premises in order that the City might take down their property. I stated to the chamberlain this, and I told him I was so unsettled that I did not know how long I should remain there, and if he carried out his threat to me it would be a hard case.

6711. What did the chamberlain say or do upon that statement?—He said "Two "months, Mr. Gentry,"—that is all he said to me.

6712. He gave you two months for the purpose of taking out your freedom?—Yes.

6713. What happened at the end of the two months?—I did not make any memorandum of the time, but I found that he entirely disregarded my statement, for an action was brought against me, upon which I felt very much hurt.

6714. You were a retail trader within the City who had not taken out your freedom?—Yes.

6715. Therefore the City had a power of preventing you from exercising a retail trade?—I had understood that they tried the question with the rich men and had lost the action. I know there were many hundreds and thousands in the City who were in the same position, and they had plenty of opportunity, if they were determined to carry it out, to do so, and leave me a little longer.

6716. Did they proceed against you?—Yes.

6717. What was the result of that proceeding?—They took about 25*l.* worth of my goods and they detained them a month, then they were sent to a common councilman to be sold.

6718. This was done under the direction of the City solicitor, was it?—I suppose so, no bill of sale or any document was ever left with me. I did not know the amount of the demand; they told me it was between 8*l.* and 10*l.* When the officer came into the shop I was rather excited to think that they should proceed in that abrupt manner after I had stated my losses.

6719. They sold your goods to the amount of 25*l.*?—I do not know what they realised—they did not realise that; they sold three lots out of four; they brought back a sofa which they had taken away; they sold a watch which I held for an amount that was owing to me, and they sold a clock which my brother left with me who is gone to Canada. The other articles were two tables.

6720. Did you know what the proceeds of the sale were—how much the articles produced?—I saw Mr. Pearson a couple of months ago; till then I had never seen any sort of document respecting the sale. He sent for it from the office. I think it was between 13*l.* and 14*l.* I did not make any memorandum of it.

6721. What was the sum claimed from you?—I cannot say the exact amount. I never had any copy of the document which the officer brought.

6722. Does the proceeding end there?—For anything I know it does. They summoned me again with many others after that, before they had rendered me any account of the sale—some few out of the number paid. I appeared before the City solicitor, who was at that time officiating for the late chamberlain who was then ill. We entered into conversation upon the subject of my case, and I found that he had heard of the consequences which resulted therefrom; which were, that it made my wife ill and brought on premature birth, which nearly caused her death. He said he would forego the costs in that case—and if I would agree to take up my freedom most likely they, I do not know whom he meant, would give me the penalty back.

6723. What is the ultimate result of those proceedings?—There was about 20*l.* value that they did not return to me.

6724. The amount of the claim being what?—You can take up your freedom for 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*

6725. They put you to costs to the amount of 20*l.* to enforce this claim for 6*l.*?—Yes. I see in the report, which was framed by the corporation and read by the honourable recorder, it is stated that it does not require a single comment. It is a far more monstrous evil than it has been ever represented to be. They leave the wholesale people and rich merchants unmolested, who are better able to defend themselves than the little people Small tradesmen most frequently dispose of their shops and let their businesses than the higher class do. The premises of the bankers and rich merchants sometimes remain in the same name for centuries. If they want to enforce this thing stringently they ought to enforce it upon all. Upon one small space of ground it is not impossible that they might demand this sum three times a year, in consequences of the changes of occupants which might take place. It is also stated that if there has been any unnecessary harshness or severity used it has been without the sanction of the Common Council or the committee. Upon that point I applied to the recorder to inform me by whose authority my goods were taken, as I considered, in a very harsh and severe manner. I applied on that subject to the recorder—he evaded giving me an answer. I said, By whose authority were my goods and furniture seized, and what are the names of the persons guilty of the robbery, for such it must be according to his statement. He said, "In answer to your letter of the 14th, I have to reply that "if you have any complaint to make against an officer of the court over which I "have the honour to preside, I shall be ready to hear it in full and in the presence of the "accused." That is entirely evading giving me an answer to my question. After I sent my letter, they did not name this case till the 18th of the present month, when Mr. Pearson said that there had been one person who had had his goods seized. I beg to say that his statement is not correct. He says that the officer had instructions to say to the parties to whom he was sent, that if they took up their freedom their costs would be returned to them. No such message was brought to me till they found I entirely refused to pay—in fact, they almost broke my heart from oppression, and I could not countenance them any more. I had not seen Mr. Pearson, and I made a vow that I would not present myself before any of them. I had petitioned the Improvement committee for compensation for loss of trade and the injury done to my premises. I had not received any answer to that; and after this treatment I could not countenance them. When the officer found that I would not submit to pay, he said you had better see Mr. Pearson. I refused to do so.

6726. Meaning that you had better come to terms with Mr. Pearson?—Intimating as much as that it would be compromised. The goods were sold, and when they came round to our ward I was summoned again, and appeared before them, Mr. Pearson being there. Then and not till then did he make any offer of anything towards my loss. It is said that what the corporation instituted those proceedings for was to keep up the constituency of the City. When I told the chamberlain that I was so unsettled from losses that I knew not how long I should remain there, what earthly benefit should I have been to their constituency.

Adjourned to to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

H. A. Merewether.

25th Jan. 1854.

HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, Sergeant-at-law, Town-clerk, was further examined, as follows.

6727. Are there any points in connection with the evidence which you have already given to the Commissioners to which you are desirous of calling their attention?—There are a few observations, which, with the permission of the Commissioners, I will address to them. In the first place, I wish to produce to the Commission, the letter which Mr. Recorder read in his statement the other day from the banker, Mr. Williams, I have, in my hand, which I beg to deliver in, an authenticated copy of that letter contained in the repertory.—[The same was delivered in.]—I may also mention, that in the year 1801, Mr. Williams retired. In the year 1805, Sir William Curtis, Sir Richard Carr Glynn, Sir Charles Price, and Sir John Perring, continued in the Court of Aldermen, as appears by the repertory of that date. Sir Richard Carr Glyn himself resigned on February the 3d, 1835. I was also interrogated upon the subject of Sir Thomas Gresham's will. I beg leave to lay before the Commissioners the will, which I need not trouble them with at length. It gives the property, which he disposes of, for the purpose of building the Exchange, jointly, to the Mercer's Company and to the Corporation of London. The trusts of the will have been carried out from time to time; first by the purchase of Gresham College, and subsequently by the erection of the old Exchange, and latterly, by the erection of the new Exchange, which was done under the joint supervision of a committee of the Mercer's Company, and a committee of the Corporation of London.

6728. I believe the land which was the site of Sir Thomas Gresham's house, was sold a good many years ago to the Government; was it not?—Yes; and it was then converted into the excise office.

6729. It was sold at a perpetual rent of 500*l.* a-year; was not it?—I do not know exactly the terms under which it was sold.

6730. The same land was again sold by the Government the other day?—Yes.

6731. Do you know what was the amount of money obtained by the Government upon re-selling that land?—I do not. It does not come into the Corporation funds; and I should be unacquainted with it in such a manner as to give an authoritative answer upon the subject. The purchase was originally made, as the Commissioners are aware, under an Act of Parliament, and it remained vested in trustees for some time, till they were removed to the Royal Exchange.

6732. Are you particularly acquainted with the management of the Gresham estate?—I am considerably acquainted with the management of the property. A person from my office is always expected to attend all the meetings of the joint committee at the Mercer's Hall, and I am called upon also to keep a copy of the minutes in my office.

6733. Is there any clause in the Bill to the effect that if the intentions of the testator are not strictly carried out, the property is to be forfeited by the Corporation?—I believe not; there is a general residuary clause.

6734. I find that the trustees sold the Gresham College and the ground attached to it for no other consideration than an annual ground rent of 500*l.* a-year. The Corporation of the City engaging to pay 18,000*l.* in one month towards pulling it down. It is also stated, that in 1852, the building erected for the purpose of an excise office, together with the ground attached to it, was sold by the Government for 108,000*l.*, subject to the ground rent of 500*l.* a-year. Do you think it probable that the increase in value of the property, in the interval between the two periods, may account for that large sum which the Government obtained for it, and still leave it possible that the original bargain concluded by the City was not an improvident one?—First of all, I take it, that the best guarantee that it was not improvident, is, that it was under an Act of Parliament.

6735. If the City were inclined to make an improvident bargain on their part, it is hardly reasonable to suppose, is it, that Parliament would interfere to prevent it?—The manner in which the Gresham estate has always been superintended by the City of London, and the desire they have always had to augment their funds, rather than lessen them, would, I conceive, be a guarantee that at that time the best sum that could be obtained for it was obtained, particularly as they were dealing with the Government.

6736. This would imply that in eighty years there was an increased value of 108,000*l.* upon this property. I wish to know, whether you are sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of the property in the neighbourhood to say, whether it is probable that there had been an increase of value of the property to that extent?—I think it highly probable that the increase in the value of property within the City of London, from the circumstance of their building houses higher than they used to do, and from their being used as warehouses, and particularly from so many streets being widened, might have produced even so large a difference as that.

6737. In 1767 it appears to have been considered only worth 500*l.* a-year; whereas, in 1852, it was worth not only 500*l.*, but also a sum of 108,000*l.*?—I cannot but conceive that it is highly probable that the value of land in the City of London would have increased to that extent.

6738. Upon that supposition the value of the property would appear to have increased more than ten-fold?—In order to make out that proposition, it must be assumed that the property now sold is of the same kind as the property bought then.

6739. Is not it identically the same ground?—It is the same ground, but it does not follow that the circumstances may be altogether the same. It is said that the City of London heretofore sold this property on such and such terms, and made an improvident bargain—not very commonly to be attributed to the Corporation, I think. It was so bad a bargain, it is said, that it appearing that in 1852 it was sold again by the Government, it is to be assumed that the Corporation have mismanaged this estate. It appears to me, that the conclusion that the property has substantially increased in value nearly to the extent of that difference, is a more reasonable supposition than that the other facts should have existed. The two things appear to me hardly to admit of comparison; and the inference that is drawn from them can hardly be supported.

6740. Is there any other point to which you desire to call our attention?—I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to a report which was made in the year 1838, with respect to the lectures. The lectures were then taken under the consideration of the committee for the management of the trust, and specific rules and directions were laid down, under which the lectures have since that time been given; a portion of the lecturers being selected by the Mercers' Company, and the other portion by the City. There was some little difficulty about moving the place where the lectures were to be given, but a case was submitted for the opinion of Sir William Follett and Mr. Griffith Richards, and under their sanction they were removed, and they are now given in the college which has been built at the corner of Basinghall-street. The rules, with respect to the lectures are very short, and I will read them:—"That the several lectures founded "by Sir Thomas Gresham should in future be delivered in the theatre of the City of "London school at seven o'clock in the evening, and in the English language only. That "previous to each term a printed circular should be sent to each member of the Court of "Aldermen, the Court of Common Council, and the Court of the Mercers' Company, "announcing the days, hours, and subjects of the several lectures to be delivered during "the term by each lecturer. That notices of the lectures, containing the same particulars, "should be placed, previous to and during each term, outside the theatre of the City of "London school, at the Guildhall, the Mansion House, and the Royal Exchange. That "the several lecturers should be requested to furnish a syllabus of their respective "lectures, and that printed copies thereof should be provided at the expense of the trust, "and distributed in the theatre before the commencement of each lecture. That appro-"priate apparatus and illustrations should be furnished, at the expense of the trust, for all "those lectures which are susceptible of illustrations." Under those regulations the lectures are still given. Unfortunately, they are not very largely attended, with the exception of the lecture on music, and the lecture on astronomy; but that appears to arise from the inhabitants of the City being so much engaged that they are unable to attend to them, rather than from any other cause that I can learn. The lecturers are persons of known character and reputation. With respect to the expenses which have been incurred, I beg to lay before the Commissioners the following statement:—

The statement was read, and is as follows:—

GRESHAM COLLEGE.

The City's moiety of the expense of building Gresham College, and of the purchase of the freehold thereof, 1842, 1843, and 1844:—

	£	s.	d.
For the building - - - - -	3,795	8	9
For the site - - - - -	2,880	0	0
For architect's commission and clerk of works -	280	6	3
	£6,955	15	0

6741. Are not a considerable number of those lectures delivered in Latin?—I am told that they are given first in Latin, but afterwards they are given in English.

6742. Is the Latin version very much attended in the City?—I am informed that in the arrangement of the business, the Latin lecture is not given unless there are five persons present, and that very rarely happens. I remember being present at one of those lectures many years ago in the old Exchange, when I was the only person attending. The question was asked of me on a former day whether any portion of the county of Middlesex had been added to the City of London. I have since informed myself of the facts. A portion of that which heretofore was a part of the City of Westminster, viz., the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand, has been added to the City of London under the operation of the Post Office Act.

6743. That was a portion of Westminster surrounded by the City?—Yes; a sort of exclusive jurisdiction which had been found to be practically injurious by disorderly persons misbehaving themselves in the City and running into that district, and so putting themselves as was supposed out of the jurisdiction of the City. This Act of Parliament was passed in 1815, upon which a sum of 240,000*l.* was advanced from the revenue of the post office, to be paid into the chamber of London, and the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled were to have the administration of that fund, and the following clause makes them liable for any misapplication of it, The chamberlain was directed to keep accounts of the disbursements, and those accounts were to be laid before Parliament; one-third was to be levied out of the orphans' fund with interest, and the corporation was to execute bonds for the payments of annuities in this mode, by which the money that was necessary was to be raised. The 8th clause provides that if the orphans' fund was insufficient for the annuities, the deficiencies were to be made up out of the chamber of London. Some considerable expense was caused by that means to the City of London.

6744. Has any portion of the county of Middlesex lying outside the external boundary of the City been annexed to it?—I think not. If there has been any, it would be a very small portion of Middlesex near Portsoken. I do not think there was any, because I think the boundaries of the City are extended into about the middle of the Tower. There was a subject on which I was examined before as to which I think it is material to add a word before the Commission, which is with respect to the metage. I suggested that in all probability the trade would be desirous of having and continuing sworn meters, and that in order to make it effectual and remunerative the measuring by them should be compulsory, except under particular circumstances, with a general power for commuting or making any arrangement with respect to the tolls which might be thought necessary. I now hold in my hand a report to the House of Lords by certain commissioners sent to Ireland for the purpose of inquiring into the fairs and markets of Ireland. There it became a very material question whether meters and persons of that description should be established or not. The report recommends that they should be, and I believe at the present time, not only is that recommended with respect to Dublin, but applications are made by Liverpool and Bristol to have similar institutions.

6745. What is the date of that report?—The letter of the Secretary for Ireland, I see, is dated September the 27th, 1852.

6746. Is it recommended that those meters should be appointed by the corporation of Dublin and other places?—I think the meters are to be appointed by the owners of the market.

6747. Are the corporation the owners of the market?—As far as Dublin is concerned I dare say they are, but an immense number of markets are named spread all over Ireland.

6748. That seems to contemplate the appointment of meters for dealings in the markets?—It certainly seems to apply to that.

6749. Is there any recommendation with respect to meters for goods imported by sea?—I presume it would be general "that a competent number of beams and scales, with "standard weights and measures, shall be provided by the owner and maintained for the "use of the market, with proper persons as weigh masters to attend thereon, to make "entry of sales, &c.; that such weigh masters shall be sworn to weigh fairly and honestly 'between buyer and seller. Upon good ground being shown, the Lord Lieutenant shall "be empowered to dismiss any weigh master or market officer, and call upon the owner "to make a new appointment." I ventured to suggest to the Commissioners the other day that this is a part of the duty of the Crown, to superintend all trading transactions between individuals for the purpose of seeing that justice is done both to buyer and seller; that a part of their duty is to supply weights and measures and scales, and in olden times a tron for the purpose, and to see to the execution of the duty which is entrusted to particular grantees, who would of course forfeit their places if they did not discharge their duty properly. I referred upon a former occasion to an elaborate report which was obtained by the General Purposes committee from a gentleman who was acquainted with many of the ports round the kingdom, who was specially sent for the purpose of getting information, in order that the committee might see whether they could extract from the information obtained anything that would be a guidance to them, and particularly as it was suggested that the amount of the dues and metage paid in the outports was much less than it was in the river Thames. This report I have, and can leave with the Commissioners; it goes too much into detail for me to trouble them with any of the results, but I think, upon an inspection of it, it will be found that in point of fact no direct comparison can be made between the Port of London and the outports. First of all, it appears to be the peculiar custom of the Port of London that the crews do not assist in the metage or in the delivery of the goods. In every other respect, I think, it will be found upon looking this over that the other dues are so mixed up with those which are here charged that it is very difficult to make a correct comparison. I believe, when it is looked at, it will be found that, if anything, London is as low if not lower than any of the outports. My attention was particularly called to the evidence of Captain Williams with respect to the City prisons. I had read a portion of that evidence before, but I had rather passed it by, thinking that upon the whole the description it gave of the City prisons was such that it was not very material for the corporation of London to enter upon the subject. I observe that Captain Williams states that nothing can be more vigilant or more effective than the supervision of the prisons by the Court of Aldermen, to whom is entrusted their supervision and the making of regulations with respect to them. There is a clause in the Act of Parliament which gives to the Court of Aldermen the power of dealing with the prisons instead of the magistrates in sessions, of which Mr. Williams complains, thinking that it is injurious; I understand, particularly with a view to one occasion when some discussion took place in the Court of Aldermen, and the court was directed to be cleared in order that the aldermen might deliberate. He referred to that, but that is only one instance. Almost all the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen are in public; in general they are considered to be otherwise, but they reserve to themselves the power of deliberating in private when they consider it to be necessary. Captain Williams appears to think that some grant made to superannuated officers was to be considered, which was very large. I think Captain Williams also stated that the payment of the officers of Newgate was very large, and, generally speaking, he seemed to consider that the corporation remunerated well those officers whom they employed. I must confess that it seems to me, if anything, to be rather a matter that the corporation might be proud of than otherwise, that they do remunerate those officers so largely, because no doubt, primâ facie, the better the reward that is paid to an officer for discharging his duty, the better the class of persons that will be likely to undertake the duties. There is a distinction which I think Captain Williams inadvertently overlooked, that with respect to the prisons which more generally come under his control, they are prisons supported and maintained out of the county rate, and consequently the whole of the population are interested in the remuneration to the officers being as low as possible, but there is nothing of that kind in the City of London. So far from there being any charge for the prisons upon persons who live in the City of London, the whole of the expense of the management of the prisons and the criminal jurisdiction is in point of fact paid for out of the corporate funds; if they therefore pay what perhaps might seem to a person not acquainted with the detail of it a larger sum than they ought, it is only an indication on their part that they are anxious to get their duties well performed.

6750. Rates are more in the City. Inasmuch as the corporation apply their corporate funds to the prisons, and make rates for the police and lighting and paving, it can hardly be said that the rate payers have no interest in the prison expenditure?—The police fund is an entirely new fund, created under a particular Act of Parliament.

6751. If the corporation itself have funds from their estates, those funds would be applicable either in reference to the police or lighting or paving, if they so thought fit to apply them?—I do not imagine that the funds of the corporation of London were ever thought to be applicable to that subject of police; the persons who live within the City of London, and carry on their business there, are exempted to a very great extent by the application of the corporate funds from payments which persons living in other cities and other localities are subject to.

6752. The same reason which induces a corporation to apply a portion of the rents of their estates to the maintenance of the prisons might induce them to apply a portion of those same rents to the maintenance of a police, might not it?—It does—one-fourth of the amount required. The prisons, to a certain degree, have always been under the direction of the corporation.

6753. Has not the police been so?—As connected with the duties of the sheriffs, it has been so; the sheriffs are bound with the custody of the prisoners committed to their charge, and as ancillary to that power, the corporation of London look after the prisons within their jurisdiction.

6754. Is not the superintendent of police appointed by the corporation of London?—Under the Act of Parliament.

6755. Is not the expenditure superintended by a committee of the common council?—The collection of the rate and the expenditure of the money is under a committee of the common council.

6756. The Commissioners understood yesterday that one of the main reasons, in the opinion of Mr. Harvey, for the maintenance of a separate police for the City was, that it was connected with the corporation?—Originally the citizens of London were compelled to do watch and ward, which amounted to the police of that day. Subsequently a police has been established, and a rate levied which falls upon the inhabitants generally, who would otherwise have been obliged to perform those duties.

6757. That view of the case seems to imply that it would be different if an Act of Parliament were passed placing the City police under the management of the Government, retaining only the separateness of the police, and that the corporation had scarcely any control over the police?—The corporation has only a control over the police to the extent I have mentioned. When the question of police was considered all over the country, it became a question whether there should be a separate police for the City of London, or whether it should be included in the general metropolitan police, and it was decided by the legislature that it should be separated. Captain Williams also, I think, in his evidence went through the different prisons. I think he stated, with respect to the new prison at Holloway, that it was impossible there could be a prison better constructed or better regulated; he gave it the best possible praise both for the one and for the other. Indeed it was naturally to be expected that he should not have any complaint to make against it, because, in point of fact, all the plans were submitted to him, and were considered by him before they were carried out. I think Captain Williams stated that there were 200 cells unoccupied; it seems that varying circumstances since the building of that prison have rendered it too large for the present exigencies. The corporation of London would not of course have been desirous to expend more money upon that prison than was absolutely necessary, but the number of cells that were provided were provided under the superintendence of the Government for the time being, with whom constant communications were held, and I think Captain Williams inspected them all; in truth, as connected with that subject, as well as with Newgate, the circumstances with respect to the prisons have, under the changes of the law and other causes, so altered that it is impossible to lay down one day any plan which may not be required very shortly afterwards to be altered. Newgate has undergone a change repeatedly; and I think it is described by Captain Williams in his evidence, that at certain periods of the year it is almost untenanted, in consequence of the regulations which have been made for the Central Criminal Court. It is provided that the distant counties shall not send their prisoners there till a short time before the sitting of the court, and then a particular day is mentioned when they are to be sent; in the interval of course there are very few there. All those subjects are constantly under the consideration of the Court of Aldermen and the Gaol committee, which is appointed to regulate them, and they provide as far as they can for changing circumstances. The Commissioners are quite aware that of late more offences have been tried at the sessions for Middlesex than were tried there before, and a corresponding reduction has been made in the number at the Central Criminal Court; besides which, the prisoners at the Central Criminal Court have themselves decreased in number, so that it is impossible for any provisions to meet the constantly changing circumstances. Captain Williams refers to the debtors' prison. The Commissioners should be informed that that prison is built under a particular Act of Parliament, which contains precise recitals with respect to the jurisdictions for which the prison was to provide a means of safe custody for the prisoners. There were many prisons in London, one at Ludgate for the City generally, the Poultry Compter, and the Giltspur-street Compter, and I think as many as four different divisions described by the Act of Parliament in that prison. I think Captain Williams stated that a committee of the House of Commons had suggested alterations in the plan; but I think you will see, at the close of that observation, Captain Williams says, what was the fact, that the building was then far advanced, and could not be altered; it is clear that it could not have been altered without the sanction of Parliament. The Court of Aldermen have done everything they could to improve the condition of that prison. They have tried the experiment of dividing the common sleeping rooms into separate apartments; they have tried the experiment of wood in one and iron in the other, with a view to see which would answer best. The Court of Aldermen, I am sure, from time to time will be desirous of making all the improvements that may be suggested to them; indeed, Captain Williams says they have done all that can be done. Captain Williams complains also of the condition of the Bridewell. The Bridewell is in truth not one of the public prisons of London. The Bridewell is a place of confinement attached to the hospital, and is managed with the hospital by the governors of that hospital, and not by the corporation; probably it was never intended as a place for prisoners to be long confined in. The object of that particular hospital was to clear the streets of beggars and indigent persons, affording for them an asylum, and for persons who were misconducting themselves a temporary prison, where they were to be detained under the name of rogues and vagrants. But I believe I shall best consult the convenience of the Commissioners by referring them to a gentleman whose name Captain Williams mentioned, Mr. Johnson, the treasurer of the Bridewell, who, if any information is required on the subject, will be able to give it to the fullest extent.

6758. Do you know sufficient of the chamberlain's jurisdiction with respect to apprentices, to enable you to form a judgment how that operates?—I have always understood that it acts most beneficially. I think it would not require much to lead one to that conclusion; for the chamberlain is always there except when prevented by illness or any special cause, and he is ready to attend immediately as a sort of domestic forum to hear the complaints of masters against apprentices, or vice versâ. He hears them and decides them. I have no doubt he decides them upon principles of equity, and it is only in the ultimate result that he commits either the one or the other to prison. This jurisdiction I believe has been exercised as far back as any trace can be made, and the result is highly beneficial. The comptroller occasionally sits for the chamberlain when he is absent, and the result is that there is always a court ready to hear disputes between masters and servants, and to adjust them, in which I believe it is very successful. Captain Williams refers to one matter which I think I ought to explain. He says the Holloway prison is out of the City of London. The Commissioners are aware probably that in the Prison Act there is a clause which directs that any gaol built for any county, city or town, out of the boundaries thereof, shall be deemed to be part and portion of the county, city or town, to which it belongs. The Commissioners were desirous of having a return of the salaries and incomes of the different officers of the corporation. I have the returns made by each of the officers. They have been called upon for them, and they are contained in this bundle of papers (producing the same).

6759. Do those returns include the emoluments of all kinds, from all sources?—Everything, I believe. They were expressly required to make a return to that extent, stating all the sources from which their emoluments were derived.

6760. Are there any offices which continue to be saleable?—Some of them continue to be saleable in this manner,—they were originally sold with a power of alienation, while the holders were alive. With that exception there are none, and the corporation have not only ceased to sell any offices, but they are doing all in their power to bring up into their own hands those offices which heretofore were saleable. I dare say you received from the recorder a statement that that is now endeavoured to be effected, with respect to the attornies of the Mayor's court.

6761. Can you furnish us with a list of those officers of the corporation who purchased their offices?—I will take care that it shall be supplied.

6762. Are there many?—There is no considerable number.

6763. Did the present clerk of arraigns purchase his office?—No; I should say certainly not. The clerk of arraigns is appointed by the court itself.

6764. Will you furnish the Commissioners with a list of the present office-holders under the corporation who purchased their offices, and the sums which they gave for them?—Certainly. I have before me a list of the whole of the officers of the corporation, amounting in number to 262, which I beg to hand in (delivering in the same). In consequence of my former examination, I thought it was necessary to lay before you a list of the different committees—shewing the title of the committee, the chairman, and who is the minuting clerk. In some instances it will be seen that the minuting clerk is mentioned, but the names are not introduced—that is because those are not committees whose business is transacted in my office. This also I beg to lay before the Commissioners (producing the same.) I am likewise desirous of laying before you a description of the attendances, and the business done at the different committees contained in that list. I believe it will give the Commissioners the best information that can be given of the general working of the corporation; shewing how, by the division of labour, different subjects are sent to different committees, and how they have attended to the discharge of that duty. During the years 1852-53, there were twenty meetings of the Court of Aldermen; there were thirty meetings of the Court of Common Council; eight Courts of Conservancy for the counties of Surrey, Middlesex, Essex, and Kent; and common halls, for the election of Lord Mayors, sheriffs, and chamberlain. There were 160 meetings of committees of the Court of Aldermen and upwards of 800 meetings of committees of the Court of Common Council. The committees of aldermen are, first as to gaols, which is a committee of the whole court, consisting of twenty-six members, any three being a quorum. Its ordinary duties are, the superintendence of the several gaols belonging to the corporation, viz:—Newgate, the Debtors' Prison for London and Middlesex, and the new gaol at Holloway, contracting for the various articles for the prisoners' maintenance and works; ordering and directing the necessary repairs and alterations of the prisons, and the appointment of the various officers and servants, except those of governors, chaplain, and surgeons, who are immediately under the directions of the Court of Aldermen, their management and control. The general supervision of the gaols; receiving weekly reports from the visiting magistrates and keepers; preparing the annual report on the state and condition of the several City gaols, to the secretary of state under the provisions of the Gaol Act to be laid before Parliament, and all other matters arising from time to time out of questions connected with the prisons, their control and arrangement. Secondly,—There is a Finance committee, consisting of twenty-six members, the quorum of which is three. Their duties are, to examine bills and accounts for the maintenance of the prisoners, works or alterations or articles supplied for the prisons; all law and other bills in respect of the magistracy or police, and all demands on the Court of Aldermen for works done by or under their direction, and to report the same to the court for payment, with any remarks or observations they may consider requisite. Thirdly,—There is a committee as to privileges, who are similarly constituted. Their duties are confined to all matters of privilege, ceremonials, processions, or other public occasions, reporting from time to time to the court for their orders and instructions. Fourthly—A committee for the regulation and orders for the conduct of brokers, and any alterations that may be advisable to be made therein. Fifthly—A committee for General Purposes, which is a committee of the whole court; any three are a quorum. To this committee is referred all matters of charity, and all questions of a general and miscellaneous nature, not comprised in the foregoing categories. Sixthly,—The Livery Cloth committee, which is a committee for providing the livery cloth sent annually to the great officers of state and other parties to whom the same is issued under the directions of the Court of Aldermen. The duties of these committees being chiefly confined to the objects of their specific references, the preparation of their reports to the Court of Aldermen necessarily occupy a considerable additional portion of time. Then there is Emanuel Hospital, which is, strictly speaking, not a corporate trust. The aldermen are individually made trustees for that property; a committee for managing the affairs of that hospital meets weekly, or oftener if requisite, for the regulation of the charity; admissions of pensioners and children; repairs and alterations of the buildings at the hospital at Westminster, and also the management of the estate at Brandsburton. They audit the accounts and conduct all other matters connected with the charity generally. The number of meetings of these committees during the year 1852-3 were as follows: Gaols, 52; Finance, 18; Privileges, 4; General Purposes, 49; Livery Cloth, 1; Corporation of Poor, Emanuel Hospital, 44. The committees of the Court of Common Council are, the committee for Gresham affairs. That committee consists of the Lord Mayor, two aldermen and nine commoners, forming the City side, with the master wardens, and a similar number of the members of the Mercers' company forming the Company's side, they being joint trustees under Sir Thomas Gresham's will. Its duties are to carry into execution the respective trusts of Sir Thomas Gresham, as settled by his will; the election of lecturers;

the election of alms-people ; the superintendence of the Royal Exchange, and buildings connected therewith ; letting of shops, regulation of officers, and all other matters generally arising from that trust. The number of meetings during the year 1852-3 were twenty-seven. The Acts of Parliament of the 1st and 2nd Victoria, chapter 100, and the 5th and 6th Victoria, chapter 101, for rebuilding the Royal Exchange and improving the avenues adjoining thereto, were referred to this committee ; and the moiety of the expense incurred by the corporation in rebuilding, was upwards of 84,267*l.* Then there is the Thames Navigation and Port of London committee. Its duties, in respect of the conservancy are, to aid and assist the Lord Mayor as conservator of the river, in preventing impediments to the navigation, regulating encroachments, and abating nuisances in the river Thames within the jurisdiction of the City of London, from Staines to Yauntlet, and in granting accommodations, embankments, piles, moorings, &c. in the river. Its duties in respect of the navigation are, generally to superintend under the authority of several Acts of Parliament, all works and matters in respect of the locks, towing paths, &c., for the improvement of the navigation of the river, westward of London Bridge. Its duties in respect to the Port of London are, generally to superintend, under the authority of several Acts of Parliament, all works and matters in respect of the harbour service and public moorings within the Port of London. The committee consists of the Lord Mayor, eleven aldermen, and a member from each ward, making 41. The number of meetings in 1853 were 83. The average attendances at grand committees, about 16. The Coal and Corn and Finance committee is appointed to carry into execution the Acts of Parliament for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in London and Westminster, and in certain parts of the adjacent counties. To superintend the collection of the duties on coals and the City's wine dues, examine the accounts, and see that the monies are paid into the Chamber of London. To elect the ten corn meters in trust for the City, subject to the confirmation of the Court of Common Council. To elect a sufficient number of deputy or working meters of corn in the Port of London. To examine into the income, expenditure and liabilities of the corporation, and present such reports to the Court of Common Council thereon, from time to time, as may be requisite. To act as a committee of management of the London Almshouses at Brixton. To contract annually for the supply of coals under the bequest of Sir Thomas Campbell, knight and alderman, for the poor in several parishes in London and Southwark. To consider and report upon all references made by the Court of Common Council on petitions of charitable institutions for pecuniary assistance, as well as upon such other subjects as the court may make reference, especially upon any extraordinary work or public improvement proposed to be undertaken, which may incur expense, whereby the funds of the corporation may be in any manner charged or affected, so that the expense may be first reported to the court as to the means of carrying the same into effect. The number of members is twelve aldermen and twenty-nine common councilmen; the average attendance fifteen. The number of meetings in 1853 was sixty-four. I have with me the regulations respecting the qualifications of candidates for admission into the London Almshouses, which I need not trouble the Commissioners with. The General Purposes committee is generally for superintending works at and supply of furniture for the Mansion House, and also works in respect of the State Coach and harness ; besides any other special references from the court—such as the present case of inquiry in respect of metage and porterage. The committee consists of twelve aldermen and a commoner from each ward, making in all, forty-one. The number of meetings in 1853 was fifty-one. The average attendance at the grand committee is about twelve. The Library committee is appointed to superintend the library of the corporation in the Guildhall, appropriating out of the City's cash, under the authority of the Court of Common Council, the sum of 200*l.* per annum in the purchase of books. The number of members is twelve aldermen, and twenty-nine common councilmen. The average attendance is thirteen, and the number of meetings in 1853 was twenty-three. The Police committee consists of the Lord Mayor ; all the aldermen, twenty-five ; all the deputies, thirty ; and a member from each ward, twenty-nine—making in all eighty-five. Its duties are generally to transact all business under the Police Act, which the common council are by that Act directed to perform. The meetings in 1853 were thirty-two (in 1841 there were ninety-two meetings). The average attendance at the grand committees is about twenty-four or twenty-six. The Secondaries' committee has to consider all matters referred to them by the Court of Common Council in relation to the Secondaries, the Lord Mayor's Court, and the Sheriffs' Court. The committee consists of forty-one members, and there are usually present from twelve to fifteen ; the number of meetings in the year 1853 being thirty. The Parliamentary committee has to consider the various bills brought into Parliament likely to affect or interfere with the interests of the City of London, and referred to them by the Court of Common Council, as well as to other committees to which the Bills may relate. The committee consists of fifty-nine members, and there are usually present about eighteen, the number of meetings in the year 1853 being nine. The committee in relation to officers and clerks has to consider the nature, duties, and emoluments of such offices of the corporation as may become vacant, and be referred for inquiry by the Court of Common Council, and to present reports thereon with respect to the future appointments, and to superintend the offices and watch the accounts of the Sheriff's Court, under the Small Debts Act, taking the required security of the several clerks and bailiffs. The number of members is twelve aldermen and thirty common councilmen ; the average attendance is fifteen; the number of meetings in 1853 was thirty-two. The Law Bills committee has to examine all the law officers' bills referred to them by the Court of Common Council previous to their being paid. The committee consists of thirty-five members, and there are usually about thirteen present, chiefly professional gentlemen. The number of meetings in the year 1853 was six. That number is small, because the bills are chiefly referred to individual professional members of the committee, who consider them at their own homes, and report when the committee meets. The committee was appointed in 1842, and from that period to Michaelmas 1852, they have examined 715 bills of the law officers, amounting together to the sum of 72,466*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* To the Improvement committee, which is composed of twelve aldermen and twenty-nine commoners, with the chairmen of the committees of City Lands, Bridge House Estates, Markets, Sewers, and Markets' Improvements (beyond applications for improvements within the City generally), is committed the carrying into execution the following Acts of Parliament for public improvements:—The Act 9th Victoria, chapter 22, for improvements at Tudor Street; the Act 10th and 11th Victoria, chapter 280, for effecting improvements at Holborn Bridge, Field Lane, &c.; the Act 13th and 14th Victoria, for continuing the new street from Cannon Street towards St. Paul's; the Act 15th and 16th Victoria, for further continuing the above, and making improvements at Dowgate Hill, Finch Lane, Threadneedle Street, Mark Lane, and Tower Street; together with the Act of 1851, for making the new street from Farringdon Street to Clerkenwell Green. The number of meetings of this committee during the year 1852-3 was fifty-three, the time generally occupied therein was from one p.m. to five or six, or sometimes even to seven p.m.; the number of members attending averaged from eighteen to twenty. Their duties consist in investigating the claims of parties interested in premises required to be purchased, in settling the same, laying out the lines of new streets, letting the vacant ground, selling the ground rents, disposing of the property, and carrying the other provisions of the Acts into execution, reporting their proceedings from time to time to the Court, and at least annually, and it is right to state that the settlements generally have been effected by the committee by agreements with them and the parties interested, or by reference to surveyors, and very rarely by appealing to a jury under the provisions of the Acts of Parliament. The Consolidated committee consists of the chairmen of the several committees, together with the Lord Mayor, twelve aldermen, and a member from each ward, in all about sixty members, and their duties are to confer with Her Majesty's government and others upon such of the matters specially referred to the several committees as the Consolidated committee shall deem expedient. Also, to conduct the suits relative to metage and the bed and soil of the river Thames, and also to assist the Commissioners in their inquiry. The meetings in 1853 were forty-six. The average attendance at the grand committees has been about sixteen (but lately more). The Markets' Improvement committee consists of the Lord Mayor, eleven aldermen, and a member from each ward, in all, forty-one. Its duties are to consider what alterations and improvements should be made in the several markets of the City, and especially to carry into effect the new metropolitan cattle-market. The number of meetings in 1853 was thirty-four; the average attendance about seventeen or eighteen. The Freemens' Orphan School committee is appointed to carry into execution the Act of Parliament for establishing a school for the education and maintenance of orphans of freemen of London, which is about to be opened, in which provision is made for seventy boys and thirty girls. The number of members is twelve aldermen and twenty-nine common councilmen; the average attendance is fifteen. The number of meetings in 1853 was twenty-six. Meetings of sub-committees and deputations arising out of the committees are, of course, repeated from time to time, and are called for whenever occasion may require. I am sorry to have detained the Commissioners with this, which is rather a matter of detail, but I feel confident in stating that this will afford to them the best view of the practical working of all the affairs of the corporation of London. On referring to the little pocket-book which I handed in the other day, which contains an account of the different sums applied from time to time by the corporation of London to public improvements or charitable purposes, I have had the following summary made, which I think may be convenient:—"Contributions of the City of London for improvements for twenty-five years, commencing 1827, ending 1852, 560,064*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*; donations for charitable objects for the like period, 65,023*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*; expended for public purposes for the like period 25,869*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*; new prison at Holloway, 91,547*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.*; making a total of 116,958*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*; the total altogether being, 742,505*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* There is a matter respecting which the corporation have always felt strongly, which is the care they have taken of education within the City of London. The next witness, with your permission, will be Dr. Mortimer, who is at the head of one of the schools which has been of late years founded upon the munificence of a former town clerk, who afforded a considerable sum of money towards it, and also other funds which have been collected together.

6765. What are the schools to which you refer?—The school I have just referred to is the City of London school, that is of modern creation.

6766. Are they schools endowed under bequests, or are they schools supported out of the funds of the City of London?—Partly the one and partly the other. All the bequests which could be applicable for such a purpose are collected with the object of making a general fund; there is the bequest of a former town clerk, which is added to it, and from time to time such other sums have been added as are necessary to carry out the establishment.

H. A. Merewether.

6767. The corporation act as trustees in regard to those schools, do they?—Self-created trustees as far as their own funds go, and strictly trustees as far as the separate bequests go.

6768. Can you state to us what sum is annually devoted by the corporation of London out of their own income to the purposes of education?—I am not prepared with a statement at this moment, perhaps the Commissioners will permit me to enumerate the schools in the City of London,—there is the excellent school of Christ's Hospital; there is St. Paul's school; Merchant Tailors' school, and there is the school I have just referred to.

6769. What is the connection of the City with Christ's Hospital?—The connection of the City with Christ's Hospital is very considerable, there is a question respecting the extent to which they ought to go, which of course you would not wish me to trouble you with; but the fact with respect to Christ's Hospital is this, that originally in the reign of Edward the 6th, by the munificence of the Crown, funds were provided for the purpose of establishing Christ's Hospital, which were committed to the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London. At subsequent periods very large sums have been subscribed by private individuals, and they form another body in the hospital; from time to time that body has gained more influence in the hospital, and at last, when they came to the point where there was a competition of influence, quarrels and disputes arose. An Act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of settling those disputes, and what is the construction of that Act of Parliament is a question which for some time was agitated. All the aldermen in the corporation are governors of Christ's Hospital. A limited number of common councilmen appointed by Act of Parliament which I refer to are also governors, and they ought to meet and concur in matters connected with the hospital.

6770. A great many persons are governors who are not connected with the City?—After a certain period, as I have stated, private individuals advanced money for the benefit of the hospital, forming a very considerable sum. All persons paying a certain amount are governors.

6771. Practically the superintendence of the hospital is pretty much in the hands of the corporation authorities, is not it?—I do not know that I am prepared to say that. The administration of such a large establishment as that it may be easily conceived would get into different hands. Alderman Thompson is the president. The Lord Mayor for the time being, whenever a vacancy occurs, is usually appointed the president of that hospital as of the other hospitals. I believe at the present moment aldermen are presidents of all the hospitals.

6772. I presume the governors who become so by subscribing towards the funds of Christ's Hospital do not take a very active part in the direction of its concerns, do they?—Certainly not, the mass of them, some few do so. I was just going on to state that necessarily there would be persons required to superintend the funds of the corporation. There would be particular committees to do that, and there is a body called the almoners who have a very considerable influence over the affairs of the institution. There is also a court called the Court of Almoners. I believe upon that court there is not one of the corporation. That I need hardly say is rather a matter of complaint.

6773. With respect to the London Almshouses in aid of their original erection 1,500*l.* was granted. To the trustees of the London Almshouses in liquidation of the demands of several parties pursuant to an order of the common council of the 29th of October 1847 843*l.* 15*s.* was paid?—Those almshouses were originally built for a particular purpose; that purpose ceased, of course the original subscribers for that purpose had the option of withdrawing their money if they thought fit, and that was done to the extent of 843*l.* 15*s.*; other outstanding accounts amounted to 67*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*; contractor for building new alms-houses, repairs of existing houses, and necessary expenses attending thereon 1,955*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.*, making a total of 4,367*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* My intention has been throughout not to enter upon the evidence which has been laid before you, with a view of contradicting any particular part of it, so much as to state the facts which are connected with the corporation of London, but there are one or two points to which I think I ought to refer. The following is one of them, particularly connected with a fact which has since occurred in the corporation. It was represented to you that there was a society for the municipal reform of the corporation of London. I believe the numbers composing that society were stated to you as 1,200. I hold in my hand a paper which shows, I presume from authority because it bears the name of the person who gave you that information, that those 1,200 individuals have subscribed 1*s.* a piece or paid 1*s.* a piece for registration—unfortunately that leaves the society deficient in its funds. I had better, perhaps, read the following letter, which is from Mr. Acland; it is dated, "Offices, 27, Milk Street, 21st "December 1853, Sir,—The resolution of a public meeting of 1,200 members of this "association restricted its pecuniary sources to voluntary contributions. At an early meet-"ing of the committee I was induced to give my personal guarantee against their responsi-"bility for any portion of the expenses. During the more than five months which have "elapsed since the formation of this association the expenses incurred have amounted to "239*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* Against this liability I have received 60*l.* in registration fees, and "83*l.* 19*s.* in voluntary contributions, making a total of 143*l.* 19*s.* In an agitation for "the public good it is not right that the labour and the cost should fall upon one man. If "such should be your opinion, as I cannot doubt it will, you will probably feel disposed " to contribute some portion towards the present balance of 95*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* now standing " against yours faithfully, James Acland." The only observation I venture to make to the Commissioners upon the subject is this,—you were yesterday informed by the commissioner of police that the population of the City of London is 125,000 ; out of 125,000 only 1,200 have entered into this society, which has been formed in that manner. H. A. Merewether. 25th Jan. 1854.

6774. It was stated by Mr. Acland that those 1,200 were householders ?—I do not know how that may be. If that is the fact, and it is material, I had better refer to the number of householders in the City. You are aware that the number is very considerable. The number of householders in 1844 was 13,958. I must add to that, another observation, to which, individually, I think too much weight cannot be given. It is the fact, that since these examinations have taken place before you, stating all the complaints which can be made of the City of London, and of the misconduct of the corporation, the annual elections in the wardmotes have taken place. There have been some changes, certainly, caused by death and by resignation. Mr. Bennoch, who appeared before the Commissioners here, withdrew, but, I believe, there were not above two changes in the election of those common councilmen who formed the corporation for last year. In one of those two instances, there was a contest. The dispute did not involve any question of respectability or misconduct, but the mere question, whether one of two individuals was not more active than the other. This having taken place, after all that has been said against the common council, I think I may venture to press it upon the Commissioners as a decisive return, if I may so use the expression, by the citizens assembled in wardmote, who have re-elected the individuals before appointed. Some allusion was made in the evidence to public offices within the City of London. I do not know whether these places were included in the list :—the Custom House, the Post Office, the Bank of England, the Royal Exchange, the East India House, the Trinity House. Some of those were mentioned, but I do not know whether this was before the Commissioners, that of the fifty-seven banking establishments in the metropolis, forty-four are within the City of London, and thirteen west of Temple Bar.

6775. Is there any banking establishment of any kind east of the City ?—I am told that in Whitechapel there is a branch of the London and Westminster Bank.

G. F. W. Mortimer, D.D., having been sworn, was examined as follows. G.F.W. Mortimer, D.D.

6776. You are connected with the educational establishments of the City of London, are you not ?—I am the head master of the City of London school.

6777. How long have you held that office ?—Fourteen years, nearly.

6778. What is the nature of that establishment ?—It is a large school, mainly intended for the citizens of London ; that is to say, the Act of Parliament recognises the right of all liverymen and freemen to send their children there, and gives permission likewise to the Court of Common Council, in Guildhall assembled, to make such alterations as are necessary from time to time. One alteration which has been made, has been to enlarge the permission to send boys thither, and to give all persons, wherever resident, leave to send boys, keeping the rights of freemen and householders undisturbed, they taking the first vacancies.

6779. Are those who attend the schools day scholars or boarders, or both ?—They are day scholars, but the masters who please may take boarders.

6780. Do many of the masters take boarders ?—Two of them. There may be twenty boarders, perhaps.

6781. The main object is to make it a school available, in the first instance, to freemen and liverymen, and also allowing other persons to send their children ?—Yes, as vacancies occur.

6782. What is the number of scholars at the City schools ?—We closed the last half year with 568 boys. Our present number is about 580.

6783. Is the school self-supporting ?—It is partly endowed and partly self-supporting. John Carpenter, to whom allusion was just now made, a former town clerk of the City of London, left some closes of land for the support and education of four boys. These closes of land have been built over, and the income is now fixed, under an Act of Parliament, at 900*l.* a-year. The corporation have built a school, and charged the permanent maintenance of the structure upon their own funds. Besides that, each boy pays, during the year, 8*l.* 5*s.*

6784. Is the 900*l.* a-year the only endowment ?—It is, except for scholarships. There are a considerable number of scholarships. Four boys were to be educated under John Carpenter's bequest. That number has been increased to eight. Eight boys receive free education,—25*l.* a-year to pay for their board, and 50*l.* a-year on leaving school to apprentice them to any trade, and exhibitions to one of the Universities, if they go thither, with 50*l.* to pay the expenses of matriculation and rooms, besides which, there have been a considerable number of endowments from private individuals during the last few years. The late Mr. Henry Beaufoy has endowed the school with four scholarships to the University of Cambridge. Alderman Salomons has endowed the school with one scholarship, to either Oxford, Cambridge, or London.

G.F.W. Mortimer, D.D.

6785. What number of boys is the school capable of accommodating?—About 600 at the utmost.

6786. It is now nearly full, then?—It is now about full. I expect in about a week or ten days it will be full; we are just now commencing.

6787. What class of persons, generally speaking, make use of the school?—It is a very difficult question to answer. Every class connected with the City, from the higher to the lower—we exclude none. Any boy is admitted on obtaining the nomination of a member of the Court of Common Council. The intention is that it shall be purely a republic of letters, and that all who can pay for their education shall be admitted, 6788. Is there any distinction made in the payments demanded from the boys between the children of liverymen and the children of others?—None. The only privilege is, that the first vacancies are taken by liverymen.

6789. Is the education a classical education?—The first division is the lower school. consisting of four classes, and averaging about 240 boys. In that part of the school, which may be called the English or preparatory school, they are taught English grammar, writing, arithmetic; in the upper division of that department, French, physical geography, and general and English history. Then in the upper school there are 360 boys on the average, for we are generally full.

6790. In the lower school are they taught the rudiments of the dead languages or not?—Not in the under school. They then pass into the upper school, which consists of eight classes. In that school there are generally about 360 boys. They are all necessarily taught the classics, French, arithmetic, and mathematics. In the three head classes they are taught Greek; in the classes below them, Latin only; besides which, German is an optional study, without an additional charge. Choral singing is optional without an additional charge, and, with an additional charge, chemistry and drawing. There are classes in chemistry and drawing twice a week.

6791. I suppose when a youth has gone through this education, he is fit to enter at one of our Universities?—Yes. Since I have been head master only one of our boys has failed of getting a Trinity scholarship in his first year. I think I may fairly say that our mathematical standard is higher than that of any other school in the kingdom.

6792. I suppose many boys come to your school whose principal object is to obtain a good commercial education?—The bulk of our boys go into business in the City; but there are several who are tempted by our scholarships, who go on to the Universities. In the two head classes the greater number go on to the Universities; but below that, they are mainly dispersed through the different trades and businesses of the City.

6793. Do your boys avail themselves of the Gresham lectures?—I do not think they do.

6794. Do not you think there might be some connection established between the two institutions which might be useful?—It would interfere with our hours. The lectures are in the middle of the day; the bulk of the boys go home to their dinners between twelve and two o'clock. If they were given in the evening, the boys have abundance to do at night.

6795. Where is the school situated?—It occupies the site of what was Stoney Lane market.

6796. As I understand, this school is self-supporting, with the exception of 900*l.* a year, which it derives from endowments, and the house and building?—Yes; and the keeping up of the building. There are now about seventeen scholarships, which have originated almost entirely since I have been head master. They have been the gifts of various freemen and liverymen of the City of London. Mr. Beaufoy has given us 10,000*l.* There is Alderman Salomon's scholarship, and the Times newspaper scholarship. The friends of the late Mr. Travers founded a scholarship as a testimonial to his public services; those of Mr. Lambert Jones have done the same. We are much more largely endowed than King's College, which has been at work twice as long.

6797. Those appear to be evidences that the school is highly thought of in the City?—Yes; it is looked on in the City as their own school. It is answering well, and they are doing all they can for it. Its management is vested in a ward committee. That is a committee which consists of twelve aldermen and one member from each ward. It is presided over by a chairman, like other committees. At the meetings of the committee the head master is summoned. The usual plan is that all the important business is transacted by a sub-committee, which consists of some few of the members of the committee—those who have attended most punctually, and the chairman, and the head master is always summoned to attend. They send up their recommendations to the general committee, which are either adopted or referred back again.

6798. Are boys admissible to this school without distinction of religious persuasion?—Entirely. We have at the present time as many as thirty Jews, and I believe we are the only school in the kingdom in which a Jewish boy has obtained a scholarship.

6799. How is religious instruction provided for?—Under the Act of Parliament the authorized version of the Scriptures is to be read and taught daily. The school is opened and closed with a form of prayer, which is abridged from the Liturgy of the Church of England. I have given the Act of Parliament a most liberal interpretation, with the entire sanction of the Court of Common Council. We do not compel the Jewish lads to attend the prayers. The school is opened with prayers, but we allow the Jewish lads to come in after prayers, and leave before prayers. They attend during the reading of the Scriptures in the classes, and it is optional with them when they get into the upper classes to ask permission to read the Greek Testament with me and the other masters. It is almost always done, I suppose, because it is optional.

G.F.W. Mortimer, D.D.

6800. In the case of a boy of Roman Catholic parents, is he obliged to attend during prayers, or would he be allowed to absent himself?—We have never had any objection raised, except in the case of Irish Roman Catholics; of English Roman Catholics we have a considerable number, and also of foreign Roman Catholics, and dissenters of all denominations. I should think as many dissenters as church people. I have given the Irish Roman Catholics the same permission which I gave to the Jewish lads, viz,, of absenting themselves from prayer, but being present during the reading of the Scriptures. In two instances they have declined availing themselves of it, and those two boys were not admitted. I considered what the Jewish lads did not object to, it was fair to expect from professing Christians.

6801. Is there any test with respect to the twenty boarders?—That is quite an optional matter. Any master may take a boarder who pleases. We always endeavour to give the masters the privilege of taking boarders if they like, in order to assist their income. The only other large school which is directly connected with the corporation is one now being formed for the orphans of freemen and liverymen, which is something on the model of Christ's Hospital. At that school they are all to be boarded.

6802. That is rather in the nature of a charity?—It is.

6803. Is that exclusively for the orphans of freemen and liverymen?—It is.

6804. Have you anything to do with the management of that?—Nothing further than that I was one of three referees to select the candidates.

6805. Is that exclusively for those orphans?—Exclusively for the orphans of freemen. The funds which arise from payments for taking out freedoms are applied to its maintenance. I should say that nothing can work better than the committee always has done. The chairman, most happily, has been always re-elected. The same chairman has been continued for the last fourteen years, during the time I have been connected with the school. I consider that a most important matter, because a permanent chairman possesses the confidence of the masters; they feel perfectly at home in addressing themselves to him, and there are many little matters of detail from time to time, upon which it is desirable to take the opinion of the chairman, but which, perhaps, it is not thought expedient always to refer to the committee. The committee, though a ward committee, is generally composed of those persons who feel an interest in the school, and who, if they wish to be returned, are returned again by their respective wards. So that we see, from time to time, the same members re-elected, I think, for the third or fourth time. In my experience of the working of the committee, I never have had the least difficulty of any kind; every suggestion has been readily attended to. I have suggested, for example, the introduction of choral singing, the introduction of classes in chemistry, and the adoption of the system of drawing, according to the Government plan. Those and various other things have all been readily assented to.

6806. Is it usual for boys who are destined for commerce to go through the entire course of the studies of the school?—The plan of the school has been somewhat adapted from the Prussian Gymnasia. After entering the upper school they go on with arithmetic, mathematics, Latin, and French necessarily, and German optionally, up to a certain point in the school. Then there is what is called the Latin class—it is called the Latin class only because they do not learn Greek in it. The boys then separate, either to take rather more to the commercial, or to go on with a strictly classical and mathematical education. In the Latin class, book-keeping is much attended to; nearly all the boys learn German. If they pass into the Greek and strictly mathematical class, they go on with pure mathematics.

6807. Do the majority of them receive the classical education?—Yes; nearly all, if they remain long enough. Out of the number of 600, there are not above three or four annually requesting permission to remain in the English part of the school. The number of boys attending the chemistry classes, which is a paid addition, is about 170. All in the upper school, and a considerable number in the lower school, to the number of about 450, are educated in French. About 70 learn German, and about 90 drawing.

6808. You stated that the only payment required from a boy is 8*l.* 5*s.* a year?—Yes; that includes French, German, and choral singing if he pleases, with classics, mathematics, and everything taught in the school but chemistry and drawing. Those are self-supporting classes. I may mention, as the subject has been referred to, that the corporation have nothing to do with the government of Christ's Hospital. It is governed by a court of almoners, which is selected from the governors, and they are a self-elected body, filling up their own vacancies.

6809. What is the number of the court?—I believe forty.

6811. The court of governors is a very fluctuating body, is it not?—Yes; as vacancies occur in the court of almoners, they fill up their own vacancies. The court of almoners really govern Christ's Hospital, and fill up vacancies by their own vote. I have with me a prospectus of the school, which contains its rules and a statement of its scholarships and prizes, which I beg to deliver in (delivering in the same).

William Payne, Esq.

WILLIAM PAYNE, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6812. What situation do you hold in connection with the corporation of London?—I am coroner for the City and borough of Southwark.

6813. By whom were you appointed?—By the Court of Common Council.

6814. Is your appointment for life, or during pleasure?—It is for life although it is called an annual appointment. There is no power to displace me except for sufficient cause.

6815. Why do you say it is called an annual appointment?—Some time since, the corporation made an order that all officers should be elected annually, therefore it stands in the list in that way.

6816. Does the form of election actually take place every year?—I really do not know; I dare say it does.

6817. Then it is annual after all, is not it?—No; it is a freehold office, and they would have no power to displace me except for sufficient cause.

6818. Are you quite sure that the corporation take the same view of the tenure of your office as you do?—I do not know; but the Court of Queen's Bench have so decided, that the office of coroner is a freehold office, and that a man cannot be displaced without a sufficient cause.

6819. What are the duties of your office?—Just the same as those of the office in the county,—to hold inquests in cases of violent death.

6820. You hold inquests in Southwark, as well as in London do you?—I do.

6821. There is no other coroner in Southwark?—None.

6822. Are your fees paid out of the corporation funds?—Yes, by the corporation, out of their funds, and the expenses of the office also, which in other places would come out of the county rate.

6823. To what fund are those charged?—City's cash, I believe it is called.

6824. What is the amount of the emoluments of your office?—I made a return for the year 1852,—I think it is about 500*l.*; it does not vary much.

6825. It depends upon the number of inquests?—Yes.

6826. Are there any observations which you wish to address to the Commission?—I am not aware of any.

Mr. E. Woodthorpe.

MR. EDMUND WOODTHORPE, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6827. You are a district surveyor, I believe, for the City?—I am; I am appointed by the Court of Aldermen.

6828. What are the duties of your office?—To attend to all buildings which are erected within the City; that is in one portion of the City, the northern division. There are four district surveyors, but I happen also to hold a small division in the county of Middlesex, and therefore I have an advantage in seeing the practice both in the City and in the county. My motive in appearing here is, that under the Act of Parliament I have had great difficulty in dealing with parish bodies, in inducing them to condemn or rather assist me to condemn ruinous buildings, which I consider one of my most essential services.

6829. You have not found that difficulty in the City?—Not in the least.

6830. What is the difference between the law in the City, and the rest of the metropolis?—Upon perceiving a ruinous building, that is, one which we consider to be dangerous to the public, or upon having information of a ruinous building, we forthwith examine it, and apply to the official referees in conformity with the Act of Parliament for their authority for a survey. When that is done, we report back again to the official referees, and they send their report in the City to the Court of Aldermen, and in the county to the overseers of the poor. I can give the Commissioners an instance in which nearly two years expired before I could get the overseers to act in any way, whereas the Court of Aldermen acted rigidly in conformity with the time specified by the Act of Parliament in every instance. In the case I mentioned, which is a building in Ratcliffe, I found in the year 1849 it was ruinous and defective. I applied for authority, and received authority from the official referees, which I generally do instantly, and I then made my surveys and forwarded my report. That report, after leaving me, I only see at the office. I have a copy sent to me when it is sent to the overseers. That report was forthwith sent to the overseers of the Hamlet of Ratcliffe, and they never moved in it at all. At last I went before a justice of the peace, thinking I might gain some assistance, inasmuch as the building was nearly falling, and parts had fallen next the river. I then attended before the magistrate, and I could get no redress there, because he said he had no funds, or could make no order to get any funds, to carry out the hoarding of any building, or pay any expenses which might be incurred. I then wrote to the overseers, and their clerk gave me a very satisfactory answer that they did not choose to interfere with it—that it was my own duty. I could not press them any further, but I asked them to allow me to have a meeting with them. I attended two evenings and I told them the matter was urgent; that I came there to relieve myself as a public officer; that I would not bear the onus in case of the building falling, and they must take the blame if anything happened, as the building was in a dangerous state. They then thought rather seriously about it. But I take it that the motive is this —they seldom like, in those districts, to interfere with the property of other people. In the case of the Court of Aldermen, however, they act in an independent manner; forthwith, upon the receipt of my report, they give directions to the architect to have the building boarded in, and after seven days have expired, if notice has been given to the owner, and if the building is not destroyed or pulled down, they send their officer to see that it is carried out.

Mr. E. Woodthorpe.

6831. Suppose the overseers are willing to act, what powers have they?—They are enabled to provide for it out of the poor rate, under clause 40 of the 7th and 8th Victoria, chapter 84.

6832. It appears from that clause that the aldermen of the City, and the overseers of the parishes have precisely the same powers; but you state that in the one case the power is more independent and more efficient than in the other?—Yes.

6833. And whereas the act is carried into effect in the City—in the parishes out of the City it is very imperfectly so?—Very.

Mr. N. Saunders.

Mr. NATHANIEL SAUNDERS having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6834. What office do you hold under the corporation?—I am the water bailiff.

6835. How long have you held that situation?—Thirty years.

6836. By whom were you appointed?—The Court of Common Council.

6837. Is it an annual appointment?—It is.

6838. I suppose it has been proved in your case, that if the corporation are satisfied with the manner in which the duties are performed the officer is continued?—It is so.

6839. What is the salary attached to your office?—500*l.* a year.

6840. Are there any other emoluments?—No other emoluments; my expenses are paid.

6841. What are your duties?—To attend at the Mansion House every Wednesday and Saturday, and occasionally upon public days, as one of the esquires of the Lord Mayor's household, and obey all the Lord Mayor's orders. To arrange for holding Courts of Conservancy, and attend the Lord Mayor as conservator; also the views of the juries on the Thames and Medway, and to superintend the fishery under the Lord Mayor's deputation. To attend the Lady Mayoress on Easter Monday and such other times as are required. To invite the judges, and attend them to St. Paul's on the first Sunday in Easter term. To view, once in every three months, or oftener if required, the river between Putney and Blackwall, and in April and October the whole jurisdiction. To take cognizance of all drifts and strays, and submit the accounts to the Navigation committee. To attend all meetings and views of the Navigation committee. To keep a record and superintend the execution of all grants made by them, and obey all their orders. To give directions to my several assistants, and receive their reports. To keep a journal and report to the Lord Mayor or Navigation committee obstructions, encroachments, and nuisances, whenever necessary. To report to the Navigation committee the death of the City barge master, thirty-two City watermen, and eight water bailiff's men.

6842. Your duties are quite distinct from those of the harbour master?—Yes.

6843. What are your duties on the river?—As connected with the encroachments upon the river and erections under the sanction of the corporation.

6844. Do you survey the river?—Yes: I survey the river from time to time—and if I observe any encroachment which has not been authorized by the corporation, it is my duty to report it.

6845. The bed of the river is under the superintendence of the harbour master, is not it?—The stream of the river is under the superintendence of the harbour master. Between high and low water mark is all under my jurisdiction.

6846. Above bridge the river is altogether under your direction?—Not altogether; the clerk of the works has authority from London Bridge westward.

6847. The harbour master, I suppose, does not interfere with anything except what is really the harbour?—No.

6848. What is the distinction between your duties and those of Mr. Leach?—Mr. Leach is the engineer; a great many of my duties might be called engineering duties; but I am no engineer, and do not profess to be one. I have to give my opinion as to whether piers and so on which are applied for will be an obstruction to the navigation.

6849. Do you consult with some engineer upon questions of that sort?—No; I decide them from my own experience of what I have seen.

6850. On any point which requires engineering knowledge it is necessary for you to resort to the opinion of some person who has professional information, is not it?—It may be so on difficult matters; but having had considerable experience, it very seldom occurs that I should not be able to rely sufficiently upon my own judgment to give an opinion, whatever might be the value of it.

Mr. N. Saunders.

25th Jan. 1854.

6851. Some time ago there was a contemplated construction upon the banks of the river bridge, upon the premises of Messrs. Price, was not there?—There was an application.

6852. Was that question referred to you?—It was not referred to me as an officer of the committee. I had to give my opinion.

6853. In what state is that question now?—I believe it is before the Woods and Forests.

6854. For what purpose?—It is necessary under the proceedings in Chancery for the Navigation committee to give information to the Woods and Forests of all proposed grants, which are that they may, if they see fit, object.

6855. Did you express an opinion upon that point?—Yes.

6856. Did it involve engineering questions?—Yes.

6857. As far as that matter involved engineering questions did you feel yourself competent to express an opinion?—I did.

6858. But you have never been educated as an engineer?—No. I have obtained very considerable experience during the thirty years of my service.

6859. You think your experience in practically watching the river supplies the want of regular engineering information on such questions, and that you were able to give an opinion upon such a point?—In that case I was.

6860. Did the corporation consult any person who had professional engineering knowledge?—Yes; Mr. Leach.

6861. Did your opinion and his coincide?—They did.

6862. You did not object to the construction?—No.

6863. Have you any other observations which you wish to make?—No. It has been suggested to me that there appears to be some omission in the evidence, and that the Commission might understand that there is no superintendence between London Bridge and Putney Bridge. That is not the fact, inasmuch as both Mr. Leach and myself supervise that part of the river.

Mr. C. H. James.

Mr. Charles Henry James, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

6864. What office do you hold in connection with the corporation?—I am one of the harbour masters of the Port of London.

6865. How many harbour masters are there?—Four.

6866. Are they all upon the same footing?—No, there are grades in them.

6867. Is there a principal harbour master?—There is a principal harbour master; he is ill at present, and unable to attend.

6868. What are the salaries attached to those offices?—The junior harbour master receives 300*l.* a year; the one next to him 350*l.*; the next 400*l.*, and the next 500*l.* That was the case in 1852.

6869. What are the duties which you perform?—We have to enforce the due observance of the bye-laws, and to perform and execute all and every such other matter, and things as are ordered or directed by the Port of London committee. We have to keep all the books which may be necessary; to attend them on views and to attend them in committee when required.

6870. How long have you held the situation?—Fourteen years, on the 13th of February next.

6871. What means had you of acquiring a knowledge of the river before you were appointed?—The nomination rests with the Lord Mayor. We are then examined by the Trinity masters as to our fitness, and then appointed under an Act of Parliament, the 10th of George the Fourth, c. 124, and placed in the situation in which we are to act by the Port of London committee.

6872. Cannot a harbour master be appointed by the corporation unless he shall have passed a preliminary examination by the Trinity House?—No; under the same Act of Parliament that is provided for.

6873. Do you take your directions and make your communications directly with the Navigation committee, or do you take your instructions from the head harbour master?—We take our instructions from the head harbour master.

6874. You are not yourself probably very conversant with the mode of transacting business in the committee?—I am perfectly.

6875. You do not yourself communicate with them?—No; I communicate with the principal harbour master, and he communicates with the committee. We act also under bye-laws regulating the navigating, placing, mooring, unmooring, and removing all ships and other vessels in the river Thames, except in any docks made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament. The number of vessels which have entered the river is very large. In the year 1853 there were 30,099, with a tonnage of 6,291,989—that is exclusive of coasters. In 1851 the coasters amounted to 9,253, with a tonnage of 1,386,450. In the docks there were 6,796 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,631,205; so that the accommodation in the docks was taken advantage of only by 6,796 vessels, or about one-fifth of the whole number of vessels.

6876. It is your duty to watch from time to time the state of the bed of the river, is not it?—It is.

Mr. C. H. James.

25th Jan. 1854.

6877. Is it in a condition which requires considerable works to be executed, with a view to the removal of shoals?—I think not.

6878. It has been represented to the Commissioners that there are shoals in the river which it would be very desirable to remove at considerable expense. Do you believe that to be so?—A few of them should be rather deepened. The Whiting shoal was partially removed some years ago, and a depth of fifteen feet water made upon it; but I think it would be very dangerous to meddle very much with the shoals. I do not say that there might not be a partial dredging of the shoals with a good effect, but it would be very dangerous to meddle considerably with them, inasmuch as Mr. Leach has shown, in his evidence, that by the removal of Old London Bridge even the tide ebbs lower and rises higher than it did when old London Bridge was standing; consequently if you removed a shoal, to the effect produced by which London Bridge bears no comparison, I think you would have the water much lower, and consequently much higher.

6879. Have you any other observations which you wish to make?—I wish to refer to Mr. Powles's evidence. He wished the Port Committee to be composed of dock secretaries, and people belonging to the dock companies, and so on. I cannot help thinking that it would be a very dangerous thing to allow those dock officers to have a voice in the committee. In fact they are much more independent as they are. We see that only a small proportion, namely, one-fifth of the vessels, use the docks. If, as he says, the secretaries and officers of the dock companies cannot attend to civic offices, and so on, it can hardly be supposed that they could to attend the general interests of the river. They might attend when the interest of their particular dock was concerned, but I do not think they would attend when it was not.

6880. Are there many questions between the Conservancy committee and the docks?—None that I know of.

6881. It does not appear at present that the docks have much interest in the conservancy of the river?—I think their interests are all cared for, and well cared for.

6882. The qualities to be chiefly sought for on such a committee would seem to be independence and a knowledge of the subject?—They have considerable knowledge of the subject. It has been represented to the Commission that they have no knowledge; whereas they are elected for four years, one fourth only going out every year. They therefore acquire a competent knowledge of the duty, and they act as a jury. They do not simply sit as a committee, but they act as a jury and argue the point. Mr. Pratt says that his steam-boats find great difficulty in getting up and down the river. Now they publish a book weekly of the times of starting their boats, which have no reference whatever to the state of the tide—so that some of the vessels must get down to those shoals at low water—but they always pass over them in safety, except when they choose to navigate on a dark night, and they cannot see exactly the position of the vessel. Then they may get on shore.

6883. Are there many shoals in the river?—Yes; there are a good many shoals, but none of any consequence now. The Port committee have removed a great many, and the Trinity House likewise have made good channels everywhere The only obstructions, which can be called obstructions, to a very free navigation of the river at present are the Whiting shoal, the shoals off Barking, the Cold Harbour shoals, and the shoal a little below Erith.

6884. Do the shoals accumulate again when they have once been deepened?—I should say they would in time.

6885. But slowly?—Very slowly. When once a course is made for the stream of the river, it will naturally keep itself clear.

6886. Is your time fully occupied?—It is.

6887. Will you describe a little in detail what it is you do?—I give directions for the mooring and unmooring of all vessels which enter the port of London.

6888. Do you attend personally to that duty?—Yes.

6889. Is there anything else which you do of importance?—I take soundings when required.

6890. Is there any division made of the harbour between the four harbour masters?—Yes; one is at Limehouse, one at Greenwich, one at Gravesend, and there is a superintending harbour master who superintends the whole.

6891. Where do you reside?—At Limehouse. We have two assistants to the harbour masters.

6892. Has the Admiralty any officer on the river who superintends the shipping in any way?—Near the dockyards they have.

6893. They do not interfere at all with the mercantile shipping?—Not at all.

6894. The mercantile shipping in the river is exclusively under the control of the Navigation committee?—Exclusively.

M. E. Wilkinson, Esq.

Michael Eaton Wilkinson, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

6895. What office do you hold in connection with the corporation?—I am clerk of the London Small Debts Court.

6896. How long have you held that situation?—I have been clerk between three and four years.

M. E. Wilkinson, Esq.

25th Jan. 1854.

6897. Were you a member of the common council before you were chosen to the present office?—I was a member of the court at one time; but I was six years out of the court before I became a candidate for my present office.

6898. What are the emoluments annexed to the office?—The salary is stated at 400*l.*, but it is subject to some deductions which leave it 371*l.* or 372*l.*

6899. Have you no other emoluments?—No other. I am obliged to be an attorney to hold the office, but I have entirely given up practice.

6900. What are the duties of the office which you hold?—To issue, or cause to be issued, all summonses, warrants, precepts, and writs of execution; and register, or cause to be registered, all orders and judgments of the court; and keep or cause to be kept, an account of all proceedings of the court. To take charge of and keep, or cause to be taken charge of and kept, an account of all court fees and fines payable or paid into court, and to enter, or cause to be entered, an account of all such fees, fines, and monies in a book belonging to the court to be kept for that purpose; and, at such times as shall be directed by the order of the court, to submit my accounts to be audited or settled by the treasurer, and so often as I may be required so to do, deliver to the treasurer a full account in writing of the fees received in the court, and a like account of all fines imposed by the court, and of the expense of levying the same, and to pay over to the treasurer quarterly or oftener, by order of the court, the monies remaining in my hands over and above such balance as I may be allowed by order of the court to retain for the current expenses of the court; and once in every year, or oftener if required, to make out and send to the Mayor, aldermen, and commoners an account of all sums paid over by me to the treasurer of the court; and in the month of March to make out a correct list of all sums of money belonging to the suitors in the court which shall have been paid into court and remained unclaimed for five years before the first day of the month of January then last past, specifying the names of the parties for whom or on whose account the same were so paid into court.

6901. Are you aware of the evidence which has been given by Mr. Russell Gurney to the Commissioners?—I did not hear of it; I saw a report of it in the newspapers.

6902. Are you minutely acquainted with the manner in which the proceedings in the court are conducted?—I am.

6903. Does it appear to you that that court on the whole gives satisfaction to the suitors?—It is my decided opinion that it is generally satisfactory to the suitors, and increases in that respect every year.

6904. The business increases as the character of the court is better known?—The business has so increased as to induce me to form that opinion, and also from expressions I hear from the suitors with whom I come in contact in the discharge of my duties. If the Commissioners will allow me, I will show what has been the increase to which I refer. The court opened on the 29th of September 1847. Between that time and Christmas, there were 2,300 summonses issued. That was a quarter of a year, and it was thought desirable to bring the whole within a running twelvemonth. The court then began a new account. In 1848, the number was 7,886; in 1849, the number was 8,603; in the year 1850, the number was 8,484—that is a small decrease from the previous year—in the year 1851, it was 8,754; in the year 1852, 9629; and in the last year, 10,279; so that it has been gradually increasing from its opening up to the present moment.

6905. Is the great majority of those cases settled before they come to a hearing?—No. About one-half are settled or otherwise disposed of. About half the number are tried.

6906. In what proportion of those cases is a jury asked for?—In the year 1852, there were only 15 juries; in the year 1853 there were 36 juries; but it struck all of us in the office as being an unusual number. We do not have the number of trials by juries which we expected we should have, that power being left to the suitors; from which I might be permitted to say, perhaps, I collect that the suitors are better satisfied with the decision by the judge, who gives his reasons for the judgment, than with the decision of a jury who do not give their reasons for their judgment.

6907. Either party may ask for a jury?—Either party may ask for a jury.

6908. In what cases do they ask for a jury—is it in the most important cases, or is it accidental?—It is quite accidental. I cannot state that they are the most important cases undoubtedly. Most of those juries have been in causes in which I should have thought the suitors would rather have taken the determination of the judge.

6909. What is the class of persons who are generally suitors in the court?—All classes. In any case which occurs within the jurisdiction of the City, a party may sue and be sued in the court.

6910. Are members of the corporation often parties to suits?—Not often, certainly. I should say by comparison the number is very small.

6911. Is there any other fact which you would wish to mention?—By the Act of Parliament, the common council have the power to diminish the fees when they may think proper, and the power to re-impose them when they think proper. On the 28th of July 1853, the fees were diminished in this manner. The court directed, "That the "fee of one shilling in the pound now payable under the head of general fund fees, be "lessened by sixpence in the pound. That the fee paid for every summons issued under "the 38th section of the Act of Parliament, of 7d. in the pound, usually receivable with "the fee of one penny in the pound to the high bailiff, under the head of plaint fees, be

M. E. Wilkinson, Esq.

25th Jan. 1854.

"lessened by fourpence in the pound on all debts and demands under 20*l.* That the fee "for every judgment by consent be lessened from twenty-six pence in the pound to "thirteen pence in the pound. That the fee for every judgment summons be lessened by "threepence in the pound. That the fee of twopence in the pound payable on paying in, "and the like fee of twopence in the pound payable on receiving out monies be dis-"continued." This has not extended for so long a period of time as to enable me to give anything like the aggregate amount, it is only dated the 28th of July, but I calculate from the decrease made according to this scale, it will be the means of reducing the receipts from the fees to the extent of about 1,000*l.* a year.

6912. Has the business been increased by the reduction in the fees?—I think the reduction is beginning so to operate. The expressions of satisfaction are very general on the part of all persons when they find the amount which has been reduced.

6913. There is an appeal in all causes between 20*l.* and 50*l.*, is there not?—Yes.

6914. Have there been many appeals?—There have been no appeals in the City Court.

6915. The judge of the Sheriff's Court is the judge of the Small Debts Court, is not he?—He is.

6916. Is there any provision in the Act with respect to the salary he is to receive as judge of the Small Debts Court?—No, not in that Act. It is a matter of arrangement on the part of the corporation.

6917. It is a matter of arrangement with the corporation what the amount of the judge's salary shall be?—Quite so.

6918. I see there is a provision in section 15 that no clerk, treasurer, bailiff, or other officer of the said court shall, either by himself or his partners, be directly engaged as an attorney or agent in any proceeding in the court. Is there any clause which prevents his practising generally in the other courts?—No, there is no such clause; but I have given up my practice to devote myself to the duties of that office, feeling that they are quite enough to occupy me.

6919. You are not prevented by this Act from carrying on business in any other court?—Certainly not.

6920. Where is the court held?—It is held in the building called the Sheriff's Court at the corner of Basinghall Street, in Guildhall Buildings. The building which was the old Court of Requests, the old Court of Requests having been abolished, has been altered and modified and made the Sheriff's Court.

6921. What becomes of all the fees in the court?—I pay the fees which I receive into the chamber every week.

6922. Supposing the fees exceed the expenses of the court, what becomes of the difference?—That the corporation have power to dispose of as they think proper.

6923. Those are fees taken from the suitors?—Yes.

6924. Then the corporation may make a profit of the court; is that so?—They might perhaps, have the power to do so, but I cannot conceive it possible that they would do so. If they find there is an accumulation of more money than is necessary, they have power to reduce the fees, as they have already done, so as to leave enough to meet the exigencies of the case. Week by week, I pay the amount of the fees into the chamberlain's office.

6925. Is there anything charged to the fee fund of the court by way of rent for the building in which the court is held?—I know it to be so, though it is not in my department. The court pays, I think, the sum of 280*l.* to the corporation for the use of the building.

6926. Out of the fee fund of the court?—Yes.

6927. Is there any provision in the Act with respect to the salary of the bailiffs, or is that left in the discretion of the corporation?—That is left in the discretion of the corporation.

6928. Do you know what they are paid?—Yes.

6929. What are the salaries which they are paid as compared with the salaries of the bailiffs in county courts in general?—I do not know what the bailiffs in the county courts have.

6930. What is the salary paid to the bailiffs of the City Court?—200*l.* a year to the chief bailiff, 100*l.* to two of the under bailiffs, and 80*l.* to two others of the under bailiffs.

6931. You do not know what proportion that bears to the amount received by the bailiffs in the other county courts?—I believe it is much less, but I do not know that of my own knowledge. If the Commissioners will allow me, I should like to hand in for inspection by them the legal and financial summary for the year 1852, and the one for the last year, which shows the whole operation of the office (delivering in the same).

Adjourned to to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Thursday, 26th January 1854.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN PATTESON in the Chair.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

26th Jan. 1854.

Charles Pearson, Esq. was further examined, as follows:

6932. The Commissioners understand that you wish to add something to your former evidence?—It is upon the subject of Mr. Gentry's statement before you two or three days ago. I think such representations as he has made are better answered at once. In No. 5868 the question asked Mr. Gentry is, "'What did the chamberlain say or do upon that statement?' He said, 'Two months, Mr. Gentry;' that is all he said to me." Upon that, I can only remark that the chamberlain was the late Anthony Brown, a most amiable man. I was not present upon the particular occasion referred to, but I was present upon a great many occasions; and certainly a great courtesy and kindness of manner always distinguished that gentleman in each of those cases; and I am very much surprised if he gave such a curt reply in answer to such a statement. I think I saw him, and was present when he heard some eight or nine hundred persons, and great courtesy and kindness was always manifested by him.

Charles Pearson, Esq.

6933. Do you think that the answer was in substance what Mr. Gentry represented it to be?—I doubt whether Mr. Gentry can have made a statement to him such as he describes, because I think the chamberlain would have felt it to be his duty to make a special representation. He did so in many cases where the party pleaded poverty. He made a representation of the fact to the committee, and in those cases the committee did not direct proceedings to be taken. That if he had asked for two months, the chamberlain would have given him two months, I have no doubt; but if he had stated that he had asked for two months on account of poverty or inability to pay, the chamberlain would have made a special representation of that fact to the committee, and, in all probability, Mr. Gentry would not have been selected. The substantial representation in the paper read by the recorder was that no unnecessary harshness had been used, and if it had been used, it was without the cognizance of the corporation and the committee, and that it would fall upon the officer. It would, therefore, fall upon me, as solicitor, if I have practised any harshness. I should state that I first sent a letter accompanying the chamberlain's summons to Mr. Gentry to take up his freedom. That letter was not in my usual course of duty, but out of my course of duty,—supposing my name might, perhaps, induce the parties to take up their freedom. When I was directed to sue Mr. Gentry, I sent him the summons, and a short time afterwards I wrote to him thus:—"Sir,—I find you have not appeared to the action commenced against you, to compel "you to take up your freedom, in conformity with the instructions I have received. "Unless this be done on or before Tuesday next, or otherwise you take measures before "that time to obtain your freedom, I shall be under the necessity of signing judgment in "the action, and issuing execution against you." I heard nothing from him, and I placed writs of execution in the hands of the officer against Mr. Gentry and five other persons. I told the officer to say to each person: "This proceeding is taken not for the purpose of "recovering the penalties, but to increase the constituency; and, if it is your pleasure to "take up your freedom, Mr. Pearson will relinquish his costs, and I have no doubt the "committee will also relinquish the fine; but I have authority from the solicitor to "say, that the man shall be immediately withdrawn from possession if it is your pleasure "to apply to the committee." I am informed by the officer, who is here and will answer for himself, that in each of those cases he did give that message from me at the time of his execution of the warrant. In five out of the six cases the parties did apply to me. In each of those cases I relinquished my charge for costs, and I applied to the committee, and upon their obtaining their freedom the fines were remitted. The officer came to me, and told me, that Mr. Gentry would make no such application; that he would not step over the threshold of his door if anybody would give him 50*l*; and, in fact, dared us to pursue the proceeding. My statement to the officer was, "The warrant is in your hands "to perform your duty. I shall not in any shape interpose. Discharge your duty as "you would under ordinary circumstances; but repeat to Mr. Gentry, that if he comes "to me, I shall not consider this as any affront to me, but shall deal with him as I have "in all other cases." The officer executed his warrant, and levied the amount. Some time afterwards, Mr. Gentry was summoned again. I was at that time sitting for the chamberlain, in consequence of the chamberlain's absence. I did not know Mr. Gentry personally, but he told me he was the same person against whom the previous action had been brought. I then spoke kindly to Mr. Gentry, and advised him to take up his freedom, telling him that the money was still in the officer's hands, and would be returned to him if he would obey the law. He then spoke in a subdued tone, which led me to sympathize with him. I then stated that he should have time to consider the subject, and he left me. He afterwards came to my office, and complained of the manner in which this execution had been levied, and his goods taken. I immediately sent for the officer, and desired him to give me his bill. Mr. Gentry says upon the officer producing it to me, I handed it to him. I then repeated to him what I had so often before said, "That if it was his pleasure to take up his freedom, I was authorised to remit the penalty, as I had already relinquished my costs." He did not do so. The money still remains in the hands of the officer; and if Mr. Gentry feels aggrieved as to the manner in which the officer executed his process, he should apply to the court out of which that process issued; and no doubt the recorder would deal properly with the case. I cannot interfere. The officer assures me that the process has been executed in due form of law, in accordance with the usual manner. I am but an instrument to execute the instructions of my client; and he is but an instrument of the law in carrying them into effect. Whether the proceeding is right or wrong must depend upon other considerations. I only feel myself called on first to vindicate my character as a professional man, and then to vindicate the statement that we have made,—that there has been no degree of hardship practised by me upon him. I have gone out of my own way, and sacrificed my own professional emoluments in order to avoid the possibility of any imputation of hardship.

Charles Pearson, Esq.
26th Jan. 1854.

6934. Did you learn from Mr. Gentry whether he had received that first letter of yours?—I did not.

6935. Was it sent by post?—I have no doubt by post—he did not complain of any want of previous application. On the contrary his manner to me was as if he knew perfectly well that the issuing of this process was not according to my views; he did not at all blame me, but quite the reverse.

6936. The second summons was not proceeded with?—It was not. I felt in the case of a man who appeared to be angry from some other circumstances, it was better to give him time to reflect upon the whole question. In looking at this account I regret certainly that the law is such as to allow so large an amount of expenses in such a case, but so it is.

6937. In reading Mr. Gentry's evidence did you observe whether he made any statement that any illegal step had been taken against him, or whether he did not confine his complaint to this, that there had been harshness in the proceeding?—I do not recollect that he alleges anything illegal. He says they took a large quantity of goods and gave him no account, and then brought him back his sofa; there is only a slight shade between harshness which is not illegal and harshness which is—he does not draw that line. Certainly, if Mr. Gentry's evidence were to stand as it does there, I think it not improbable that it might be considered a subject for inquiry by the court, and therefore with the permission of the Commissioners I think Mr. Gore should be examined, because he has a character like myself. He is a very respectable officer, and it would appear to me desirable that he should be examined.

J. Z. Gore.

JOHN ZACHARIAH GORE having been sworn, was examined as follows:

6938. Are you a sheriff's officer?—I am, and also serjeant-at-mace of the Lord Mayor's Court.

6939. Were you employed by Mr. Pearson, the solicitor to the City of London, to levy an execution upon the goods of Mr. Gentry?—I was.

6940. What was the course which you took in executing that writ?—I have been called upon to explain the circumstances to a committee of the Court of Common Council while the facts were fresh in my memory. I have a draft here of that statement, perhaps I may be permitted to read it. It was on the 3d of February that I levied the execution. I asked the defendant if he would discharge the claim by payment of the amount; he said he should certainly do nothing of the sort. I told him I should be under the unpleasant necessity of leaving a man in possession, and recommended him to lose no time in waiting upon the City solicitor with a view if possible of preventing my being obliged to remove his property. He stated that he did not intend to take any trouble or wait upon any person about it. His principal complaint was not as to the mode in which the thing was done. I have seen Mr. Gentry many times since, and he has never complained to me of my conduct or any other officer of the corporation in regard to the measures which were taken against him, but this was his complaint then, and I have always heard it repeated to the same effect. He said the City authorities were at liberty to take his things if they thought it right to do so; that the corporation by their proceedings had almost ruined him by the removal of nearly the whole of the neighbourhood and driving away his customers; they might if they pleased complete it, meaning his ruin; that he had sustained loss to a large amount, naming several hundreds of pounds; that he had been induced to pull down some portion of his premises under the impression that some compensation would have been awarded to him, but that was now refused. The circumstances of my proceeding are as follows. I saw the defendant again on the following day, and used all the arguments in my power to induce him to see the City solicitor upon the subject, and I explained the course which had been adopted in the cases of three other persons whom I also levied upon, and urged him to prevent the necessity of my removing his goods or incurring further expenses. He said he would not go over the threshold about it if I were to offer him 50*l.*, that he did not require the man to remain there, and I might take the goods as soon or whenever I pleased. Finding that he was disposed to render the man in possession uncomfortable, I reported the circumstances to the City solicitor, who instructed me to proceed in the usual way. I thereupon instructed a broker to remove such goods as would be least likely to inconvenience the defendant, and sufficient have since been sold to satisfy the amount and the expenses, and the residue has been returned to Mr. Gentry.

6941. What was the amount to be levied under the writ?—8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*

6942. What were the additional expenses?—The account I have received was as follows—To levy 8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* Costs of writ 4*s*, which I was instructed would be given up; my fee was 5*s.*; the man in possession was paid for two days 10*s.*—making together 9*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* The appraiser's charges amounted to one guinea; van and man assisting, 7*s.* 8*d.*; warehousing, 20*s.* They were not sold for several weeks afterwards in order to give Mr. Gentry an opportunity of redeeming them if he should think fit; carting goods to the sale-room and man, 5*s.*; auctioneer's charges and commission, 1*l.* 3*s.*, making altogether 13*l.* 2*s.*

6943. A sufficient portion of Mr. Gentry's furniture was sold to produce that amount, and something was restored to him?—Yes; some article of furniture which he received back.

6944. That is all you know of the transaction?—That is all I know.

6945. Is there anything else which you wish to state?—No.

6946. Was anything said about the illness of his wife?—There was no complaint of that kind; his wife was about at the time and in business, and apparently attending to her domestic concerns; she very strongly urged him by all means to go up to the solicitor and settle it. She said all she could do to induce him to do so, to prevent the necessity of our removing the goods. I have only to say, that I am prepared to furnish the Commission with a scale of the charges of my particular duties in the Lord Mayor's Court. I have been called on to make a return for the year 1852, and I have annexed a note to it stating that the fees have been since revised and altered.

The scale of fees was delivered in, and is as follows :—

G. B. Childs, Esq.

GEORGE BORLASE CHILDS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows :

6947. What office do you hold?—I am surgeon of the City police.

6948. How long have you held that office?—Since 1844.

6949. What are your duties?—I beg to observe that I was not aware till last night at six o'clock that I was to appear before the Commission to-day. I have had no communication with the corporation, or any officer, with reference to the evidence which I am to give here to-day. I wish to state this more particularly, because Mr. Acland is under an erroneous impression, that as the son of one of the partners of an alderman I received my appointment. At the time of the office becoming vacant there were twenty-five candidates started for it, and among the number was a son-in-law of one of the aldermen, and many gentlemen of influence in the City, who it might be supposed would have had some weight in the corporation. I came forward as a perfect stranger, and was elected upon purely professional grounds.

6950. Were you elected by the Court of Aldermen?—By the Police committee of the Court of Common Council.

6951. What is your salary?—My salary is 500*l.* a year.

6952. What are your duties?—I have a statement of the duties here which, with your permission, I will read. It is the surgeon's duty to keep a daily register of all sick, showing the number of days they have been under his care, the nature of their illness, and the period when discharged cured. He is to send daily a copy of this register to the chief office, and on every Wednesday a weekly return comprising the above particulars, and also an annual return of the same character. It is also the surgeon's duty to examine every candidate for admission into the force, and report thereon to the chief office. This examination is necessarily of a lengthened character, requiring that the candidate should be stripped and thoroughly examined, to enable the surgeon to decide if the physical strength as well as the bodily health of the candidate are of a character to entitle him to admission into such a body of men as the police force. I find that the average number of examinations arising out of this branch of the surgeon's duty is 150 annually. The surgeon is also required to keep a register of the name, age, county of birth, and previous occupation of the candidate, and whether accepted or rejected by him, and if the latter, the reason on which such rejection is founded. This branch of the surgeon's duty is a very important one. It is also the surgeon's duty to specially report to the Commissioner in writing the circumstances of any case requiring particular attention, and also the name of any member of the force who, in the surgeon's opinion, reports himself sick without a sufficient cause, or who, from long continued indisposition, is incapable of performing the duties of the service. He is also, from time to time, to report to the chief office upon all such medical matters relating to the police force as he may deem necessary in the discharge of his duties. The next important duty is that of medical attendance upon the sick. The time required for the performance of these duties is not limited to any certain period of the day, but extends over the twenty-four hours, and it is the surgeon's duty to be constantly in readiness whenever in case of sickness or accident his assistance is required, and he is frequently called up during the night to decide in cases when, from intoxication or otherwise, the constable appears to be incapable of duty. The surgeon has to provide medicine, strappings, lint, bandages, and all other medical and surgical requisites. When their indisposition is slight these attendances are given at the surgeon's house, but in other cases at the men's own houses; and in fever or other severe illness, two or three daily attendances are sometimes required. From these facts it will be seen that the duties of the surgeon are not comprised within any certain limits, and that the whole of his time must necessarily become the property of the corporation. The surgeon's registers form the most accurate data on which the worshipful the Police committee can act in relation to all matters connected with the medical department of the force; the number and name of each man who has reported himself sick; the day on which he so reported himself; whether on day or night duty; the number of days he remained on the sick list; the cause of his illness; the date on which he again resumed his duty; state of the sewerage on his beat; the same of the street or court in which he resides, and the drainage of his house; the number of the inhabitants resident in the same house with him; and the character of the epidemic, if any, prevailing on his beat or neighbourhood. I should state that in 1844 I was appointed at a salary of 200*l.* a year to perform those duties. I have a return of the Officers and Clerks' committee in 1853. I find that in 1848 I received 312*l.* 10*s.*; in 1849, 350*l.*; in 1850, 350*l.*; in 1851, 350*l.*; in 1852, 462*l.* 10*s.* Since 1852 the Police committee, having taken into consideration the laborious duties I have to perform, raised my salary to 500*l.* a year. No emoluments whatever of any other kind attach to my office.

6953. Are the police force in general a fine body of men?—They are; we take no men under five feet eight.

6954. Mr. Harvey stated that your standard of height is an inch higher than that of the metrepolitan police?—It is; the metropolitan force take five feet seven.

6955. You require five feet eight?—Yes.

6956. Every additional inch of height of course excludes a considerable number of candidates, does not it?—Yes, it does, no doubt.

6957. What is the ground for requiring an additional height for the City force?—I should not measure a man's physical power by his height; but I think it is right to have in all public services one uniform standard. I think you must have men of some appearance in street disturbances, and so on, and five feet eight is, in my opinion, a very fair standard.

6958. Mr. Harvey stated that it was found desirable that there should be a different standard in the City to that which is adopted in the rest of the metropolis. What is the ground upon which that distinction is established?—I have none of my own. Mr. Harvey may have some private opinion on the matter probably.

6959. You are not aware of there being any special reason for requiring taller policemen in the City than in the rest of the metropolis?—I am not.

6960. Is there anything else which you wish to state?—It may be in the recollection of the Commissioners that in 1852 a Mr. Bessell brought an action against Mr. Alderman Wilson for false imprisonment, and that he stated that in consequence of the dampness of the cell in which he was locked up he became very severely indisposed. That statement

G. B. Childs, Esq.
26th Jan. 1854.

went out to the world, and it never has been corrected. I believe the Lord Chief Justice at the time, upon the erroneous statement of the plaintiff, made some very stringent observations in reference to the matter. I received instructions to visit the station house and make a report to the Police committee upon the sanitary condition of the cell alluded to, which, with your permission, I will read. I was accompanied by the police receiver, and this is the report which he made to the Police Committee. "Gentlemen—In consequence of some remarks being made in a court of justice on the alleged damp state of the Smithfield police station, where Mr. Bessell was detained, I have, at the request of your chairman, Mr. Alderman Lawrence, particularly examined the lock-up in question, and beg respectfully to report. The place complained of is a middle one of four cells, on the ground floor of the station. It is entirely within the house, and on the left of a passage leading from the charge room to the policemen's mess room. It is in length twelve feet, in width six feet and a half. There is an opening in the ceiling twenty-six inches by twenty-two, and above it a skylight, which can be closed by a sliding shutter at night. There is also an opening over the door, twenty-two inches by fourteen inches, for ventilation from the passage. The floor is boarded, and under the seat is placed eleven and a half feet of hot water pipe. The walls are of brick, and, for cleanliness sake, are frequently lime whited. From the walls being perfectly dry, it might be possible to flake off some of the lime white with the finger nails. The basement of the station is in daily use as a cleaning and brushing place by the thirty men who lodge in the house. Beside the hourly attention given by the men on duty, the station is from time to time inspected by gentlemen who are members of your worshipful committee. The station has been in its present state during the last twelve years. In winter the furnace of the warming apparatus consumes about twelve sacks of coke per month, and I have never found occasion to report any want of either cleanliness, dryness, or warmth in the cells." My own report follows:—"Accompanied by the receiver, Mr. Payne, I yesterday visited No. 2 station, Smithfield, and inspected the lock-up referred to in his report. I concur in the opinions above expressed, and have no hesitation in saying that for space, cleanliness, and in all respects as regards its sanitary conditions it is not inferior to any police cell in the metropolis. I beg moreover to state that the cells of the different station houses in the City have been frequently inspected by me during the last seven years, and on no occasion since that period have I had to complain of any defect in their sanitary arrangements. These remarks apply themselves with peculiar force to the cell in question, as from its locality, space, and the other means at command for warming and ventilating the same, it must possess advantages beyond most other cells in the City."

6961. What is the date of that?—July 28th, 1852.

6962. Was that after the action had been tried?—Yes; after the observations of the Lord Chief Justice.

6963. Have you been able, either officially or otherwise, to form an opinion as to the efficiency of the City police?—I have.

6964. Will you state your opinion upon that subject?—I believe there is some objection raised as to the want of harmony between the City and the metropolitan police. Now it is a daily occurrence that the City and the metropolitan men act most harmoniously together. In fact, scarcely a day passes but a metropolitan policeman has to appear as a witness against some party in the City, or a City policeman against some prisoner in the metropolitan district. The men are always ready to render each other assistance and service. The Act of Parliament expressly states that the City police have a power to act in the metropolitan districts, and that the metropolitan police have power to act in all cases of emergency in the City; therefore the same reciprocity of action and feeling exists between the City police and the metropolitan police as would exist between policemen on adjoining beats.

6965. It has been stated to the Commissioners that there would be considerable inconvenience in referring from the City to the head office in Scotland Yard if the two bodies were consolidated, and that there would be a reluctance in the City to make such references. Is it your belief that such would be the case?—I have no doubt of the inconvenience which would arise from such a state of things. I may exemplify it by a case which occurred not long ago. A gentleman went to a banking establishment and received a large quantity of gold, which he took away with him in a cab; he got out of the cab and forgot that he had left his bag of gold in the cab; he immediately went off to the police office in the Old Jewry and made known his loss; in about five minutes the whole machinery of the City police was in operation, and in less than three quarters of an hour the gentleman recovered the whole of his money. That, I imagine, would not have taken place if that gentleman had had to go to Scotland Yard to make known his loss to the commissioners there. Time would have been lost, great delay would have occurred, and the probability is that the gentleman would have lost his money.

6966. Are there not principal station houses in each of the divisions of the metropolitan police to which reference can be made?—The authorities in Scotland Yard must be communicated with before they can put the detective force into operation for the purpose of recovering stolen property. It is the custom when a loss is sustained in the City for a person to go to the nearest station. The loss is entered in a book, and a report circulated to all the stations around. At a certain hour, when the men muster, this is read out to them, but before you can get the detective men into operation you must communicate with the heads of the police force. The report would pass from the City into the metropolitan district, but the detective men would not be set in motion till such a communication was made.

G. B. Childs, Esq.
26th Jan. 1854.

BENJAMIN BOWER, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows;—

Benjamin Bower, Esq.

6967. You are deputy-governor of the fellowship of porters?—I am.

6968. Who is the governor?—The alderman of the ward of Billingsgate is always the governor and his deputy exercises the office of deputy-governor. I believe that has been the case ever since it was formed.

6969. Practically you are the governor of the fellowship, are you not?—I do not think the present Lord Mayor, who is alderman of Billingsgate ward, ever interferes.

6970. For how long have you been deputy?—Not much above a year at present.

6971. Are you conversant with the affairs of the fellowship?—Not to a great extent.

6972. Have you ever taken any part in the management before?—No; I should state that the deputy's office resolves itself into this, that the corporation or whoever passed the Bill seemed to think that the fellowship porters, being labourers themselves, ought not to have any very extended powers over their fellow men. The consequence is that, by a clause in their Act, if any misdemeanour arises which it is considered goes beyond the powers of the rulers of the fellowship, the deputy is called in to adjudicate upon it. For instance, the rules cannot fine a man beyond two guineas, let it be for whatever offence it may, nor can they suspend him from labour above 14 days, but they have the power to call in the deputy whose jurisdiction extends to dismissing the man from the service, if the case seem to require it, or he may fine the man a larger sum, or suspend him a longer time.

6973. What are the powers of the twelve rulers of the fellowship?—Their particular business is to keep the men at work. As I understand it, any person who wants men to work can apply to a ruler who is appointed, each in his turn, at a particular spot, and he is bound to find men for the work required.

6974. Do the rulers ever meet and deliberate as a body?—They do.

6975. How often?—Once a month in the regular way, but I suppose they meet oftener if need be.

6976. Are you present at their meetings?—No; I can attend if I please, but unless I am wanted I do not do so. I believe any one of the fellowship porters has the power, if he is dissatisfied, or does not choose that his case shall be taken before the rulers, to apply to the deputy for a deputy's summons; then the deputy attends and adjudicates.

6977. What is the nature of the business transacted at the meetings of the twelve rulers?—They manage the finances, and very often decide disputes between the meters and the porters.

6978. What are the powers of the deputy?—The deputy, as the system is now carried on, appoints the fellowship porters and adds men to the number; he also has the power of fining for misconduct; he has the power even of dismissing, if the case is a strong one.

6979. What is the origin of the body of fellowship porters?—It is a very ancient body. As in the case of the Waterman's Company, and many others, such a body was found absolutely necessary in former times.

6980. Was it created by grant or did it arise by prescription?—It was created by the corporation in those days, I imagine.

6981. The corporation could not have granted exclusive rights, could it?—The corporation I believe have the right of porterage and metage, and they appoint those men to do the duty.

6982. The porters have nothing to do with the metage, have they?—They have to work with the meters.

6983. Can you explain how the exclusive right of the porters originated?—I presume the corporation claimed the right of porterage and employed those men as their servants to do it; they have no other interest.

6984. Is there any Act of Parliament under which they act?—I believe not; there is an Act of the common council.

6985. What is the present state of the fellowship porters?—The number of men who are actually on the books of the fellowship I am told is very nearly 2,000; a great many of those men do not work, or work only occasionally—perhaps from 900 to 1,000 men are constantly at work.

6986. What is it that enables a person to become a member of the fellowship?—He must be a freeman of the City of London; he then applies to the deputy to be made a fellowship porter. The deputy says,—"Who recommends you?" If he appears to be a strong able man, and fit for work, he is supplied with a form of recommendation, which he must get signed by as many as he can of the inhabitants in the neighbourhood that the deputy is likely to know anything about. If he gets that, and there is room for more workmen, the deputy appoints him.

6987. The only condition is that he shall be a freeman of the City?—That is all.

6988. He may be a freeman of the City without having paid anything, may not he?—He must have paid a small sum, 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and trifling fees beyond that.

Benjamin Bower, Esq.

26th Jan. 1854.

6989. Even where he is a freeman by birth?—Yes.

6990. Is there any payment when he becomes a member of the fellowship?—He lodges in proper hands, I believe in the hands of a ruler, 5*l.*, as an assurance for his honesty, and to meet a portion of the expenses.

6991. He deposits caution money to the extent of 5*l.*?—If it is caution money; I am not aware whether it is so or not; he pays 5*l.* I know.

6992. Does the porter ever get the 5*l.* back?—I have cautioned those men who have applied to me lately; I said—"An inquiry is going on with respect to this right; supposing "it is altogether abrogated and done away with, what shall you do for your 5*l.*?" I then recommend them to go to Fellowship Hall, and inquire what will be the course; they have come back to me and told me it will be returned to them, and I know that that is the understanding that it will be so.

6993. Would it be competent to the common council to dissolve the fellowship?—I believe it would.

6994. There is no Act of Parliament recognizing the body?—I believe not; I believe them to be a very useful body of men, and in giving evidence upon that point I would rather speak as regards my own trade or profession.

6995. What is your trade?—I am a fruit merchant, landing very large quantities of goods constantly on men's heads. We have forty men appointed to our trade alone. We live in the neighbourhood of the Thames, so that packages of fruit are put on the men's heads, and they bring them from the ship into our houses. We consider them a very useful body of men, and we could not do without them.

6996. Why do you prefer them to the porters employed under ordinary circumstances, without any corporation superintendence?—They are trusted to a large amount. Any of the men might walk off with our goods; they take those packages of fruit on their heads on board the ship, and they come up through crowded thoroughfares, where their lives are almost in danger with carts and a number of people surrounding them in all the streets; if they were badly inclined they could very easily get rid of those things by putting them on to a cart, or slipping with them up a passage, which we find is often done when we employ strangers. I should say that those forty men are not sufficient for the trade, and though the fellowship porters used formerly to object to any man working with them, they now do not object; rather than give up their nominal privilege they will even guarantee strangers, and very often they have to pay money for them.

6997. Are the porters of the fellowship in general better off than other porters in the same condition of life?—I think they are a more respectable body of men, and though they do not earn a great deal of money, yet, being under a certain kind of surveillance, they save their money and do better in many instances. They are looking forward to a certain advantage if they do behave properly, because when they have been on the fellowship a certain length of time they get on to the rank of corn porters, where their pay is better, and the labour rather lighter.

6998. Is that payment more than that of ordinary porters?—I do not think it is. I can speak for our own trade that they are not a bit too well paid. A man takes a package on his head from a ship lying, perhaps, two or three vessels deep from the shore, walking over those two or three ships before he gets to the shore, then up a plank, then across the street into our houses for 2*d.*

6999. Do you know whether complaints are made by persons in your trade and other trades which are liable to porterage rates, as to the privileges of the fellowship?—I do not think much complaint is made. I think the dock companies have been able to get a little profit by employing what are called lumpers to do this work, instead of letting the fellowship porters go on their premises, but the public get no benefit from that, inasmuch as they charge them the same as the fellowship would.

7000. Is there not a fund belonging to the fellowship?—There is a fund.

7001. Can you give us any account of the state of that fund?—At present I have ascertained that they have a sum in the 3 per cent. consols amounting to 3,500*l.*

7002. How was that fund created?—In a great measure from the payments of 5*l.* I presume. There is also in the hands of the shifter the sum of 5,750*l.* to enable him to pay the men directly the work is done and to have time to collect it from the parties who have ultimately to pay it, but I think that is a larger sum than he ought to retain.

7003. Have you seen the evidence of Mr. Brown given before this Commission?—Yes.

7004. Have you any explanations to give in reference to that evidence?—I see in two or three places he says the corporation have done so and so. Whatever the corporation have done must have been most gratuitous, for they have no interest whatever in it, except to make it work well for the public benefit.

7005. All the payments go to the fellowship fund?—Yes.

7006. Nothing goes to the corporation?—Nothing at all.

7007. Are the fellowship a corporation?—I think they call themselves so; I do not well see how they can be so; they are under the corporation of London.

7008. Can they sue and are they sued in their own name?—No.

7009. Will you refer to the evidence given by Mr. Brown at page 330—he says, "An- "other of our complaints against the corporation is this, that they have passed acts of "council regulating our body in which they have coerced us to make payments to officers "of their appointing. Our principal corn shifter borrowed of the company 7,000*l.* which " the corporation compelled the company to lend him to carry on his business as a corn " shifter. He was appointed in 1827 and by the return he has made, it appears that he " has received the sum of 87,000*l.* out of the earnings of the porters from that branch of " employment of corn labour. Although a portion of this sum has been paid over to the " rulers of the company at different times no effective provision is made for old members " of the body." The next question is, " You say the corporation compelled you to lend " this officer 7,000*l.*," and the answer is " Yes, without interest to carry on the business " which they appointed him to do and he has received during the time he has been in the " office from the year 1827, the sum of 87,000*l.*" Can you explain this transaction?—That is the result of 1*d.* in the 1*s.*—he is allowed 1*d.* in a 1*s.* for his trouble in getting in the money, of which he keeps 4½ per cent. for himself and 3½ per cent goes to the fellowship fund. He pays the men when the work is done, but he has to wait some time before he gets the money; therefore he maintains that he requires a large capital to be able to do that; I think the capital is larger than he does require, although no doubt he does require some balance in his hand for the purpose.

7010. Will you explain what the nature of his duties is; he is an officer of the fellowship?—Yes.

7011. What is he appointed to do?—He collects the money for all the work done.

7012. He collects the money from the persons who employ the porters?—Yes.

7013. Has he collectors for the purpose, or do the porters come to his office and pay it?—He has to collect it, and I am told that the reason why so large a sum of money is left in his hands is that he frequently has to collect it from great distances in the country. The men are paid immediately by the shifter, Mr. Ruston.

7014. Are they paid at his office?—Yes.

7015.—The system is that he has an office at which he pays the men as any employer of labour would do, and then he has to collect the money from the real employer?—Yes, for which 1*d.* in a 1*s.* is deducted, and that is the money which is here made to amount to such a large sum.

7016. What is the meaning of the corporation compelling the fellowship to lend the corn shifter 7,000*l.*?—It is quite new to me. I dare say the committee may have specified that he should be allowed to keep a sum of money in his hands for the purpose.

7017. The 87,000*l.* spoken of here, you believe to be made up by his profit of 1*d.* in a shilling?—Yes; that is the way in which the money has arisen. Mr. Brown himself states that some part of the money has been returned to the rulers.

7018. Does it often happen that the corn shifter has bad debts, that is to say that he is unable to recover from the importer the money which he has previously paid to the porters?—I dare say it does happen sometimes, I am not aware of the fact. I should state that, according to the Act of Common Council, there are certain sums agreed to be paid to the rulers; among others there is a sum paid down for the deputy; it is but fair that I should state that I have declined receiving that.

7019. You are entitled to the sum, but you have declined it?—Yes.

7020. Your office therefore has been wholly gratuitous?—Yes.

7021. Is there anything else which you wish to state to the Commissioners?—I should like to make a remark upon the assertion of Mr. Bennoch, that the committees of the corporation do not elect men to the chair from their competency in business or their general talent, but from their convivial qualities. My experience for 18 years is quite contrary to that; I should specify that the rule of the the committee is that they almost always take a man for the chair who is in his fourth year, the plan of the corporation being to change their committees every fourth year. From among those gentlemen who are in their fourth year, the chairman is generally chosen, and I can assert from my experience and positive knowledge that, nineteen times out of twenty, they take the man most fitted for the office of chairman by his attendance to the business of the committee, by his general knowledge of business and his fitness for it but more especially is it necessary that a gentleman who is to be in the chair to manage the business, should be one who makes himself acquainted with the nature of the business; and who is always at his post. So far from taking inefficient men, my experience leads me to say that they have always had the most efficient men, perhaps not men who will make the most brilliant speeches, or make the greatest show, but who make themselves most conversant with the business of the committee. I should say if Mr. Bennoch himself had attended at the committees and made himself master of the business there, he was a man, being a pleasant convivial kind of man, who would have been almost certain of being placed in the chair; but as far as I can recollect he was never in one of the chairs, the reason being that he would come into the committee and sit for half an hour and gossip with some one, and then take himself off again. He was a gentleman who liked to be seen and heard, and to make something like display. He was not a man to make himself cognizant of the business of those committees, and therefore he was not placed in the chair.

7022. Does the chairman usually dine with the committees when they have their business afterwards?—It is expected that he will.

7023. Supposing he were to decline to do so, would they vote him out of the chair?—Certainly not. Once elected he is chairman for that year, and they would have no power to do so.

7024. Would it preclude his being elected in all probability to the chair in the following year?—He would go off the committee the following year, the chairman being generally chosen from those who are in their last year upon that committee.

B. Bower, Esq.

26th Jan. 1854.

7025. It was asserted that if a man who was chairman of a committee was unwilling to partake of the convivialities and did not attend the dinners, probably when his time of service was out he would not be elected to any other chair; is that according to your experience?—It is quite contrary to my experience. I do not find that gentlemen have any objection in a general way to take the chair at dinners, and it is very often the case that the man who is most expert in attending to the business of the committee is most competent to do the business of the chair at the dinner table.

7026. What do you say as to the system of dinners altogether for members of committees of the common council; do you believe such a system is necessary in order to secure an adequate attendance?—I think if it had that effect, it would be a very prudent thing; it is of great importance to have a full attendance.

7027. Do you believe it is necessary for that purpose?—I do not believe it is; I have belonged to many committees in which no allowance is ever made, and I never saw any lack of attendance, still I think it is fair that when gentlemen give up a large amount of time in the middle of the day, and break into their own social habits, they should have a dinner provided for them. Unless I can get away so as to get into the country to dine, I have no means of getting dinner; consequently when I am detained after five o'clock in town I have no objection to dine with them. Permit me also to remark upon another portion of Mr. Bennoch's evidence. He says "The corporation is generally composed of retail dealers, men of no mark or influence." As a person can always give evidence upon that which he best knows himself, I speak of my own ward. We have eight representatives, and not a retail dealer among them; they are all men of education and respectability and most, if not all of them, men of very considerable wealth.

7028. Do you think it is not true generally to say that the common council is composed of persons engaged in retail rather than in wholesale trade?—I am sure it is not true; it may be the case with some individuals, but the general character of the common council is quite the reverse.

Mr. W. Lawrence.

Mr. William Lawrence, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7029. Are you one of the rulers of the fellowship of porters?—Yes.

7030. There are twelve rulers, are there not?—There are.

7031. How long have you been a ruler?—About ten years.

7032. How were you made a ruler?—By election on a vote by ballot of the whole body.

7033. How is the election conducted?—When there is a vacancy occurs, if there is an opposition, an election takes place by vote by ballot.

7034. Candidates are proposed?—Yes.

7035. Is there a meeting of the rulers at which that takes place?—The rulers do not propose them.

7036. Who proposes them?—The body of the fellowship.

7037. One of the porters nominates an individual and another seconds him?—Yes.

7038. How are the votes taken?—By ballot.

7039. Will you explain the process?—Blanks are put in one box, and the names of the candidates they vote for in another. There are so many candidates and as many cards. The persons whom they vote for they put in the ballot-box, and the others are put into the blank-box.

7040. How many porters generally vote at a contested election for the rulers?—Mine was upon a vacancy, and there were 1,600 polled.

7041. How many candidates were there?—Two candidates.

7042. What is it that the rulers do?—They have to attend on court-days once a month, or oftener if summoned, and there is any business; likewise to attend and see that the men attend to their work. There is one man always on duty at Tower-street to supply the corn-meters with men; sometimes there is one over the water at the potato-work to see that that is properly conducted, and supply the meters with men.

7043. Do you receive any pay?—36*l.* a-year as a ruler.

7044. Out of what fund does that come?—Out of the general fund.

7045. Have you no other emolument?—The rulers go to work on the days when they are not on duty. I am a collector, and have 60*l.* a-year for attending at the hall and doing duty there.

7046. What is the business transacted at the monthly meetings of the rulers?—Disputes between the men are settled as to seniority; one may consider that he is wronged by another, and the rulers decide such cases. If there is any complaint, if a man has misconducted himself, if he has made use of bad language, or anything of the kind, he is brought before the court of rulers.

7047. Every porter must be a freeman of the City, and he pays 5*l.* upon entrance?—Yes, for admission.

7048. Does he ever receive that 5*l.* or any part of it back?—2*l.* or 3*l.* are given at the death of a man, and there are other pensions which the men receive, but the funds have fallen away lately.

7049. Is there a power of striking a porter off the fellowship if he misconducts himself?—

Yes. The governor or the deputy can do it. The rulers have not the power. If he misconducts himself, or if he has charged a turn more than his right, he is liable to be struck off. He gives two bonds of 40*l.* each.

7050. If his name is struck off does he lose his 5*l.*?—Decidedly.

7051. Do the porters of the fellowship receive better pay than ordinary porters?—No; I do not consider that they do. In regard to the corn work, if you take small jobs with large ones they receive less.

7052. Are they more regularly employed?—No.

7053. What is the inducement to a person to become a member of the fellowship?—It is a living for a young man looking out for one, but it is a very precarious one.

7054. Why is it more of a living to him than if he were not a member of the fellowship?—I do not see that it is; however, there is a security for him; it was better many years ago; if a man came to be a senior man in regard to the corn work it was better for him.

7055. Is the employment more regular for the fellowship porters than for other porters?—It is more regular certainly.

7056. But the pay is not higher?—It is not. If a man does not get work at one place perhaps he can get it at another; if he cannot get it at Billingsgate at malt he can go to potatoes.

7057. Is there more corn imported into London than there used to be?—There is more imported, but unfortunately for the fellowship it goes into the docks and by railway, and they have not anything to do with that.

7058. There is not more imported in such a manner as to give employment to the fellowship?—No; it has been falling off the last five or six years.

7059. What is the state of the fund of the fellowship?—The fund is 3,500*l.* in the Three per cent. Consols, and 5,750*l.*, I believe, in Mr. Ruston's hands, the shifter. In 1822 there was an Act of Common Council that we were to supply Mr. Ruston with money. We got 1,000*l.* from him some years ago, considering that it was more than he wanted. About three years ago we applied for another 1,000*l.* We had got a debt to pay in consequence of a lawsuit in the case of the Corporation against Combe; that cost the fellowship upwards of 1,500*l.* We applied to Mr. Ruston for money to pay this off. We wanted 500*l.*, but all we got from him was 250*l.*

7060. Mr. Ruston is the corn shifter?—He is appointed by the corporation.

7061. He is paid by a penny in every shilling?—Yes; that is 8 per cent.; he receives 4½ per cent. and the company of fellowship receive 3½ per cent.

7062. How are the payments managed—does the shifter pay the corn porters every day?—Yes, for all corn work.

7063. He gets the money back from the importer?—Yes.

7064. Do you know how his affairs are managed—does he suffer losses?—There are very few losses, I believe; if there is any case in which he cannot get the money our men have to suffer—they have to repay him back. If anybody should be a bankrupt, or anything of that kind, Mr. Ruston is at the loss.

7065. What is the reason why the parties are not paid directly by their employers—why is a middle man employed between the porter and the employer?—He collects all; some of them live at Norwich and Ipswich and different parts of the country, the porters conld not do that.

7066. The porters get their money more generally from him than they would do from the importer?—Yes.

7067. Will you refer to the evidence given by Mr. Brown before the Commission. In answer to Question 4028 he says, "Another of our complaints against the corporation is "this, that they have passed acts of council regulating our body, in which they have "coerced us to make payments to officers of their appointing. Our principal corn shifter "borrowed of the company 7,000*l.*, which the corporation compelled the company to lend "him to carry on his business as a corn shifter. He was appointed in 1827, and by the "return he has made it appear that he has received the snm of 87,000*l.* out of the earn-"ings of the porters from that branch of employment of corn labour. Although a portion "of this sum has been paid over to the rulers of the company at different times, no effective "provision is made for old members of the body." He is then asked "You say the corpo-"ration compelled you to lend this officer 7,000*l.*?" and his answer is "Yes, without interest; "to carry on the business which they appointed him to do, and he has received during the "time he has been in the office, from the year 1827, the sum of 87,000*l.*" Can you explain those answers to the Commissioners—what is the transaction which is referred to?—That is what he has received during the number of years that he has received the money.

7068. Has he received that sum for himself or has he paid over some portion of it?—I think it amounts to that to himself.

7069. What is the meaning of the corn shifter having borrowed 7,000*l.*?—We were obliged to supply him with money to carry it on, for which he pays no interest.

7070. When did that take place?—I think it was in 1824, at the time when the act of common council was passed.

7071. Then the fund was larger than it is now?—Yes.

7072. You had more than 7,000*l.*?—Yes.

7073. What was the system before that year which rendered it necessary that an advance of 7,000*l.* should then be made to the corn shifter?—Mr. Ruston's father, and likewise himself have it upon a lease for a mere nominal sum; an inquiry took place before a committee of the corporation and it was settled by the corporation that he should receive 4½ per cent. and pay over to the fellowship 3½.

Mr. W. Lawrence.
26th Jan. 1854.

7074. What are the annual payments which he makes; how much does the 8 per cent amount to annually?—I have an account of what we have received from 1841 to 1851, at 3½ per cent. In 1841, 1,694*l.*; in 1842, 1,650*l.*; in 1843, 1,588*l.*; in 1844, 1,588*l.*; in 1845, 1,464*l.*; in 1846, 1,307*l.*; in 1847, 1,315*l.*; in 1848, 1,286*l.*; in 1849, 1,252*l.*; in 1850, 874*l.*; and in 1851, 707*l.*

7075. It has fallen off more than half?—Yes, this is at 3½ per cent.—then Mr. Ruston receives 4½.

7076. The total payment last year was about 1,700*l.* and the 7,000*l.* was advanced to him in order to obtain this payment?—Yes.

7077. Then it was a good bargain for the fellowship, was not it?—No, he receives the interest of the money—he does not require the whole of the 5,750*l.* now.

7078. What do you think the corn shifter ought to do; ought he to repay you a portion of that money?—Decidedly.

7079. How much do you think he ought to repay you?—I think 2,000*l.* is enough to carry it on with now.

7080. Have you ever represented that to the common council?—That has been represented to the common council.

7081. Have you any other complaint except as to the amount which has been advanced to the corn shifter?—The whole of the potato work is paid for in the same manner; one of the potato meters receives the whole of the 1*d.* in the 1*s.* and pays the fellowship 130*l.* a year.

7082. Is that an unfair arrangement?—I do not consider that it is sufficient.

7083. You think he does not pay you enough?—No.

7084. The income of the fellowship seems to be annually declining according to the statement which you read?—Yes.

7085. What is the cause of that diminution?—The principal revenue of the fellowship is derived from corn work; of course as it falls off in consequence of corn going by railway or going into the docks, it does not come under the fellowship.

7086. Is that the only reason?—That is the reason.

7087. Is there anything else which you wish to explain?—No, I only wish to say that the body of the fellowship have great confidence placed in them. As regards potato work a potato salesman will have a fellowship porter in preference to anybody else. We have had occasion this year, there being a large influx of potatoes, to put on other men, there not being sufficient men to do the work; one salesman in particular lost eight sacks in one week; of course a complaint was made, and they said they would have none but fellowship porters; in consequence of that, we were obliged to apply to the alderman and to the deputy to put on some supernumerary men, to give them a ticket and put them on for a certain time to aid and assist in the work. A sack of potatoes was lost at Fresh Wharf lately, belonging to Mr. Moxam. The man who was looking after them went and took a sample to sell them; however, one of the fellowship porters suspected him; he went up into Thames-street and he caught him with the sack of potatoes and gave him in charge. We pay for all losses which take place. The body of the fellowship is highly respected, and their correctness in doing the work is very much praised. What the fellowship suffer from is the corn work—there are so many small jobs in comparison to the number of large jobs; the men have to go off for five quarters, ten quarters or twenty quarters, the greater proportion of the work is under fifty quarters. Six or seven men have to go off to do the smallest work, and after paying the waterage there is nothing left to themselves. A large job of 200 or 300 quarters may pay them, but those small jobs do not.

7088. You think that generally the system of fellowship porters is acceptable to the trade who come within the privilege?—Decidedly so.

7089. There is great confidence felt in the honesty of the porters?—There is. At Billingsgate if there are any oysters lost they come up to us, we generally trace them, and it it is very seldom that we have to pay for anything, and I do not believe that with regard to oranges the loss averages above a box a year. With respect to nuts and corn and potatoes it is the same. Unfortunately we had to pay for those eight sacks which were lost, but that very seldom happens.

Mr. S. Baylis.

Mr. Samuel Baylis, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

7090. Are you collector of tonnage dues?—I am.

7091. How long have you been so?—Since August 1849.

7092. How are you appointed?—I am appointed by the Thames Navigation Committee under the sanction of the Court of Common Council.

7093. What is your salary?—200*l.* a year—out of which I have to pay a clerk and the partial services of a messenger, which in fact reduces the net income to about 80*l.* a year; but I ought in justice to the Committee and the Corporation to say that that arrangement with me was made quite as an experiment, at the time that the collection of the tonnage duty was handed over from the Government to the corporation. An application has been made for an increase in the remuneration which has not yet been disposed of. I also hold another appointment, that of collector of wine duties.

7094. That is a City duty is not it?—It is.

7095. What is the origin of the tonnage dues; did they ever belong to the Government?—I am not acquainted with the origin of them, except that they were under the management of the Government, as far as the collector was concerned, up to the time I took them and I understood that the Government had an interest in them. That interest ceased before the period at which I took the collection and that led to an arrangement with me to collect the duties.

7096. What are the present rates of tonnage duty?—The rates levied are one halfpenny on each ton of the ship's register on every coasting vessel, from or to any port in the United Kingdom; one halfpenny per ton also upon any ship coming from or going to any foreign port in Europe, north of Cape Ushant in France; three-farthings a ton on every ship coming from or going to any port in Europe, south of Cape Ushant; and three-farthings also for any ship coming from or going to any port in Asia, Africa, or America.

7097. Are those dues levied upon every ship, entering or going out of the Port of London?—Yes, except ships coming in or going out in ballast vessels coastwise under forty-six tons register; vessels coastwise whose principal cargo is corn; fishing-smacks; lobster and oyster boats; vessels for passengers only; vessels coming in and leaving without breaking bulk, and Her Majesty's ships, which are all exempt by Act of Parliament; and certain coasting vessels laden with stone and other articles exempted by the board of customs from making entry at the Custom House.

7098. Is there any difference between the dues on British ships and foreign ships?—No.

7099. Those rates apply to every class of vessel?—They do.

7100. Whatever its national character may be?—Yes.

7101. When is it that those dues become payable?—On the ship's entry being made, whether inwards or outwards.

7102. The ship's entry is a Custom House operation?—Yes, in the case of ships entering inwards from a foreign port, the ship's report, which is the first document which is lodged with the customs authority, is brought to me as the officer for the corporation, and a stamp is affixed upon it indicating that the duties have been paid before the Custom House officers proceed.

7103. When the Government collected the duties, where they collected by an officer of the customs?—They were.

7104. Would not it be more convenient that the officers of the customs should collect them?—Not at all, they are collected in precisely the same way; they are collected in the Long Room on the spot where the parties have to come to make their customs entries, and a seat is appropriated by the commissioners of customs to the corporation officer.

7105. You sit in the Long Room?—Yes; close to the office where the ship's reports are received.

7106. You are in fact then almost a Custom House officer?—Practically I am.

7107. You receive your information from the Custom House officers and you sit in the Long Room at the Custom House?—Yes, I sit in the Long Room at the Custom House, and the documents upon which I collect the duties, and which are the foundation of the information I get are customs' documents.

7108. Have you now described the whole process of collection?—Yes.

7109. How do you know when a ship is about to leave the port; has the Custom House cognizance of a ship's departure?—Yes, a ship cannot depart in cargo without clearing at the Custom House.

7110. Is the process a similar one with regard to ships clearing out?—It is.

7111. What do you do in respect to the wine duties?—The process of collection is much the same. Previous to the entries being made with the Custom House authorities the entry is brought to me, and my signature is required previous to its passing further, which signature is an indication that the duty has been paid.

7112. What are the duties on wine?—4*s.* 9½*d.* per ton of 252 imperial gallons.

7113. Is that a uniform duty upon all varieties of wine?—It is.

7114. Is there the same duty upon Cape wine as upon French or Spanish wine?—Yes, the duties are uniform.

7115. Do you collect any other duties besides those which you have mentioned?—No.

7116. To what fund do you pay the tonnage duties?—The duties are paid daily into the chamberlain's office.

7117. And the same with the wine duties?—Yes, except that they are paid weekly instead of daily.

7118. Those are also paid into the chamber?—They are.

The Right Honourable HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., in the Chair.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

27th Jan. 1854.

The Right Honourable The Lord Mayor, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

7119. How long has your lordship been connected with the corporation?—Since the year 1842.

7120. Have you always taken an active part in the business of the common council and the corporation?—I was only one year in the common council. During that year I took an active part in the question of municipal reform connected with the corporation.

7121. When was your lordship elected an alderman?—In September 1844.

7122. Your lordship has probably perused the evidence which has been given before the Commission?—I have.

7123. Are there any observations which you are desirous of addressing to the Commission?—In the first place I desire to rebut some evidence given by Mr. Acland personal to myself, which will be found in Questions and Answers 325 and 326. He is asked the question "You have stated that in the case of a contested election of importance at "common hall, it is the practice for the committees of the rival candidates without the "least concealment to give money to the electors who vote for their respective candidates. "Will you state to the Commission some recent instance in which that system has been "carried out in the City of London?" The answer is "I drew the distinction between "the two modes, expressly in order to answer the former question satisfactorily, and "fully; I believe the most recent instance of bribery has been in the election of the Lord "Mayor elect, Mr. Alderman Sidney. I believe it was only to the extent of 200*l.* or 300*l.*" Question 326 is "There were but two candidates proposed, were there?" The answer is, "Others would have been proposed, but a sum of money was given to a manager of those "long shore men not to execute his threat to put in nomination two others. Mr. Alderman "Sidney is generally supposed to be a corporate reformer. It was believed in the City "that it was not desirable that he should be Lord Mayor, and it was declared by an agent "that he should not be Lord Mayor, for that two other persons would be named and "elected, so that either Alderman Sidney would have been under the necessity of going "to the great expense of a poll to secure his succession to the office, or two names, that of "Alderman Sidney not being one, would have been returned to the Court of Aldermen "from which to select the chief magistrate. The party who made this threat received a "bonus. Under the inducement of that bonus he did not carry his threat into execution, "and Alderman Sidney was therefore elected to the office." I wish to say in answer to that statement that I know of no party who received any bonus, that I certainly did not give any bonus, nor one single farthing either in the way of promise, or any other gratuity whatever to prevent myself from being opposed. I also wish to say in contradiction to the rest of the charge, that I never have bribed to the extent of one single penny, and that my expenses in being elected to the office of Lord Mayor, so far from being 200*l.*, are comprised within the following items—seven books of livery at 10*s.* each, 3*l.* 10*s.*; stamps, 10*s.*; men delivering letters, 7*s.* 6*d.*; room at Guildhall coffee-house 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; several gentlemen of the common council taking dinner after the election, 7*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*; printing circulars, 5*l.* 15*s.*; sundries, 11*s.*; the total amount being 21*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* I produce the bills and receipts, and am prepared to say that that is the total charge for my expenditure connected with my election. I further wish to give a contradiction to another statement made by Mr. Acland in answer to Question 340: "Nineteen of the aldermen," he says, "agreed to find 100*l.* a piece towards turning the scale. Whether they paid it is another "question." I beg leave to say for my own part and I think I may answer for my brethren—I am sure I may answer for the great majority of them, because I have heard them deny it—there was no subscription ever entered into. I say that for others to the best of my knowledge. Certainly for myself I neither engaged to subscribe nor paid anything.

7124. A statement to the same effect was made by Mr. Sheriff Wallis in Question No. 1462. This statement appears to imply that some part of the corporation funds had been used in some contests. He is asked, "The Commissioners do not ask you to state to "them any specific fact as to whether you know that a certain sum was so applied they "only ask you to state generally whether you have any knowledge as to the application of "the corporation funds to the purposes of corruption?" The answer is, "Not from the "corporation themselves, but I was informed by a candidate in an election that I once "conducted, that a sum of 1,900*l.* had been subscribed among the aldermen at the Mansion "House in order to secure a brother alderman's election."—I beg leave to give the flattest contradiction, so far as I am concerned, to this statement, and my firm belief is that no such sum was either subscribed or engaged to be subscribed by the aldermen.

7125. Have you communicated upon this subject with other aldermen?—Yes; the subject has been a matter of conversation in our body.

7126. Are you satisfied from the result of your conversation that the rumour which seems to have prevailed of this subscription is erroneous?—Entirely groundless; it is without a shadow of truth or of foundation. No sum was subscribed to the best of my belief. I also wish to allude to some portion of the evidence given by Mr. Dillon, Mr. Bennoch, Mr. Thomson Hankey, and Mr. Morley, relative to Lord Mayor's day and the Lord Mayor's show. Mr. Dillon states,—"Whether, however, it may arise from the extent of "the trade of the City of London, the various and conflicting interests of its merchants, "and their having other tastes and other objects of ambition in Parliament and elsewhere, "I cannot tell; but the fact is certain that there is in these matters an essential difference "between the commercial bodies of London and other ports and cities, so that if you were "to reform the City corporation, and to clear away all the nonsense and foolery of the "Lord Mayor's show, you would not thereby, as I believe, create an inclination on the part "of the merchants of the City of London to take part in the management of municipal "affairs." Again, in the evidence of Mr. Morley, he says,—"The Commission has heard "from most of the witnesses references to the Lord Mayor's show, which is really felt to "be a thing more in accordance with the dark ages than the present day." The question is then put,—"You do not think there is any class of the community which wishes to retain "it?" "Reference has been made to children and nursery-maids, but I have no idea "that the citizens of London look at the thing with any other feelings than those of repug-"nance." "You do not think the educated tradesmen take any pleasure in such a show?" "I should imagine that the tradesmen living in the line of streets must be greatly incon-"venienced by it. It was this year felt by the committee of the Coal Exchange to be a "positive affront to them, that their business should be interrupted by it the whole day?"—Prior to my becoming Lord Mayor, I, in conjunction with my colleague, Mr. Sheriff Wire, took the opinion of my brethren and the Court of Aldermen, whether or not this show and the usual ceremonies of the feast should be continued. I then made a point of going into Lombard-street and eliciting the opinion of several important firms connected with the banking interest, and I showed them also a programme of the intended show. I may state that so far from its being received with disfavour, Mr. Samuel Gurney, one of the gentlemen whom I consulted, was highly delighted with it. He said he had not seen one for many years; he should make a point of going with the whole of his family. And he said, —"Thou must be put to considerable expense," and very handsomely wished to subscribe fifty guineas towards the show. I may say also that the show had to go down Mincing-lane. I inquired of a number of the persons connected with the colonial markets. They not only willingly acceded to the request, but they made it a general holiday, inviting their friends from the country, and each of them giving a sort of banquet in his counting-house. With regard to the market at Billingsgate the inhabitants unanimously, I believe, acceded to the request; the market business was, by arrangement, transacted previously with cheerful alacrity, flags, banners, devices, and various signs of welcome greeted me on my passage. I may say there was but one general expression of satisfaction with the show going through those streets. I am connected in business upon the line of procession where the show goes and has gone every year, and I speak from my own knowledge and that of my neighbours, that so far from regarding it as a thing that we would wish to have done away with, it has generally been regarded with the most popular feelings. It is looked upon as a red letter day by the tradesmen, who take the opportunity of inviting their friends and giving a partial holiday to their establishments. Upon the last occasion, I speak within compass when I say that it was witnessed by at least 500,000 persons. I know that persons of the highest distinction witnessed that show. I know that elegantly dressed ladies from the rooms of the houses were seen to greet it with feelings of warmth and admiration, and the great bulk of the populace were either, or they seemed to be, pleased and gave it their countenance. Whether the gentlemen whom I have named are more competent to speak the feelings of the great multitudes of London I leave for the Commissioners to judge. I can only give my testimony to the best of my belief, that the show is as popular now as it ever has been in the former history of London.

7127. I observe it is stated in the paper which was read by the recorder, that the expense of the show was not more than 200*l.*?—I think that must have been a mistake. The expense of the show this year I think would amount to 500*l.*

7128. Was it more expensive this year than usual?—Probably it was, because there was a demonstration which we thought of some value at the present juncture of the political aspect of Europe. We substituted for men in armour that which we thought was more on the minds of the public—a procession consisting of allegorical emblems of peace and so on. There were the several figures of Peace, and Plenty, and Justice, and also various nations were represented upon horseback, with banners and devices, our object being to endeavour to show the blessings of peace and the miseries of war.

7129. Is there ever any attempt on the occasion of these processions to revive with some decree of accuracy the pageants of former days, and so give at least an antiquarian interest to the sight?—I have seen such emblems at the Fishmongers' Company, which formerly used to take part in the pageantry, but of late years I think the companies have not taken that active part in the display which they formerly did.

7130. Do you imagine that the show as now conducted is at all like the shows of the City of London in former times?—I should apprehend it has very much varied in its character, but I by no means think that the interest has abated.

7131. At one time it was rather a procession of the companies than of the Lord Mayor, was not it?—I think that was very probably the object of it. I may state in my justification that what I felt in the matter was that I was elected as a popular magistrate—I believe the only magistrate of the kind in the kingdom—by the voice of the people, and I should think it no less my duty to conciliate the good will and popular feeling of the multitude than of the higher class of citizens.

7132. Does the amount of the expense incurred on the occasion of the procession depend entirely upon the Lord Mayor?—The Lord Mayor and the sheriffs.

7133. Whatever unusual expense is incurred is paid out of their pockets, and not out of the corporation funds?—Not a farthing is paid out of the corporation funds with the exception of lighting and preparing the Hall.

7134. It is part of the charge which comes upon the Lord Mayor out of the emoluments which he derives from his office?—The Lord Mayor has emoluments which virtually belong to his office, and which are in lieu of certain offices which his predecessors have surrendered to the corporation. There are dues and emoluments attaching to the office of Lord Mayor quite independent of any which relate to the other branches of the corporation.

7135. If any additional expense is incurred in the Lord Mayor's show it would be so far a diminution of the income of the Lord Mayor. If there was any diminution of the expense of the show, that would go to the advantage of the Lord Mayor, would not it?—If there was any diminution in the expense, the Lord Mayor of course would not pay so much money for it. The Lord Mayor, I apprehend, whether he is liberal or illiberal, would still have the emoluments due to the office which have been settled upon it.

7136. No specific grant is made by the corporation for the expenses of the show?—Not at all.

7137. In what proportions do the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs pay the expenses of the procession?—They have generally divided the amount into four proportions—the Lord Mayor paying two of those proportions and the sheriffs one-fourth each. In this year it was different, inasmuch as one sheriff declined acceding to the arrangement. There have also been expressions used with regard to the feast itself. I think it is attacked by Mr. Thomson Hankey and others, who say it is considered a very noisy occasion and a feast which it is not desirable to continue. I think I cannot do better than put in an extract from the leading journal, the Times, upon the subject. It so fully expresses my own views upon the feast and upon the show, that I would rather speak in the words of the Times than my own upon this occasion. It is taken from the Times of Friday, November the 10th 1848: "Yesterday was the great metropolitan festivity. The chief magistrate of the "ancient City of London entered his year of office with the same antique pageant, grave "ceremonial, and magnificent hospitality that our fathers saw before us, ere the age of "revolutions had begun. Representing all the municipal corporations of the country, "he presented himself with all his civic court at Her Majesty's Palace of Westminster "to be sworn to his arduous duties, and after the 'double triumph' by land and tide, "which still excites the smile it did a century ago, he received the chief notabilities of "the empire at that same Guildhall which Plantagenets and Tudors have visited on similar "occasions. Among the few relics of old London, happily there survives one centre of civic "associations. It is true that instead of the lurid torch, the blazing hearth, or the forest "of wax candles, the walls are resplendent with gas, and ten thousand mysterious tongues "of flame shed a second daylight on the festive array. It is true that the chiefs exalted "to the dais are no longer men of fierce countenance, more used to blows than to words. "Lower down, faces full of comfort and wealth contrast oddly enough with the barbaric "effigies that still adorn the Hall. Yet as a whole there is not to be found, probably in all "Europe, a more perfect and natural mediæval idea than the Lord Mayor's banquet and "show. The scene which historic novelists have attempted to describe with so much "tedious detail is here recognized at a glance. It is no affectation, no revival, no vain "attempt to ingraft old upon new—it is old London just where it was, and in many "honourable respects, very much what it was. Go where you will, you will nowhere see "so goodly a muster of old English industry, honesty, and skill. Of the many hundred "men who yesterday crowded the Hall and its adjoining apartment, nearly all had risen "to a position of competence, respectability, eminence, dignity, or power, by habits of "independent feeling and exertion. The vast variety assembled illustrates the uniformity "of character pervading all the orders of British society. There were the constitutional "advisers of the crown, men of no mean reputation or ill-tried honour; there were dis-"tinguished naval and military commanders, the law officers of the crown, judges, "dignitaries of the church, noted merchants, and tradesmen, men who had made their own "fortunes, and won their own fame. The Lord Mayor sat on the seat whereon have sat "before many a man who once was houseless, and who afterwards attained still higher "distinction. Many of our nobility, if they wish to go back so far, will find the cunabula "of their race in the gaudy honours of the homely old City. The tone of such a company "is that of industry and honour. Here are no murmurings against fate, no accusation "of the elements or the stars, no jealousy of governments, no schemes of revolution, "or greediness of plunder; for the simple reason that our good citizens have proved "and ascertained by experience that a man may generally rise if he chooses, and that "if he does sink lower, or grovel in his native squalor, it is generally his own fault. "In such a place, if anywhere, may be permitted those modest congratulations which "will spontaneously rise to the lips and struggle for utterance, at the comparison of this

" metropolis with its continental sisters. Prudish moralists have forbade us this innocent " joy. We were lately told by a man who has not taken his own elevation with the most " exemplary meekness, that it is self-righteous to recognise the remarkable immunity we " hitherto enjoy from the scourge of epidemic insurrection. The parallel, indeed, is " striking enough. Our Hotel de Ville is occupied by harmless citizens, instead of a " revolutionary junta, or a democratic clique. Instead of whole battalions a few unarmed " policemen protect it from invasion. Our metropolis has not seen its streets contested " inch by inch by furious factions. It has not become familiar with volleys of musketry " and the thunder of cannon. It has not been besieged by provinces, blockaded by " famine, bombarded, and taken by assault. It has not been ruined from below, and " burnt with rockets from above. It has not been entered by victorious strangers. It " is not a prey to anarchy. It is not governed by an imbecile, or, what is worse, " by a man too crazy to reign, and too sane to depose. Its citizens are not armed. Its " youths do not dream of conquest, at least on European soil. Its credit, shaken by " commercial mischief at home, has revived even under the alarms of spreading revolution; " its industry is not abated, and the fountain of wealth is not dried up. It is scarcely " human not to think of these things and be thankful for them. Such congratulations " need not be alloyed by vanity or ill will. We can receive with equal pleasure Lord " Lansdowne's well deserved compliments to the loyalty of the late Lord Mayor and his " fellow citizens when threatened with revolution, and M. de Beaumont's excellent " observation, that the common property is furthered by international peace, and " impaired by war; and that it is rather our object to raise our neighbourhood than to " ruin them." I refer to that extract from the Times for this purpose. I do not know of any popular feeling against the Lord Mayor's festivities, nor the Lord Mayor's show, except that I have seen it mentioned in a portion of the public press. I quote the press to answer itself by this statement five years ago. I can answer that the feelings of the citizens of London have not changed on the subject. The press perhaps can best explain for itself.

7138. What is the usual expense of the dinner at Guildhall given on Lord Mayor's day?—I believe the average expense to the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs would be about 2,200*l.*

7139. That expense is divided in the same proportion as your Lordship stated with regard to the procession?—Yes, the Lord Mayor would pay 1,100*l.* and the sheriffs 550*l.* each; I am afraid this year it has rather exceeded that.

7140. About how many guests are usually invited?—I should say in round numbers about 1,100.

7141. Do you know whether the state dinner upon this occasion has been conducted pretty much in the same way, and on the same scale for a great number of years?—I should think so; we generally consult the remembrancer, and as far as possible adhere to the ancient custom.

7142. That is the only dinner of this kind during the year?—The only one, except upon extraordinary occasions, such as when the allied sovereigns visited London.

7143. The other entertainments given by the Lord Mayor are at his own discretion and from his own official income?—Yes.

7144. And at the Mansion House?—Yes, there can be no doubt that the more comfortable entertainments as banquets are given at the Mansion House, but upon the occasion of Lord Mayor's day it is thought to be rather a great spectacle, and I have heard it stated that nothing has excelled it except the inauguration banquet of the sovereign.

7145. You stated that you never heard any notion of a subscription among the aldermen for promoting the election of Sir John Key; was not there some occasion when one of the aldermen stated that he had been applied to to subscribe to a fund of that description, and refused?—It was an observation made by Mr. Alderman Humphery, I do not think that Mr. Alderman Humphery was justified in the observation he made; Mr. Alderman Wire of his own accord at the Mansion House said, " We must subscribe if necessary;" it was not responded to by any of the aldermen, and it went no further. Mr. Alderman Humphery, I believe, offered that observation with a view of palliating the natural indignation which was felt by the aldermen generally in the presence of Mr. Sheriff Wallis, who took his seat among them after giving such evidence upon oath. The court was cleared by Alderman Copeland or some other alderman, and a general denial was given, and surprise was expressed that such evidence should be tendered before Her Majesty's Commission upon oath, without the slightest ground for it.

7146. And then Mr. Alderman Humphery made that observation?—That there was some such allusion to the subject, the observation being simply by Mr. Sheriff Wire, but not responded to by any of the other gentlemen present. I conceive there would be no moral wrong in my subscribing to Sir John Key's election out of my own funds; I am merely giving my denial upon a matter of fact. There is only one more observation which I wish to make on the evidence given, so far as regards the position of the aldermen of London. I have seen statements made, particularly in the early part of the evidence given before this Commission, about the mercantile standing and position of the aldermen of London. That is not a new charge; the same charge which is made now I see was embodied in a memorial from some liverymen to the court of the Lord Mayor, aldermen and commons in the year 1769, and I have preserved a copy from the Gazetteer of that date, from which I will only trouble the Commission with two paragraphs. It says, "Presuming "that the bulk of my fellow citizens have not read the following dedication, I have desired "the favour of Mr. Say to print it in his Gazetteer for their perusal, that, with the supplement "annexed, they may be thoroughly sensible of their own importance, and at the same time "that many of our nobility may see that they are sprung from the livery of London to whom "it is now grown so fashionable, at the west end of the town, to give the soft and genteel "appellations of mob, banditti, scum of the earth, the dregs of the people, &c., &c." It then goes on to say who the magistracy are, and that the great bulk of the corporation in that day was formed of retail traders, and there is this paragraph which I wish to read as my own statement upon the present occasion, in answer to that general charge: "So far is "trade from being inconsistent with the character of a gentleman, that in England it makes "gentlemen, and hath peopled this nation with nobles and gentlemen; for after a generation "or two, have not the children or grand-children of traders sprung from the magistracy of "London became as good gentlemen, statesmen, parliament-men, privy councillors, judges, "bishops, and noblemen, as those of the highest birth, and the most ancient families?" It goes on to elucidate who those families are who have sprung from traders of London; there are upwards of forty noble families, from a ducal title downwards, who are at present upon the peerage of England, and who have owed their origin to the humble ancestry of traders of London. I do not think that the corporation at the present day is less respectable in the position of its members than it has been in any former period of its history; the charges, though not now made by the nobility against the standing of the corporation, are made generally by a class which as citizens we cannot but feel very indignant at,—gentlemen who in their political opinions have certainly aimed at levelling the distinctions of rank as regards those above them, and who appear to view with indignation those whom they think are a little inferior to them in the line of commerce or wealth. On the matter of intelligence or wealth, I may say on behalf of my brethren I do not think that, taking the Court of Aldermen, twenty-six gentlemen could be found in any assemblage of public representatives in this kingdom who could vie with them in more blameworthiness of private character, more general energy in the administration of the objects which they have had in view, or who, by the blessing of Providence, may be said to have had a greater reward for their exertions than those which the aldermen can boast of. I think it is fair to say that the Court of Aldermen, as a body, are possessed of wealth to the extent of between three and four millions sterling, and they have filled and are filling positions of great importance in the public mind; many of them are representatives or have been representatives of large constituencies in the House of Commons, and I think therefore I may safely dismiss that charge by a general denial of its accuracy.

7147. Without intending to pass the least disparagement upon the Court of Aldermen, as a matter of fact, is not it the case that there is a wider separation between the corporation of London in these days and the great merchants of London, than there was in the days of Sir Thomas Gresham, or in the days of Sir Charles Duncombe?—I may be permitted to observe that I think circumstances will easily explain that; in the first place, formerly all persons who traded in the City of London, were compelled to reside in the City of London or they lost their freedom; they could not carry on their business at that day unless they were free of the City of London. In the next place, for many centuries I believe the representation of the City was confined to the aldermen of London, therefore it may have caused a greater ambition among the richer portion of the citizens to become aldermen in order to obtain more directly a seat in the House of Commons; but there is a third and still stronger reason why the merchants and bankers in my opinion are not members of the corporation at the present day—there is an undue desire to enrich themselves by their own respective callings, and not to perform those duties of citizens which the ancient charters of London require all its citizens to perform. They, think, no doubt that by giving up their time to the public, as many of the citizens do, they would virtually deny themselves the opportunity of being so enriched by commerce, as by devoting their own energies to their particular callings; but I think a moment's reflection will show that there is no dishonour in men giving their time to the public welfare—if there is dishonour, it attaches to those parties who seek to enrich themselves rather than study the public weal, and the part they ought to perform as citizens of the community. I should not have introduced any observations so personal to ourselves, but we have been so fairly challenged by the evidence given before the Commission and in the public papers, that honest pride is naturally aroused, and requires that we should maintain that position in public estimation which circumstances warrant us in assuming.

7148. Does not your Lordship believe that the duties of an aldermen now, are more onerous than they were, say, in the first twenty years of George the Third's reign?—I should apprehend the duties are much more strictly performed now than they were at that period.

7149. Has not the business of the City greatly increased, and the duties of a City magistrate become more onerous?—I should think very much so.

7150. Would not that be a circumstance which might operate to deter persons engaged in important private business from undertaking the duties of an alderman, which did not operate so strongly 100 years ago?—It is very difficult to make a comparison between the duties now and at that time, but I should think at present the duties are certainly more onerous than they were at that period. I think the difference consists rather in the performance of them than in anything else.

7151. You do not think the quantity of business to be transacted is greater?—I do not see that it can have changed very much, except with the growing trade and importance of the City itself.

7152. Should not you believe, for instance, that the business of the justices has increased, the duties of inspecting the prisons, and the criminal business generally?—I should think not; I fancy from the evidence which we have of old Newgate in those days, and the fact of our present state of prison discipline, the duties of the aldermen have been much better attended to of late than they were at that period; but I do not see how the duties should have increased.

7153. If the duties are more punctually discharged, and public opinion exacts a more energetic performance of the duties, it would come to the same thing that the amount of duty to be performed by an alderman would be greater now than it was at that time?—I have no doubt that a greater amount of time is given to the performance of those duties than there was at that period.

7154. Do many of the present aldermen reside within the City?—I do not think there is one at present who has anything more than a business connection with the City. Passing from this subject I desire to give my views upon the present position of the corporation of London. I am quite willing to admit that it has some defects. The chief of those defects consists in its being unable, from the existing state of its charters and the uncertainty of its powers, to act so vigorously as myself and many others would wish to see it. I can only say for myself, and saying this entirely as an individual, that I believe if this inquiry should do no other good than that of elucidating and consolidating the charters of the City, it will have done great public service to the community of which I am a very humble member. I wish to state my views first with regard to common hall elections. We have all the livery of London assembled at the election of Lord Mayor, sheriff, bridge master, ale conner, and also chamberlain. In my judgment the chamberlain is a proper officer to be elected by the corporation at large, and I think the power of his election by common hall would be transferred most usefully to the Court of Common Council. I see no necessity whatever for the expensive office of bridge master. At present there are two bridge masters appointed under a statute, and I believe they have on the average about 800*l.* The duties performed by those individuals are generally of a very trifling character, and there is no occasion whatever for such expensive officers. Besides that it is not a position which should be coveted, because if my information be correct there was one gentleman, Mr. Gibbs, who is lately deceased, as to whom report says his family have not been reimbursed the expenses he incurred at his election as bridge master. The other gentleman is now lying dangerously ill, and it is said that his expenses have not been repaid by the salary he has been receiving since his election.

7154A. What expenses do you refer to?—There is generally a contest in the common hall, and of course with such a number of persons as assemble in common hall, the expenditure is very serious.

7155. How many years has Mr. Gibbs held the office of bridge master?—I should suppose about seven years.

7156. What is the salary attached to the office?—I believe about 400*l.* a-year.

7157. You think that the salary during those seven years has not been sufficient to defray the expenses of his election?—I speak from report only; it is the general feeling of the citizens of London that it is a snug berth for a worn-out man. There is no doubt with a constituency like the livery of London, which is to be approached through the post, that in addressing some 15,000 persons the mere writing of the circulars and the posting of the letters is a very serious expense.

7158. You think those instances of the election to office by the livery in common hall should be put an end to?—I can see no reason at all why the common hall should elect officers of this character in public hall assembled. So as to the office of ale conner, I should say that it is certainly worse than useless—it is mischievous. I am prepared to recommend that the office of bridge master and the office of ale conner should be abolished, that the election of the chamberlain of London should be transferred to the common council, and that the common hall elections should be strictly confined to the election of Lord Mayor and sheriffs.

7159. Do you think there is any good reason for there being more than one constituent body for all municipal purposes in the City of London?—I am quite of opinion that one municipal body would work more advantageously for the community at large than the present system.

7160. Why, then, would you retain the common hall for the election of the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs?—Because the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs have ever in the history of London been elected by the citizens at large, and I would not disturb the existing arrangement.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

27th Jan. 1854.

7161. Supposing the constituent body on which the whole system of the municipal government of London was based fairly comprised the citizens of London generally, should you see any advantage in there being more than one constituent body for all purposes?—I would have only one constituent body, but at present that constituent body is divided into wards for the election of aldermen and common councilmen. I should desire that the whole body should have a voice in the election of the Lord Mayor and sheriffs. I am in favour of a constituency founded upon the ancient existing privileges of the City of London. Formerly I believe it was the privilege and undoubted right of every person residing within the City of London to be enrolled as a citizen after he had been in the City twelve months and a day. I see no valid reason why that should be changed at present, and I am in favour of abolishing altogether the requisite of freedom and of enrolling as a matter of necessity for the public welfare all persons occupying premises within the City of London for a twelvemonth and a day. I believe that to be the ancient foundation of our municipal privileges. I must be understood as speaking now my own private opinions. I have no doubt that other members of the corporation will differ from me, but at the same time every gentleman I consider is called on now to give his testimony to the best of his judgment. With regard to the common council, I think the numbers are much too large at present. I would reduce the number of wards from 25 to 18. I would give to the twelve larger wards six members, and to six of the smaller wards four members each, making an aggregate of 96 representative in the common council, and of course I should recommend a reduction of the number of the aldermen from the present number of 26 to 18. I would also beg to suggest that the Court of Aldermen should be retained for the despatch of the business which now comes before it, and which is of a very multifarious character, and that the aldermen should as at present be continued for life. I should at the same time recommend that they should have the power of appointing two paid magistrates for the police courts of the City of London. I should also recommend that the aldermen should not have the power to draw cash, except for magisterial duties, and that the scale of payments should be settled by the corporation at large. I consider that the Court of Aldermen may be most usefully maintained in its magisterial character, and if we give up the vexed question of the power of drawing upon the chamber of the City, which in fact is scarcely ever used at present except for magisterial purposes, I think we have a court which would be both popular and felt to be very influential in the City of London. I am of opinion that the officers of the corporation are much too numerous. I should recommend the abolition of the offices of steward of Southwark, the three common pleaders, the secondary, the high bailiff of Southwark, the clerk of the chambers, the two attorneys of the Mayor's Court, the clerk to prepare accounts for the auditors, and the two marshals of the City of London, the upper marshal and the under marshal. I should recommend the consolidation of the offices of comptroller of the City, and comptroller of Bridge House estates with the office of the City solicitor. I should also recommend the consolidation of the office of remembrancer with that of town clerk. I would also beg to recommend the consolidation of various offices connected with the navigation and conservancy of the river. I think their duties are very conflicting, and the officers much too numerous a body. There are also several officers connected with the collection of the wine duties, such as the collector, the comptroller and the gauger. I doubt very much the importance of the continuance of those offices. I would recommend the consolidation of the criminal prisons connected with the City of London. At present we have an establishment at Newgate which in salaries alone costs, I believe, upwards of 4,000*l.* per annum, and which has now, and has had for some time very few prisoners; we have under the jurisdiction of the magistrates a further prison called Bridewell, which has been condemned by every report presented to Parliament and by every prison inspector for many years. I think that a worse prison does not exist, and I am very happy to find that the committee of management connected with Bridewell and Bethlem Hospitals are about to recommend to the governors at large, the abolition of Bridewell as a prison. I should therefore recommend that Newgate and Bridewell be consolidated with our new goal at Holloway, and that, on the site of Newgate, we should have constructed new and convenient courts, which within the City of London we greatly need at the present moment, both for the convenience of the public, and for the proper administration of justice. If those offices which I have mentioned, and which I think are nearly useless, were abolished, and if the other offices, together with the prisons, were consolidated, the saving would be at least 14,000*l.* per annum.

7162. Can you distinguish between the two sources of economy, how much of that amount would in your opinion be derived from the consolidation and reduction of offices?—I have scarcely thought it necessary to go into precise details, seeing that the Commissioners have been encumbered so much with details from the officers. In the case of the two marshals, the upper marshal and the under marshal, they have 1,000*l.* a year, besides perquisites for the performance of their duties. One good policeman would do the duties of both, and in my opinion quite satisfactorily.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

7163. Are any of the offices to which you have referred what may be called condemned offices, not to be filled up in the case of vacancy?—I do not know; the comptroller I regret to say, died yesterday morning, that office will undoubtedly form a subject of inquiry with the common council. We refer all vacant offices to a committee, to consider as to their emoluments and duties, and the propriety of filling up the vacancy. One of the bridge master's offices is also vacant by death, and from the age of several others of those parties, it is not improbable that there will be other vacancies before long.

7164. Do the corporation intend to fill up the vacant office of bridge master?—I have been requested as Lord Mayor to call a common hall for election to the vacant office. I sent the communication to the town clerk requesting him to comply with the statute and call a common hall. I received a message from him that several gentlemen in the common council were anxious to have an opportunity of considering the question in common council before such vacancy was filled up, and I have therefore withdrawn my order for the common hall to be assembled. Believing that the subject will engage the attention of the common council at their next assembly, the office is only filled up at present pro tempore.

7165. You say when any office falls vacant there is usually a previous enquiry as to the necessity of retaining it before any election takes place?—That is in the case of offices which are in the gift of their own court; the bridge master is elected by the common hall. The common council have upon the last several occasions, thought it right to make regulations as to the office of chamberlain, and I believe, with great advantage to the working of the office.

7166. The Commissioners have no power and they have no desire to interfere with the administration of the affairs of the City, but it may be as well that we should suggest the propriety of the corporation considering, whether as this office is vacant and there seems to be a doubt in your Lordship's mind as to the propriety of filling it up, it would not be desirable either to abstain from filling it up for the present; or if it is filled up, stipulating that the person appointed shall take it with the understanding that his appointment is subject to any change which may be made?—I am justified in the observation which I have made to you by the statement of Mr. Brand, the comptroller of the Bridge-house Estates, who informed me of the death of Mr. Gibbs, and at the same time, in answer to some questions of mine, stated that the office was really unnecessary. Therefore, after this intimation from the Commissioners, I should consider myself discharging my duty properly by not issuing an order for the common hall for the present.

7167. Have you an unfettered discretion in that respect?—I am not aware that any one can call a common hall but myself.

7168. Is there no obligation upon you, upon an office being vacant, to call a common hall for the purpose of filling it up?—I understand that there is no immediate obligation upon me to call a common hall for electing to it.

7169. Will you proceed with your observations?—I also think that the courts of law in the City of London are too many and conflicting. I think that the Court of Hustings, the the Mayor's Court, the Sheriff's Court, and the Secondary's Court might with great advantage be consolidated into one court. I also think that the business of the quarter sessions held at Guildhall, together with the licensing might be performed at one session, and that the quarter sessions now held at the Southwark Court, ought as a matter of course to be abolished, there being no business to engage those who are assembled; and the only result of opening the quarter sessions at Southwark has been to trouble a great number of gentlemen in the neighbourhood to give their attendance when there is no business to be performed.

7170. Does your Lordship see any objection to severing the connection which now exists between Southwark and the City?—I believe the inhabitants of Southwark, or some considerable portion of them, have a great desire to be incorporated, and the corporation of London has been approached more than once by petition and memorial from those inhabitants, praying that they might participate in the benefits of a municipal government with ourselves, but after great inquiry, we have always come to the conclusion that we have no power without a special Act of Parliament for the purpose, to embody Southwark with the City of London for municipal objects. I do not think there is any particular objection in the City of London to a connection with Southwark; but I do not see any great advantage that it would be either to the City themselves; or to the inhabitants of Southwark to be incorporated with the City of London.

7171. It has been represented to us, that there would be considerable practical objection to the incorporation of that part of the Borough of Southwark which is connected with the City of London now, unless the whole of the Parliamentary Borough of Southwark were at the same time incorporated with the City of London. Does your Lordship see any objection to so large an addition as that being made to the City?—I see great objection to very large corporations. I think it is a defect in our present constitution that all places which are boroughs for Parliamentary purposes are not also boroughs for municipal purposes. I conceive that the inhabitants of the whole of the metropolis, if incorporated as different corporations according to the limits of the present Parliamentary boroughs, would find great advantage in the administration of their local affairs.

7172. Is your Lordship of opinion that the entire severance of Southwark from the City would be preferable to an incorporation of the whole of the Parliamentary Borough of Southwark with the City of London?—My own private opinion is, that the inhabitants of Southwark would be much more benefited by being separated from the City and incorporated as a separate incorporation. The subject of prosecutions by the orders of the magistrates has been referred to. I am sure where those prosecutions have been instituted, it has been with the thorough conviction that public interests were consulted and promoted by ordering them, and I believe they have been undertaken from the want which is felt by all the magistrates in not having a public prosecutor. I wish however to say, that I see great objections to committing magistrates having the power of being prosecutors, especially where the criminal has to come before a tribunal in which they themselves may afterwards be judges. I believe the use of this power is not popular with my brethren, the aldermen; but occasionally from necessity they have felt constrained to adopt that course. There is another subject which I wish to mention to the Commissioners, which is, the charities connected with the prisons of London. Those charities are very large, and from recent inquiries which we have made, with the assistance of the learned chief baron, within the last two or three years they have been considerably augmented. I believe that they now amount to upwards of 1,600*l.* a year, and they are applied in the discharge of prisoners in compounding their debts with solicitors. I think the application of these charities is open to very serious objection, and it is one of those subjects to which I should invite the attention of the Commissioners with the view of giving us the power to deal with their application in a more useful manner. I have also been asked to speak upon the subject of the fellowship porters and the metage dues, but I think the Commissioners have had so much evidence already upon those subjects, which are very complicated, that I could not usefully occupy your time upon it. Being alderman of the ward of Billingsgate, I am governor of the fellowship porters, and if there is any question which the Commissioners wish to ask me I should be happy to answer it. Should the Commissioners wish to go into the merits of the question I will leave with them two papers which have been drawn up, one of which embodies a statement of the whole question, so far as the interpretation of the powers claimed on behalf of the fellowship porters themselves goes. It is a history, as far as we can trace, of the body, and the manner in which it is now worked. The other is upon the general subject of corn meters as connected with the felllowship of porters.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

27th Jan. 1854.

7173. Is it your Lordship's belief that the porters themselves derive any great benefit from the fellowship?—I do not think the porters do derive any great benefit from the fellowship. I think, looking to the constitution of the body, particularly if it be revived and placed upon a firm footing, it would be found highly useful to the merchants and the trade of London. Even now, in its decrepid state, it is considered to be a very great advantage by the great bulk of the mercantile community, but I am afraid that the porters themselves do not find that personal benefit which, as free labourers with constant labour, they might find.

7174. Your view is, that, whatever benefit arises from it, is rather to the trade than to the labourers?—Yes.

7175. Why does your Lordship make use of the expression "in its decrepid state?—They have been annoyed very much by actions with Messrs. Combe and Company, and they have also had a great inroad made upon their means of labour by several private Acts of Parliament which have given power to Dock companies to unload vessels from their respective docks. This power has greatly interfered with the privileges of the fellowship porters in their working, and has taken from them in fact a great many of the larger and more lucrative cargoes of corn, leaving them to perform all the smaller jobs, which they are compelled to perform at the same prices. The subject has been under the consideration of the Court of Common Council for the last several years, but I am free to say that I think it is so ultimately mixed up with the question of metage that the whole will require the consideration of Parliament, before it can be placed again upon a permanently useful footing.

7176. Would you wish to retain the custom of metage as a compulsory system?—I may say that I have been approached by several members of the corporation to invite a conference with many gentlemen of the corn trade, including Mr. Hales, who has given evidence before the Commissioners and other gentlemen. They have met a deputation of the corporation at the Mansion-house twice, and I think the basis of a permanent agreement beneficial to the community at large has been come to. Under the advice of the officers of the corporation, that can only be carried out by an Act of Parliament, which I believe will be an unopposed Act, and will pass through Parliament, as it is expected with their sanction.

7177. In negociating upon that subject has the corn trade only been consulted, or have other branches of trade which come under the metage privilege been referred to?—The chief complaints and difficulties hitherto have existed with the corn trade, but there is no doubt that other branches of trade, such as the fruit trade and the potato trade, which is a very important branch, would be very willing to accede to the general arrangement. In fact I have ample testimony as governor of the fellowship, that the trade generally prefer employing porters belonging to the fellowship than employing other labour irrespective of it. I believe the fellowship offers much greater security by the honesty and respectability of the labourers employed than they could possibly have if they employed a mere casual set of porters. I wish to make an observation with respect to the navigation and conservancy of the river. I know the commissioners have had very valuable information, and that the views upon this question have been fully elucidated to them by the officers of the corporation, but I may say that I am decidedly of opinion that the welfare of the City and its commerce would be much more benefited by a permanent board for the management of the conservancy than by the present system. I think if the corporation had the power of nominating a board subject to the approval of the Trinity House, of a moiety of that board, the best interests of the port of London would be consulted, and great satisfaction given. I would beg distinctly to state that it is my opinion that the power should be given to the Trinity House, and not to dock companies. There is reason to believe that the partial interests of the dock companies would very often be conflicting with the general interests of the navigation of the river.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

7178. Would you prefer the Trinity House to the government?—I would. A measure was before us, and it was agreed to by the government and the corporation a few years ago, to the effect that the body should be the Trinity Board; seeing that the junior members of the Trinity Board are nautical men, I think that that board would be infinitely the best body which could be associated with the corporation in the management of the river. In conclusion, I may say that I think we do need reforms in the city of London, of which I have mentioned a few: but one great stumbling block has always been felt to be the Act of Parliament, the 11th of George I., which was really obtained against the will of the citizens at large, and which has proved, as the protests which are upon the journals of the House of Lords prognosticated, the great bane of the corporation of London. I think if the 11th of George I. and all the subsequent Acts were repealed, all fines upon freedom, all city tolls abolished, great advantages would be the result.

7179. What would be the effect of repealing those statutes?— Simply to leave the old constituency as it was before the 11th of George I. passed. That Act was undoubtedly obtained by fifteen aldermen of that day against the decided opinion of the Court of Common Council, and the decided opinion of the citizens at large. Unquestionably in my view of it, it was obtained with the sinister motive of creating a constituency manageable by themselves, for the election of their own body as members of Parliament. In fact I think the whole bane of our corporate existence has been the ulterior design of getting into Parliament.

7180. You mean the desire which certain aldermen had to use the corporation as a means of getting into Parliament?—Yes. The 11th of George I. gave a power of election to the members of the livery companies, which is not recognised in the constitution of this country. Those livery companies unquestionably are chartered for trading purposes. The City has outlived the usefulness of those companies in a trading point of view. The companies are generally possessed of immense funds, but the 11th of George I. is the only Act which has placed them in a position to constitute their members electors either for members of Parliament or for municipal officers. I consider it to be the greatest inroad upon the municipal constitution of our city which has ever been made, and quite at variance with any sound legislation. The operation of it is at present this:—A liveryman living in Cornwall or in Scotland may come over at an enormous expense, and vote for a lord mayor, or a sheriff, or a chamberlain, while a party living in the city of London, occupying premises subject to the good or ill government of those officers, may have no voice whatever in the election. The Reform Bill of course made a great inroad upon the livery of London, inasmuch as it threw open the power before vested in the livery to the 10*l.* householders, and it also confined the power of voting for members of Parliament to liverymen residing within a radius of seven miles, but for other purposes the power is not confined to any particular distance.

7181. You would propose that the lord mayor should be elected by the burgesses according to the franchise which you suggest?—Yes. At the same time I would not deprive the livery companies of the whole of the power which they possess by virtue of the 11th of George I. I would act as the Reform Bill acted in 1832; I would open the Common Hall to the residents of London, while at the same time I would not disfranchise the present liverymen of London.

7182. Do you speak of the individuals who are at present liverymen of London, or how do you mean that you would perpetuate their franchise?—I am very much against abolishing existing rights, however acquired, and there are many in the livery of London who exercise their trust with a very sound desire for the welfare of the City of London, who perhaps have no connection with the city further than belonging to the livery companies. I certainly would not allow them to retain those exclusive privileges to the exclusion of those who reside in the city of London.

7183. You would perpetuate this system which allows those liverymen scattered all over the country to have votes for the city of London?—I see no objection to it. I think the city of London may be considered as connected with the whole of the country.

7184. Has not that a tendency to increase the expense of all elections in the city?—Most undoubtedly.

7185. You would leave the election at Common Hall as at present, but you would throw in the votes of the burgesses, if they may be so called?—I would not disfranchise the liverymen, but I would enfranchise the occupiers of London.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

7186. You think it would not be expedient to adopt the franchise of the general Municipal Reform Bill for the City of London?—I think not. I do not think it works satisfactorily as regards the franchise in many of the larger towns. I know when in Parliament I made an extract from a return made there, and I found that it does not increase the franchise in many towns. The municipal franchise at present is three years' residence. That is a very complex machinery, and if parties thought it worth while to contest it, there might be most expensive litigations before the revising barrister's court. It is pressed upon them by such numbers, that nobody thinks it worth while to contest the claim of persons desirous of being placed upon the franchise; but it is not working advantageously in many places. For instance, I find, taking the parliamentary electors in 1850, and the municipal electors of the same date in Birmingham, there were upwards of 7,000 parliamentary electors, while the municipal electoral constituency was only 6,000. In Bristol the number of parliamentary electors was 12,157, municipal electors 7,131, or 5,000 less. I also find in Liverpool there are 17,316 parliamentary electors, and at the same time only 10,584 municipal electors. In Manchester 11,841 parliamentary electors and 11,128 municipal electors. I see that is reversed in some other large towns; but I see no reason why you should disturb the ancient landmark which has worked so well for so many ages in the City of London. It always has been a popular constituency managing its own affairs, and to limit it by any term of three years' residence would not in my judgment work well, or satisfactorily, and it would rather tend to diminish than increase that constituency which we all feel desirous of having enlarged.

7187. Would there be any difficulty in having an accurate register of voters upon the principle which you have recommended?—I believe previous to the 11th of George I. the register was always made up in the wardmote by the aldermen. It was a public register, and all men were commanded under a fine to attend the wardmote when held. All persons were required to come and take the franchise as citizens, and they became enrolled in the wardmote. And I can conceive of nothing better than that that system should be carried out.

7188. How would an accurate list of the liverymen be provided for?—The liverymen are altogether an unconstitutional body in my judgment for municipal purposes. They were only constituted for trade purposes; if I retained them it would be only as a matter of expediency and not of principle.

7189. The municipal franchise which you recommend I understand to be the occupation of premises within the City of London, for 12 months and a day, without any pecuniary gratification?—Quite so.

7190. And without the necessity of residence?—Yes.

7191. Would there be any difficulty in making up a register of a constituent body so composed?—I wish to add to what I before stated, that I think they ought to be rated to some rate, and then I think there would be no difficulty in making a register.

7192. Would you have no pecuniary qualification?—We have no occupations in London of less than 10*l.*, and therefore I think it would be superfluous.

7193. You would propose that the occupier of a counting-house, for example, who was not resident in the City, should be a municipal voter?—Certainly.

7194. The City of London is peculiarly situated in that respect. Those who transact business in it and occupy premises have more generally a residence without its limits than in any other borough or city in England. Is not that the case?—No doubt of it; and there has been much false reasoning founded upon the fact that the City of London is only small in its area compared with other parts of the metropolis. I beg leave to say that the City of London in my judgment is as much the metropolis now as it ever was, taking the commercial aspect of it. Though the sleeping population of the City of London is not more than 126,000, still the day population may be considered as at least three times that amount.

7195. Still, even in a commercial point of view, it can hardly be said that the City proper is as extensively the metropolis of England now, since Southwark and the Tower Hamlets have grown up, as it was in the days of Queen Elizabeth?—I presume Southwark was in existence then. Though unquestionably much larger communities have sprung up round the City of London, I apprehend in no period of history was the commerce of the City so great as it is now; and I think from the City of London emanates nearly the whole of the commerce of the southern part of the kingdom.

7196. Would you consider the corporation as virtually representing the entire metropolis?—Certainly not. I think as the legislature has already decided to enfranchise other portions of the metropolis as parliamentary boroughs, the legislature ought to complete the work by enfranchising them for municipal purposes also.

7197. Are the Commissioners to understand your opinion to be that a person should be a voter voting for municipal purposes who occupies a shop, without reference to where he may reside?—That is my view. The corporation have already taken that view of it, connecting with it the question of their being freemen of London, but I apprehend the freedom qualification must be abolished, or the municipality of London is constrained to grow less every year. If we are to confine it to the question of residence in London we shall only have a constituency representing the minor interests of publicans, fellowship-porters, and police officers. I think if gentlemen can be found to resort for the daily franchise of business to London, you may safely entrust them with privileges as municipal electors. If a gentleman lives at Brighton and comes up to discharge his trading avocations, I do not see why, though he lives at Brighton, he should not be as good an elector as if he lived within 7 miles of London.

7198. Supposing he is a partner in a large house in London, and does not take an active part in it, but resides in the north, and does not personally come to London at all, would his being a partner in that house and in that way occupying premises in London make him a voter?—I would constrain all men to be placed upon the list, however high their rank, or however wealthy they might be. Every man who thinks it worth his while to be connected with the trade and commerce of London should be liable to perform all the offices of citizenship, and I do not know how you can draw a line, or compel some men to be liable to perform the duties and not others.

7199. Is your Lordship of opinion that the duty on coals is an expedient mode of levying money for municipal purposes?—I should have hesitated myself in originating such a tax, but I have heard very little complaint against the tax in my own walk of life. I do not think the coal-tax is felt to be any great grievance by any class which I have met with.

7200. You spoke in favour of the aldermen having the power to appoint paid magistrates in the City. Would you give to the aldermen themselves a co-ordinate jurisdiction with them?—I would give to the aldermen the same power of appointing a magistrate in the police courts, which is now by ancient charter given to them in the election of their Recorder. I think in carrying out the reduction of the number of aldermen to 18 it will be found that the public interests require that you should have one or two paid magistrates; but I should certainly guard that by giving to the aldermen optional power to appoint, in the event of their deeming it necessary. I do not see any objection to such a principle, inasmuch as the Court of Aldermen at present elect the Recorder, and the Court of Common Council elect the other judges of the Central Criminal Court and the Sheriff's Court. I would certainly retain to the aldermen the functions of magistracy which they have at present. I can conceive of nothing more popular nor anything more useful for the citizens of London than the present system.

7201. Do you attach importance to the retention of the separate jurisdiction over the police, which is now possessed by the corporation within the limits of the City of London?—I beg leave upon that head to express my conviction that when a community is enfranchised, the constitutional principle would be that they should have separate jurisdiction over their police; I should even go further, and say that in my judgment a municipality is incomplete unless its corporation has entire jurisdiction over the lighting of that district, and the supply of water to the district. I consider instead of the numerous companies which we have for lighting the City of London with gas, and supplying it with water, if powers were given to the corporation to buy up the interest of the private companies, and deal with the subject as one of municipal government, great advantage would result.

7202. Do you think it would be expedient as a general principle that supposing London to be divided into different municipal districts, the police should be under the control of those municipalities rather than in the hands of the general government?—I would certainly oppose the further extension of the powers of centralization in any government I think there might be regulations made by which the whole of those municipalities might work upon one uniform principle, but I have no idea that in any extension of the municipal franchise you ought to restrict them from the entire management of their own affairs.

7203. Do you think that having regard to the fact of London being the seat of government, and looking to its great size no difference arises in that respect?—I think the general government would be much more stable and secure when the control was left to other hands. I would contrast the cases of Paris and London. I think it is clear that the principle of centralization is a very unsound one both constitutionally and in practice.

7204. Your Lordship proposes to maintain a separate Court of Aldermen; the aldermen remaining as magistrates, although they might be empowered to appoint paid magistrates to sit in the police courts, would you propose to reserve to the Court of Aldermen any powers which are not connected with their magisterial duties?—I would give them the same powers which they now possess, of being members of the general body of the corporation.

7205. At present the Court of Aldermen exercise certain powers connected with magisterial duties, such as inspection of prisons; it also exercises some powers, not connected with magisterial duties. Do you think it desirable that the aldermen should retain the powers connected with their duties as magistrates?—I am not aware that they exercise any power now, of which it would be desirable to deprive them, nor would I deprive them of the sembiance of any power which they have; but, in arranging a new system, I think, as Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion, so I should leave the magistrates free from anything like the imputation that they have the power of drawing money out of the chamber for any improper or sinister purpose.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

7206. Have the aldermen much to do with the administration of any trust property belonging to the City of a charitable nature or otherwise?—In virtue of their office they are connected with the Royal Hospitals, and they also have exclusively committed to them the management of Emanuel Hospital. There is also a charitable trust which is conducted by the Lord Mayor for the time being, and the two senior aldermen and the chamberlain of London for lending money to poor tradesmen anxious to set up in business.

7207. Do they manage the City charities and the City estates more than the rest of the Common Council?—The City estates are altogether managed by the Common Council.

1208. The Court of Aldermen do not act as managers of any of the City property?—Only as members of the Court of Common Council.

7209. By custom they do not take any greater share in business of that kind than the members of the Court of Common Council generally do?—They never consider the question at all. The estates of the corporation are altogether managed by the Common Council and by the City Lands' committee. I wish further to say, that in considering that question I think such separate jurisdiction connected with the corporation as the Bridge Trust and the Irish Estates ought to be abolished, and the whole ought to centre in the corporation at large.

7210. The Bridge House Estates might be included with the City Estates without difficulty, might not they?—By the repeal of an Act of Parliament they might.

7211. The Irish Society manages estates which belong to the companies, does not it?—I do not know that the Irish Society manages estates belonging to the companies, it manages estates in connection with them. I am at a loss to see the usefulness of the society in its present position.

7212. Is not the ownership of the estates in the companies?—It is very difficult to know the exact constitution of the Irish Society. No member of the court can serve beyond two years—it takes him a twelvemonth before he can fully understand the business, and in another year he ceases to be a member.

7213. It has been stated that the corporation of London has no control or jurisdiction over any of the corporations in Ireland—do you know how that is?—I cannot answer that question satisfactorily.

7214. With respect to the extent to which the committees of the Common Council interfere with the ordinary duties of the officers of the corporation, do you think it is desirable that those committees should exercise so much detailed control as they appear to do upon the ordinary business of the different officers?—I should have thought the reverse had been the case, I think the officers generally exercise a great control over the committees. The committees sit and gather opinions very much indeed from their officers, and pay I think a very marked attention to those opinions.

7215. Still the officer cannot act without the authority of the committee, can he; he may be able to guide the committee by his advice, but he cannot act without their authority?—I apprehend you would not wish that to be the case. I think if the officers could act in defiance of the committees, the corporation would virtually be the officers and not the representatives.

7216. The responsibility is with the committee, not with the officer?—Certainly.

7217. In the detailed management of the City Estates, for example, is it desirable that the committees of the common council shall give all the directions, and that a general discretion should not be given to the officers?—I can conceive nothing to work better than the present system of corporate committees; the only objection I have ever entertained to the corporate committees has been in the case of such a committee, for instance, as the present consolidated committee. Sitting, as it does, in secret, with a great deal of mystery in its proceedings, some of its acts have in my opinion militated against the credit and the spirit of the corporation. The duty is referred to that committee of watching proceedings and taking measures, appointing deputations, going off with those deputations to members of the Government without the consent of the whole body—and such steps taken by a committee are, in my judgment, dangerous to the welfare of the common privileges of the body at large.

7218. You mean that they may commit the corporation to particular measures, which may not be in accordance with the wishes or interests of the body generally?—It has the effect of committing the corporation to a course of proceeding which sometimes is unwise, and, at all events, if it is wise, I think it unconstitutional.

7219. In the management of parliamentary business, or other business, there must be the power of acting according to circumstances, must not there?—A power on every question, I think, should be given by the body at large to their committee. In matters of negociation that committee depute their business to a sub-committee—that sub-committee is called the Deputation committee, and it goes and negociates with various members of the government, pledging the whole body to arrangements with the government. I have ever thought that the most objectionable system of this secret committee.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

27th Jan. 1854.

7220. According to the present system, does not each officer feel that he is the servant of the particular committee which has the superintendence of his department, rather than of the common council and the corporation at large?—I should say not.

7221. You do not think, for example, that the Superintendent of the Police feels that his instructions are taken from the committee of Police rather than from the common council, or that the comptroller takes his instructions from the City Lands committee rather than from the corporation at large?—I think either of them would be bound to pay deference to the instructions given by the committees, but the whole proceedings of the committees are subject to the approbation of the corporation at large. No committee (but the consolidated) can act, except upon a reference made to them by the general court.

Charles Farebrother, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

C. Farebrother, Esq.

7222. You are an alderman of the corporation of the City of London?—I am, and have been so for 28 years. I have the honour to attend to-day, in pursuance of a resolution of a committee of aldermen, that I, as the senior alderman present, in the absence of my honourable friend, Mr. Alderman Thompson, who is absent from London, should attend before the Commissioners to-day, for the purpose of expressing their entire approbation of the statement made by the learned Recorder, as containing the opinion of the Court of Aldermen. I am also further in attendance to have the honour of answering any questions which you may think proper to put to me connected with the court of which I am a member. I have not prepared myself to make any observations upon what may be the future regulations which may be necessary to be adopted for the purpose of extending the benefits which the City may be entitled to claim or the public to desire, because it was decidedly moved and agreed to in the court, that we should "tender the officers of the corporation and other witnesses as well to substantiate on oath the facts stated in the answer as to submit themselves to general examination upon all matters into which the Commissioners may think it right to inquire. We shall, however, ask leave to reserve the expression of any opinions, either corporate or individual, upon any alterations in the constitution or administration of the corporation till we have concluded what we intend to be a full and perfect refutation, either written or oral, of the various charges which have been preferred." I cannot but express, and I do express it strongly, in the name of the court of which I have the honour to be a member, and on behalf of a general committee assembled for the purpose of investigating the affairs of the City, and communicating with this Commission, that we are no parties, directly or indirectly, to the observations which have been made, or to the recommendations which have been offered by my Lord Mayor—they may be perfectly good—they may be what ought to be carried out, but we cannot help expressing our surprise that my honourable friend, who has quitted the room, should have volunteered, behind the back of his brethren, and without any communication with them or with the committee, the evidence which he has just given. He was present when the resolution was agreed to, which particularly alludes to the necessity of confining ourselves to giving an answer to the charges made against us, and after that submitting, if we felt inclined so to do, certain propositions to the Commission; and I have not the slightest hesitation in expressing my belief that when the evidence shall have been closed on both sides, and time has been allowed to the corporation of the City of London for the purpose of laying down a scheme for its better regulation, if there is the necessity for such a measure, the whole of the corporate body will, as one man, join in that which would be acceptable to this Commission and conducive to the benefit of our fellow citizens. Of that fact I have no doubt, because I have had the honour to attend the committee, and though there may have been differences of opinion in that committee, as there must be in all committees, for no committee can come to a proper resolution upon any point without such a difference of opinion as may create argument and discussion, I am sure, with respect to every measure which may be connected with the benefit of the City of London and be honourable to the Crown and to this country, the citizens of London, as a body, and the aldermen and the members of the common council have but one view and one wish, and that is to forward everything that shall tend to the respectability and honour of the City, and the benefit and advantage of the public.

7223. It was distinctly stated to the Commissioners that the observations which were made by the Lord Mayor were made in his individual capacity, and not as representing the corporation. We were perfectly ready to hear from him as we are from any other member of the corporation, any suggestions for improvement which in his opinion might be made in the corporation of the City of London; but we should not urge any member of the corporation to state any such opinions, unless he was perfectly willing to do so?—Everything that the Lord Mayor has suggested may be perfectly correct; but I wish the Commissioners to understand that the statement of the Lord Mayor is not the statement of the court of which he is a member; it is not the statement of the corporation. A question was put by one of the Commissioners to the Lord Mayor with respect to any power which the Court of Aldermen may have in the appointment of police magistrates. By the Police Act, which was passed in 1838, a power is given to the Court of Aldermen, in the event of their being unable to attend, or feeling the necessity of it, of appointing such magistrates, or such persons to attend as they may deem proper. I merely mention that because I do not think it is clearly understood that we have such an Act. I will only further call the attention of the Commissioners to the observation which has been made as to certain charities. There are a variety of charities, the administration of which is left by will to the Court of Aldermen for the time being they are trustees for those charities; and if they have committed any abuse which I am now ready to say they have not, they are responsible, as all other trustees are, to the proper court, for the neglect of their duties, and they may be dismissed from the trust which they have so improperly carried on. I mention this to show the distinction between certain charities which are left personally to the Court of Aldermen, if I may use the expression, and others which are mixed up with the City of London generally. With respect to the Irish Society, there appears to be some little misunderstanding. The Irish Society do not manage any portion of the estates which belongs to the different companies; they are managed by themselves. But there was an Act of Parliament constituting a society for the management of certain estates in which the City have rights, and in which different persons have particular rights. In the case of the Vintner's Company, for example, to which I have the honour of belonging, we have only an annuity chargeable out of those estates, and that annuity is received by the City land paid over to us. I take the liberty of saying that the corporation of the City of London do not interfere with any estates which are the separate property of the different companies. Having said so much, and having referred to this resolution, in which I fully agree, I again tender to you, as I have done, my humble opinion that whenever this inquiry shall be ended, there will be a meeting, and a submission to the Commissioners on the part of the City of London, of such a plan as we hope in their judgment may be acceptable to them, and acceptable to the public at large. But at present we are not prepared to submit that plan, because we have not yet heard all the evidence that is to be adduced either on the one side or the other; nor have we asked the opinion of the law officers upon certain points, for the purpose of being instructed by them what we ought to cede at once, or show a substantial reason why we think the power ought to be retained by the Court of Aldermen. Having said that, I now appear here as one of the aldermen of the City of London. Observations have been made upon us. I am not in the habit of quarrelling with any such representations which may be made. I am more disposed when I see such representations, and they are not founded in that truth which ought to belong to all representations, to leave them to find their own level, rather than give them anything in the shape or appearance of respectability of character by commenting on them. But I am now here merely as one of the aldermen to answer for the position of that court. You have the names before you, and I am prepared at this moment to answer as to their different avocations, and their different positions in life, to show, as I hope I can, that no gentleman is holding that position who is not worthy of the trust reposed in him, or who has not been chosen to that position by the well merited voice of the citizens of London. It is not for me to discuss whether the mode of election is right or wrong, that will be a matter for future consideration, but I take the liberty of saying that in the case of a gentleman who, like my friend, the Lord Mayor, has had the honour of passing first the ordeal of an election as sheriff, in the next place a second election for the office of alderman, and after that a third election for the office of chief magistrate of the City of London, occupying of necessity, at least, a space of some seven or eight years; during all which time his conduct, his character, his ability, his judgment, his humanity, and everything that is rightful and honourable to a man has been before the public, and who, upon those three several occasions has been pronounced to be a man of such character, and such respectability that he was entitled to the choice of his fellow citizens, no man of common honour, no man of common honesty, no man of common feeling, no man who loves justice would dare to impute an unjust character to any man holding such an honoured and honourable position. I say "honoured," because upon all occasions the magistrates are received with that respect, and candour, and kindness, which shows that they have public opinion in their favour, and upon all occasions the public opinion, sooner or later, is right. I will not occupy the time of the Commissioners with any further observations, unless it is your pleasure to put any questions to me with respect to the past. As regards the future, I will not offer any opinion. I will only repeat what I have ventured to state as the intention of the Court of Aldermen, and the intention of the Court of Common Council, or of the corporation jointly, which is to consider every matter, not as a matter affecting themselves individually, but as a matter affecting the general interests of the public and society at large.

C. Farebrother, Esq.

7224. You have stated that there is a committee now sitting to consider certain improvements and alterations which may be thought expedient by them, to be recommended to this Commission,—how is that committee composed?—It is composed of aldermen and common councilmen.

7225. A certain number of aldermen and a certain number of the common council?—I cannot say what is the precise constitution of the committee.

C. Farebrother, Esq.

27th Jan. 1854.

7226. Was the committee appointed for that special purpose, or is it one of the general committees of the corporation?—It is appointed for that special purpose; and it was that committee which drew up the statement submitted to the Commission by the learned Recorder on a former day.

Mr. Serjeant Adams.

7227. Are there any points to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—Having read the evidence of the Recorder as given in the Times newspaper of Wednesday last, respecting the restoration of the jurisdiction of the court over which I preside, I wish to be permitted, as the assistant judge, to place my views also upon that subject before the Commission. The learned Recorder says, that he considers the effect of the restoration of the jurisdiction of the Middlesex Sessions "to be extremely injurious "in its effects." Now, although that measure has very greatly increased my duties and responsibilities, I, on the contrary, believe that the public have been very much benefited by the change, and I am borne out in that opinion by the chief magistrate of police. The learned Recorder states further, that if the whole of the criminal jurisdiction were concentrated, "arrangements might be made for taking cases on particular days, whereby wit- "nesses need not be detained for a whole week, and the expenses would be considerably "reduced." Allow me to say, that it was to obtain all those important advantages that the jurisdiction of the sessions was restored, and they have been so fully attained by the arrangements which have been adopted, that, although the sessions sat in 1853, 132 days, and tried 2,650 cases, there were but forty which, except for special causes, were not tried on the days on which the bills were found, so that the average detention of the parties on each case did not amount to half a day, and as the cost of a trial at the sessions does not exceed 30*s.*, as appears by the parliamentary returns, while the cost of a trial at the Central Criminal Court of the same species of offence averages about 5*l.*, the saving to the country has exceeded 8,000*l.* With respect to the serious evils alluded to by the Recorder, "of "counsel handing over briefs to one another just to suit their own convenience," I must say I entirely agree with him, but it is a complaint of very old standing; and I may be permitted to doubt, with my experience of now nearly half-a-century, whether it is really caused, though it may be increased, by the increase of the jurisdiction of the sessions. Nearly one-half of the bar who practise before the Recorder, never come to my court at all, and the business has now so much increased at the session that there is always an efficient bar. There are also other lucrative courts to which the bar go, as for example the police courts, and I believe it will be found that the court over which I preside is not the only, or nearly the only, cause whereby briefs are so handed over. At the same time I admit the evil; but as far as the Court of Quarter Sessions is concerned, no counsel can take a brief for a case in that court, without knowing at the time he takes it the day when the case will come on, the arrangements are so complete. A sufficient number of sessions are held, so as never to overcrowd them: all male prisoners are tried on Wednesday, all female prisoners on Tuesday; and all bailed cases on Wednesday. This arrangement was made with a view to get rid as much as possible of any interference with the Central Criminal Court, as on Mondays there are, generally speaking, very few cases tried in the Central Criminal Court, and the judges do not attend there until Wednesday.

7228. Do the same counsel attend your court who attend the Old Bailey?—Some of them, but not in all; and the question really is, whether the minor inconvenience to certain counsel, of not being able to practise in both courts, must not yield to the great public advantages which resulted from the present arrangements.

7229. There was a particular instance mentioned, in which a counsel was not there, and it was supposed that he was attending in your court, upon which Mr. Justice Cresswell made some strong remarks?—There is a reference to that circumstance in the Recorder's evidence. Where the counsel really were, or what excuse was made to Mr. Justice Cresswell, I cannot say; but I can undertake positively to say they were not at my court, for I had that morning but one prisoner to try, who pleaded guilty. I did not sit ten minutes; it was therefore utterly impossible that it could have been because of the sitting of my court that the counsel were absent from the Central Criminal Court. The Recorder also stated that the Court of Quarter Sessions now sat "every month at the same time as the Central Criminal Court." That also is not exactly correct. The Court of Quarter Sessions sits from thirty-six to forty weeks in every year, and if the sittings of the Central Criminal Court were monthly there would be no difficulty in fixing the sessions so that the two courts should never clash. But the sittings of the Central Criminal Court are, I do not doubt for sufficient reason, extremely irregular; sometimes the adjournment is for a fortnight only, sometimes it is for six weeks, occasionally five weeks, often three weeks, and sometimes four weeks.

7230. Though there may be those uncertain intervals, the days are fixed, are not they?—They are all fixed days, but it renders it impossible for a court, which has to sit from thirty-six to forty weeks in a year, so to arrange that it shall not occasionally interfere with the other.

Mr. Serjeant Adams.

27th Jan. 1854.

The sittings of the Central Criminal Court are fixed to meet the convenience of the judges, and the arrangement of terms and assizes, and so on. All I mean to say is that it renders it impossible for me to arrange my sittings so as never to clash with theirs, although every endeavour is made to do so. This leads me to another part of what the learned Recorder has stated. He says he is of opinion that it would be better "to consolidate the criminal jurisdiction, and have but one court." I hesitate in giving an opinion upon that subject, from the very deep personal interest I have in the question, for such a consummation must necessarily tend greatly to diminish my labours, by equalizing the duties of the metropolitan criminal judges, which are now most unequally divided, for while, as I have already stated, the number of days on which the assistant judge sat in 1853 was 132, and the number of cases tried in his court 2560, the number of cases tried by all the judges of the other courts united, including the judges of the land, was only 1,135, and the number of days on which that court sat 56. The Recorder, common serjeant, and commissioners sitting on an average forty days each. There can be no doubt whatever that such a measure would obviate any inconveniences which may now exist from the counsel having to attend different courts, and the prison officers being then all at one court, would have a better means of identifying the old offenders. I do not myself see any practical difficulty in framing such a jurisdiction, and thereby giving to all the suitors of that court, if I may use that term, the same advantages arising from the absence of delay, &c. which has already been obtained by the suitors to the sessions. Of course, if such a court were established, I presume the Recorder of the City of London in virtute officii would be the head of it; and I hope I shall not offend the Recorder's good taste if I say that I believe it would be the unanimous opinion of the profession that a more efficient, upright, or excellent man could not be found to fill that office. If such a jurisdiction were established it would not require a weekly sitting, but about thirty-six sittings in the year would be amply sufficient, and a provision might easily be made by which the judges should only be required to attend, say eight or ten times in the course of the year. I believe also that if grand juries were dispensed with, and all the ordinary cases of committals of police magistrates, a full fourth of the time and costs of a trial would be saved. Speaking of the cases at the sessions only, I believe the grand juries to be perfectly useless; and a session scarcely passes in which they do not express the same opinion of themselves.

F. T. Southgate, Esq.

Francis Thomas Southgate, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

7231. Have you seen the evidence of Mr. Matthews, given before this Commission?—I have it before me.

7232. What knowledge have you on the subject of which he speaks?—I was solicitor for the defendant in the case he referred to. I see that the statements of Mr. Matthews, though not untrue, still are calculated to leave an inference which is not correct on the minds of the Commissioners.

7233. Was Mr. Matthews solicitor for the plaintiff in the case he mentions?—He was. A few minutes will enable me to state the whole of the case. The parties held property next to one another in Gravesend. The whole of the town of Gravesend fronting upon the water is built upon embankments between high and low water mark. Adjoining to the property of my client were the premises of Mr. Simmons, who was the plaintiff, which stood upon an embankment. Immediately on the other side of my client's property was an embankment which had been recently created by the authority of the Navigation committee. The consequence was, that between the two embankments my client had an inlet. I have here a plan of the spot in question—(producing the same). The Commissioners will see by this plan a row of low and very inferior houses running along here, the tenants of which have been in the habit of throwing their refuse and filth into this inlet; a common sewer running along the common thoroughfare also emptied itself on to the premises. It was considered a great nuisance, and an application was made by the owner and the lessee to the Navigation committee for liberty to embank this spot. They sent down a deputation of the Navigation committee, who viewed it. Along with the memorial requesting liberty to embank was a certificate from the whole of the medical practitioners of the town of Gravesend, stating that it was a great nuisance and injurious to the health of the neighbourhood. There was also sent to the Navigation committee a representation, by the owners of almost all the property in the immediate neighbourhood, that it would be a great benefit to the neighbourhood if the inlet were filled up. The sub-committee reported upon the whole of those circumstances to the General Navigation committee. When the General committee met, Mr. Simmons attended, and made objection to this inlet being filled up, on the ground that he had by user obtained a right over it. On hearing his statement, the Navigation committee, unwilling to interfere in a case in which there was a dispute upon a question of private right, determined, although they were fully convinced that the embankment would be beneficial to the neighbourhood, and not detrimental to the river, they must under the circumstances refuse to grant the permission which was asked for; the ground of that determination, as we presume, being that they did not choose to interfere between two parties both claiming a right. The parties, however, thinking that they would not be interfered with by the corporation, as the Navigation committee had said that it would not be detrimental to the navigation of the river, while it would be beneficial to the neighbourhood, proceeded to fill up the inlet, and to drive piles for the purpose of making an embankment. There were a great many disputes took place, and the piles were sawn through in the night, and fights were not uncommon between the labourers and the parties; the magistrates were appealed to, but they would not interfere in a matter of disputed right; and thereupon Mr. Simmons filed a bill to restrain the defendants from filling up the dock. He obtained an injunction upon the condition, not as Mr. Matthews stated, that he would try an action at law, whether he had the right with others to use that portion of the river, but whether he had the private right which he claimed over that portion of the river. The action was tried before the Lord Chief Baron. The declaration in the action was that he had the right to the use of that portion of the river by an occupation by him and his predecessors of premises adjoining and user of that portion of the river for 60 years. When the plaintiff's evidence was concluded, it was contended, and the Lord Chief Baron held, that there was no case for the plaintiff, for he had not proved his right as such occupier. Thereupon permission was asked to amend, and the Lord Chief Baron gave permission to amend, and the declaration was then altered, the effect of the alteration being that Mr. Simmons then sued on the ground that, as one of the public, he had a right to use this part of the river. The jury returned a verdict of 1*s.* damages. The Lord Chief Baron, having an opinion as to the nature of the action, refused to certify, so as to entitle the plaintiff to costs. Upon this verdict being given the plaintiff went to the Vice-Chancellor, who said that the litigation was a great disgrace, but that the injunction might be made perpetual, but having regard to all the circumstances, each party must pay his own costs. The result has been that Mr. Simmons has had to pay the whole of his own costs of the action and of the suit in Chancery.

F. T. Southgate, Esq.

7234. Though he obtained an injunction and a verdict of 1*s.* damages?—We could not help his having a verdict, because it was a public navigable river; but to show the opinion of both of the judges who tried the cause, they both refused to give the plaintiff any costs whatever. Mr. Matthews endeavours to affix some blame upon the Navigation committee, because they have not interfered to remove the embankment. I wish the Commissioners, however, to observe that there is no order of the Vice-Chancellor that this embankment is to be removed, but only that it is not to be carried further by the defendant—in fact (for that is what I believe it amounts to) that we had no legal right to do it without the permission of the Navigation committee. I attend before the Commissioners to make this statement in order to show that the Navigation committee only refused to interfere in the matter on the ground that this was a squabble between the parties whether this was a private right or not. Mr. Matthews has not told the Commissioners the previous proceedings in which he was engaged, nor that having abandoned his claim of private right he afterwards sued as one of the public, claiming to use the shore of a navigable river.

7235. Mr. Matthews said that the object of enclosing this space and embanking it was that your client might build upon it?—It would be a wharf, the same as the adjoining property whether he might build upon it I cannot say. My client had been receiving rent for this portion of the shore for a period of seventeen or eighteen years. The difficulty that arose was with the pleadings—we had to plead custom, which was negatived.

E. Tyrrell, Esq.

Edward Tyrrell, Esq., was further examined as follows:—

7236. On a former occasion you were so good as to promise to prepare a statement for the Commissioners with respect to the coal duty, which would enable them more distinctly to understand how that matter stands. Have you prepared such a statement?—I have prepared such a statement, and with the permission of the Commissioners I will proceed to read it.

(The witness read the same as follows:)

"The corporation of London are entitled by prescription, confirmed by charters and Acts of Parliament, to the office of measurer of all coals, grain, fruit, and things whatever measurable brought into the river Thames, between Staines in the county of Middlesex, and Yenleete Creek in the county of Kent, and the Medway and the port of London, and upon every bank, shore or wharf of the said rivers.

"In the reign of King James the First, the Crown instituted proceedings against the corporation calling upon them among other things, to show by what title they claimed the office of measurer within the limits aforesaid. The Attorney General of that day, (Sir Edward Coke,) in his reply to the City's plea, admitted the right of the corporation to the office in question, with all fees and emoluments, which was subsequently confirmed by two charters granted by King James the First, in the third year of his reign, confirming to the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the City of London and their successors for ever their right to exercise the aforesaid office, and to receive, collect and enjoy all the fees, wages, rewards and profits, whatsoever pertaining and belonging to the said offices and measurings. The second charter of King James the First, granted in the twelfth year of his reign, states that a question had arisen whether the weighing of coals belonged to the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the City of London, and confirms the right of the corporation of London to the office of weighing, and the sum of 8*d.* per ton on coals as the fee to be paid.

"The fee paid to the corporation for weighing coals was 4d. per chaldron.

"By custom a court of record was held in the City of London for the care and government of orphans, and the Lord Mayor and aldermen were invested with the custody and guardianship of all orphan children of freemen while under age and unmarried, and with the management of the personal estate of deceased freemen.

Freemen of the city had also the privilege of investing their property at interest in the chamber of London, and availed themselves of such privilege when the interest to be obtained from investment or other securities was less than 4*l.* per cent., the rate allowed by the said chamber.

"From these sources very large sums had accumulated in the chamber of London, which in the reign of King Charles II. were invested in Exchequer tallies, when, by a financial expedient of that day, which was called closing the Exchequer, the money was entirely lost to the corporation and their creditors, and they were compelled to declare themselves incapable of discharging either the interest or the principal of their debts amounting to upwards of 750,000*l.* to the orphans and others.

"Under these circumstances from 1689 to 1694 the corporation of London presented several petititions to Parliament setting forth that by their great losses their debts to the orphans amounted to a sum vastly greater than they were enabled to pay, they prayed the House to assist them by making provision for the discharge of these and the claims of other creditors, and ultimately, by the 5th and 6th of William and Mary, cap. 10, relief was afforded by the establishment of the Orphans' fund.

"This statute, intituled, 'An Act for the relief of the orphans and other creditors 'of the City of London,' charges the estates of the City of London with an annual payment of 8,000*l.* and assigns to the funds the rents and profits of the City aqueducts or right of bringing water to London, imposes a duty of 2,000*l.* per annum to be levied upon the personal property of the inhabitants of the City, assigns the rents and profits arising from a lease of the exclusive privilege of lighting the City with convex lights, imposes a duty of half a crown upon the binding of every apprentice, and five shillings on the admission of every freeman into the City. A duty of four shillings per ton on all wines imported into the port of the City of London and a duty of fourpence per chaldron or ton additional meterage on every chaldron or ton of coal and culm so imported for ever, and a duty of sixpence for every chaldron or ton to be imported for fifty years.

"By an Act of 21 Geo. II. cap. 29, intituled "An Act for the further relief of the 'Orphans and others creditors of the City of London, and for other purposes therein 'mentioned,' the duty of sixpence per chaldron on coals and culm was continued for 35 years longer, and the estates of the City were charged with a further sum of 2,000*l.* per annum towards the fund.

"By an Act of the 7th of of King George III. chap. 37, 'An Act for completing the 'bridge across the River Thames, from Blackfriars, in the City of London, to the 'opposite side in the county of Surrey, and the avenues thereto on the London side, for 'redeeming the tolls on the said bridge, and on London bridge, for rebuilding the gaol 'of Newgate, in the said City, for repairing the Royal Exchange, within the same, for 'embanking part of the North side of the said river within certain limits and for further 'continuing towards those purposes the imposition of sixpence per chaldron or ton of 'coals and culm imported into the port of the said City, established by an Act of 'the 5th and 6th years of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, and also for 'carrying on the new pavements in the city and liberties of Westminster and parishes 'adjacent, and in the town and borough of Southwark, and for other purposes therein 'mentioned,' the duty of sixpence per chaldron or ton was continued for 46 years, and the City revenues were further charged with 1,500*l.* per annum to the Orphans' Fund for 46 years.

"By an Act of the 44th of King George III. chap. 27, 'An Act for raising an additional 'sum of money for carrying into execution several Acts' for windening the entrance into the 'City of London near Temple Bar, for making a more commodious street at Snow Hill, and 'for raising on the credit of the Orphan's Fund certain sums of money for those purposes; 'and also for enlarging the powers of the said Acts, the duty of 6*d.* per chaldron or ton upon coal was continued for five years and three-quarters, and the yearly sum of 1,500*l.* on the City revenues was continued for the same period.

"By an Act of the 47th of King George III. Session 2, chap. 68, 'An Act for repealing 'the several Acts for regulating the vend and delivery of coals within the cities of London 'and Westminster and Liberties thereof, and in certain parts of the counties of Middlesex, 'Surrey, Kent, and Essex, and for making better provision for the same,' a coal duty of 1*d.* per chaldron or ton was imposed for the purpose of purchasing lands for building and establishing a coal market.

E. Tyrrell, Esq

" By an Act of the 10th of George IV. chap. 136, intituled 'An Act for Improving the 'Approaches to London Bridge,'—under that Act the name of the fund was changed—it is called there the 'Fund,' in lieu of the old name of the 'Orphans' Fund,"—the duty of 6*d.* per chaldron or ton on coals was continued for twenty-one years, and the duty of 4*d.* was also to form part of the fund.

" By an Act of the 11th of King George IV. chap. 64, an Act intituled 'An Act to 'make further provision for defraying the expenses of making the approaches to London 'Bridge and the removal of Fleet Market,' the duty on wine, on apprentices, freedoms, and aqueducts, and the several sums of 8,000*l.*, 2,000*l.*, and 1,500*l.* per annum, and half of the profits of Fleet Market were applied to and formed part of the Improvement Fund.

" By an Act of the 1st & 2d of King William IV. chap. 76, 'An Act for regulating 'the vend and delivery of coals in the cities of London and Westminster and in certain 'parts of the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, Essex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, 'and Berkshire,' the duty of 1*d.* per ton is continued for the purpose of the coal market 'and other objects,' the duty payable to the corporation of London was commuted to 4*d.* per ton, and the two duties of 6*d.* and 4*d.* per chaldron or ton were commuted to 8*d.* per ton. By that Act a complete change was made in the system of selling coals—instead of being sold by measure, they were thenceforth to be sold by weight.

" The corporation of London were consenting parties to this Act. They gave up 4*d.* out of the 8*d.* per ton they were entitled to receive for weighing coals, they took upon themselves the compensation to the sea-coal meters, then 18,371*l.* 15*s.* per annum, now amounting to about 7,500*l.* per annum, and gave up several minor charges, estimated at 3,200*l.* per annum.

" By an Act of the 1st & 2d Victoria, chap. 101, 'An Act to continue for seven years 'an Act for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in London and Westminster and in 'certain parts of the adjacent counties,' the Act of 1st & 2d William IV. chap. 76, was continued for seven years.

" By an Act of the 3d & 4th of Queen Victoria, chap. 131, 'An Act to continue for 'four years from the 5th day of July, 1858, the duties now levied on coal and wines 'imported into the port of London,' the duty of 6*d.* per chaldron or ton was continued for four years, and the duty on wine was continued for four years.

" By the 8th & 9th of Queen Victoria, chap. 101, 'An Act to continue until the 5th 'day of July, 1862, the Acts for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in London and 'Westminster and in certain parts of the adjacent counties, and to alter and amend the 'said Act,' the two former Acts were continued till the year 1862, and by that Act the coal duties were payable on all coals brought within twenty miles of the General Post Office; and the duty of 1*d.* per ton, formerly payable for the coal market, which the corporation of London relinquished, was applied to public improvements in the metropolis under the direction of the Board of Works.

" By an Act of the 13th & 14th of Queen Victoria, chap. 103, 'An Act to authorize 'further charges upon the London Bridge Approaches Fund for the completion of certain 'improvements in the metropolis,' the parts of the fund which were not permanent were continued until the 5th of July, 1862.

" By an Act of the 14th & 15th Victoria, chap. 146, entituled, 'An Act to amend the 'Acts relating to the vend and delivery of coals in London and Westminister, and in 'certain parts of the adjacent counties, and to allow a drawback upon coals conveyed 'beyond certain limits,' the regulations for the collection of the duties on coal were defined and improved, and a drawback granted for all coals conveyed beyond twenty miles of the General Post Office, the words, 'in a direct line,' were inserted in the Act to prevent any legal difficulty in the construction of the words 'within the distance of twenty miles from the General Post Office.' The opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and of the corporation, already given in evidence, is conclusive that the area of taxation was not extended by this Act.

" The whole of the sums due to the orphans and other creditors of the corporation of London, were paid off in the year 1834, and the final account audited by the Public Audit Commissioners at Somerset House, is in the possession of the corporation.

" All the sums of money charged upon the London Bridge Approaches Fund for improvements within the City of London, have been paid off.

" The sums charged upon the London Bridge Approaches Fund for improvements in the metropolis, not within the City of London, amounted, on the 5th January 1853, to 1,042,302*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*; a detailed account of these improvements, and the Acts under the authority of which they were made, will be found in Appendix A.

" The charges made upon the one penny per ton duty on coals, are not known to the corporation of London.

" The corporation of London have effected various public improvements out of the coal duty of 4*d.* per ton belonging to them. A statement of the charges made upon the coal duty of 4*d.* per ton will be found in Appendix B.

E. Tyrrell, Esq.

27th Jan. 1854.

7237. It would appear from the statement which you have read that there is an essential distinction between the 4*d.* duty on coal and the other duties. The 4*d.* duty is permanent, and I believe is claimed by the City as a part of their own estate, subject to their own uncontrolled discretion. The rest of the duty on coal is temporary, and will expire in the year 1862, and is affected, by the Act of Parliament, to particular objects of public improvement?—That is the case.

7238. The 700,000*l.* which the City lost, upon the closing of the Exchequer by Charles the Second, has been long ago repaid, has not it?—The last portion was repaid in 1834; it need not have continued so long, but there were parties who were disposed to allow their money to remain there as long as they could.

7239. Out of this 4*d.* duty, is it the fact or not that the City have given large sums to the general improvement of the metropolis beyond the limits of the City?—Not out of the 4*d.* duty, but out of their general funds.

7240. Do the City draw no distinction between the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty and the proceeds of their general estate?—For a vast number of years it formed part of their general property—within the last few years a certain portion of it has been assigned for public improvement.

7241. Do they consider that the metropolis at large has a claim upon the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty which it has not upon the City estates?—I do not think they consider that there is any legal claim; but they have, for some years past, voted very large sums out of that 4*d.* duty for improvements within the City of London, which are also improvements which other parts of the metropolis have the benefit and advantage of.

7242. Have they devoted no part of the proceeds of that 4*d.* duty to the improvements which have taken place in other parts of the metropolis?—No further than that the 4*d.* formed part of that general fund, out of which general fund they have contributed very large sums of money to improvements without their boundaries.

7243.—Is this 4*d.* duty now specially mortgaged for any particular purposes?—Yes.

7244. To what extent?—I think there is about 580,000*l.* mortgaged for New Cannon Street, besides other charges.

7245. I suppose the rest of the City property is an available security for that mortgage?—I apprehend, under the terms of the mortgage, if the coal duty were not sufficient the other parts of the city property would be liable.

7246. Waiving altogether the general justice or expediency of such a step, what would be the financial effect of allowing this 4*d.* duty to expire in 1862, together with the rest of the coal duty?—I am hardly able to tell you fully what the financial effect would be but it would leave very large sums of money to be paid by the Corporation of London, which have been advanced on the credit of the 4*d.* duty.

7247. Do you mean that the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty, if applied to the redemption of those debts, would not be sufficient, before the year 1862, to pay them off?—A calculation was made by Mr. Scott upon that subject, last year; and, if I remember correctly, he stated it would take about 16 years to pay off the amount now charged upon the 4*d.* duty.

7248. If it had been the case that the proceeds of that duty had been sufficient between this and the year 1862, to pay off the debts specially affected to it, the result of its cessation would merely have been to have thrown upon the ratepayers of the City a payment equivalent to the proceeds of the tax, would it not?—No, that would not have have been the result, because the corporation have no power to call upon the ratepayers of the City to contribute any sums for improvements.

7249. Supposing upon the cessation of the coal duty all over the metropolis, a general power was given to levy an improvement rate in lieu of a coal duty, of course the City of London would have the same power as the rest of the metropolis, of levying money for that purpose, only in another way?—Yes; but as I stated on a former occasion, I think there might be great difficulty in getting parties to agree to a rate of that sort, and, undoubtedly it would not be money so immediately or so readily applicable as the fund arising from a certain duty like the coal duty.

7250. You state that the 4*d.* is considered as part of the City estate, and not specially affected to improvements?—Within the last six or seven years, the Court of Common Council have resolved to apply 20,000*l.* a year out of the 4*d.* duty, for the purpose of improvements. Since that period several large sums have been charged upon the 4*d.* duty, for the purpose of improvements.

7251. There is this great difference between that part of the City revenue and all the other branches of the City revenue, is there not—that that branch is contributed to by the inhabitants of the whole of the metropolis, and those living within twenty miles, whereas the rest of the revenue comes from the estates of the City and sources which are contributed to by the citizens themselves?—The corn duties, and other duties of that nature are paid by the inhabitants of the metropolis generally.

7252. Still this is the largest of those dues?—It is.

7253. Is there any other observation which you desire to make?—Mr. Pemberton, in his evidence, at No. 2992, in respect to the Greenwich Pier Act, says, a clause was inserted "saving the rights of the Crown." Mr. Pemberton should rather have said, the clause was to save "any rights of the Crown." The Commissioners will observe the distinction. The words "the rights," recognize their existence; the words "any rights of the Crown" imply a reservation merely in case there should be any.

JOHN WOOD, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows: John Wood, Esq.

27th Jan. 1854.

7254. Are you chairman of the Consolidated committee of the Court of Common Council?—I am. I attend here as such chairman, the Court of Common Council having, by a resolution of the 30th of June last, ordered that it be referred to the Consolidated committee to assist the inquiry before the Royal Commission on behalf of the corporation of London, and afford the fullest information on every subject connected therewith; and that all the officers, clerks, and servants of the corporation be authorized to attend before the Commissioners, and give them the fullest information in their power, both oral and documentary. The Commissioners will permit me, on behalf of the Consolidated committee to say that it has been their most anxious desire to afford, through the means of their officers, and otherwise, the fullest information they consider the Commissioners might require. I am instructed to state now that if there should be any other officers that the Commissioners would wish to examine, they will be presented to you. Our officers are numerous, and we have tendered to you, in the exercise of our discretion, such of them as we thought necessary, but it will be for the Commissioners, if they think fit, to call for the remainder of the officers, or as many as they think desirable. The Commissioners have not required the attendance of members of the corporation, but it has been thought respectful to the Commissioners that certain members of the court should present themselves to you for examination upon any points respecting which you might think fit to put questions to them. Having said this much, and having heard a portion of the statement made by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor to day, I will take leave to read the terms of the appointment of the Consolidated committee. On the 22d of May, 1846, it was "Resolved and Ordered that a committee of the corporation, consisting of the chairman "of the several committees of this court, together with the committee appointed on the "3d day of April 1845, be a committee, to be called the Consolidated committee, with "full power to confer with her Majesty's Government and others upon such of the "matters especially referred to the several committees as the Consolidated committee "shall deem expedient, and that the committee refer to this court, from time to time, as "they shall find necessary. Resolved, that William Thompson, Esq., and Alderman, "M.P., be added to the said committee." That committee consists of about sixty members.

7255. Is not that rather a large and inconvenient number for the transaction of business?—For ordinary committees it would be too large, but when I have stated what I am about to state, you will probably think the court were right in so constituting the committee. Among the duties of that committee has been that of conferring, from time to time, with the Government and with other bodies upon matters of importance to the corporation and to the public at large. The Commissioners will, I think, see the convenience of the members of the corporation generally being acquainted with the proceedings of a committee like this, in relation to such subjects, without the necessity of convening, from time to time, the Court of Common Council. The object of putting upon the committee the chairman of every committee of the court was, that any matter which any particular committee had in charge might, if it were of importance to the corporation generally, be considered, from time to time, in this committee. Another purpose was, that if communications were going on with the government or others, the various committees might, through their chairman, be informed of the proceedings of this Consolidated committee, by which means every member of the court, without the formality of a meeting of the Court of Common Council, might know what was being transacted in that committee. As an illustration of the operation of this, I may mention to the Commissioners that the Consolidated committee have, within the last few days, felt it necessary not only to be in consultation with the chairmen of the several committees, but, with the sanction of those chairmen, to call together all the committees of the court upon matters connected with this Commission; thus the whole body of the court has in fact met, and it has been felt to be productive of much good, as a means of communication informing members of the transactions going on.

7256. You mean that the whole Court of Common Council meet only in another form?—The object is to meet freely to confer upon the state of things now. It has all the effect of a court without its formality. Sometimes in the formality of a court there is not that same quietude of feeling and observation as when members of the court are called together in the manner I have mentioned. Imperfectly as I heard the Lord Mayor, it struck me that he represented that this committee had taken upon itself, by a deputation of its members, not only to confer with the government upon various matters, but to agree with the government in respect to them. Nothing can be more incorrect than that, and I could not, on my own part, or on the part of the corporation, permit a statement of that kind to be made without taking the earliest opportunity of correcting it. The fact is, we have had various communications with the government, more especially with regard to that important subject, the bed and soil of the river, into the details of which I do not enter, because our learned recorder and our learned town clerk have been heard before you, and I believe have put before you the main facts. Having been on this committee from its formation, I have been acquainted with the facts stated, and I have been in personal communication with the recorder and others with regard to some matters which at the time were necessarily treated as confidential. The Commissioners will at once see that if there were not some parties entrusted with the management of subjects of importance, who had a discretion to negociate, no satisfactory arrangements could be arrived at. Communications have been had with various governments. I have been present at interviews with Lords of the Admiralty, with Lord John Russell, with Lord Aberdeen, with Lord Carlisle, Lord Seymour, and others, upon matters affecting the corporation and the public, and if what passed at those interviews could with propriety be made public, it would be seen that the only object in view was the general good. It has been the custom for deputations to report their proceedings to the general body, and for the committee, when necessary, to report to the common council. The government have always been told by the deputation that it was not possible for them to do more than treat upon certain subjects; but if the treaty arrived at such a stage as would enable the committee to proceed to a recommendation to the Court of Common Council, then the committee would report, and the court would probably agree. I should think, with the Lord Mayor, that it would be too great a power to commit to any members of the court the right of binding the court without express authority. I am not aware that any such thing has been done. Having heard other statements made to-day by the Lord Mayor, for whom as long as I have known him I have entertained the greatest respect, I may say I came here without any intention, on my part, to express an opinion as to what changes, if any, it would be desirable to make in the corporation of London; while I say that, I may observe, that I should be willing, in my individual capacity, at another time to state my views in that respect. On my own mind there was an impression, in fact there has been an understanding on the part of myself and other members, that we should attend before you to state any facts within our knowledge upon which we might think it desirable to give you information; but we desired to reserve any expression of opinion as to alterations in the constitution or management of the corporation till the whole of the facts have been laid before you, and till an opportunity had been given us in the Court of Common Council to consider whether we could not, as a corporation, present some suggestions to you that might be worthy of your consideration. While, therefore, I do not now express any opinion, I hold myself at liberty on a future day, if it should be thought right, and you should permit, supposing the Court of Common Council do not present to you any suggestions, to trouble you with any observations which I may have to make. There are various matters of management connected with the corporation of London as to sewers, as to improvements, and other matters, upon which other members of the corporation will give evidence, and I do not propose to trouble you with any observations or facts upon subjects which other gentlemen are prepared to speak to. But I will say, with regard to my experience of the working of the corporation, and particularly of the committees, the business has been exceedingly well done. I have been a member of the corporation for about sixteen years, and my experience satisfies me that, however necessary it may be in some respects to make an alteration in the constitution of the court, or in matters affecting it, the general management of the business cannot, in my opinion, be better than it has been.

7257. Do not you think the machinery might be simplified?—That is one of the matters upon which I may hereafter be prepared to offer an opinion. I now speak of the general management of the business by the committees and by the officers.

7258. You mean to express a high opinion of the integrity and qualification of the officers of the City, so far as you have observed them?—Yes. I feel that I should not do my duty to them if I did not in the strongest terms testify my high opinion of their talent as well as of their integrity; and it is satisfactory to me to be able to make this statement. Some allusion has been made in the course of this inquiry to the Consolidated committee having expended large sums of money secretly in various ways. I can I only say, that I know of nothing of the kind. The statement of Mr. Scott has been before you, in reference to what has been spent in the purchase of newspapers; also as to the payment of a sum of money connected with the establishment of a projected newspaper. I can state, that whatever was done with reference to that subject, the committee, as a committee, never gave any directions at all. Some members of the committee may have thought that the matter was one which was fit to be encouraged, but the committee did not give any directions about it.

7259. Did not the committee ultimately sanction the repayment of the sums advanced?—Yes. That was after the matter had quite ceased; they had nothing to do with the getting-up of the newspaper, or with its proceedings; and I believe nothing whatever was paid by the Corporation in respect of it till long after it had ceased to exist.

7260. Mr. Scott stated to the commissioners, that he considered that expenditure, which may be called perhaps an irregular expenditure, was almost a single instance of the kind. Is that your experience?—Quite so. I may say, when I heard a statement to the effect that the Consolidated committee had expended 1,000*l.* a-year in bribing the press, I was a little indignant; but I felt that the time would come when that matter would be set right before you, and that it was not becoming in the corporation to do more than to wait that time. Nothing of the sort was ever thought of or contemplated. The expenditure has been only of the nature which has been put before you. A certain sum has been spent in purchasing and in distributing newspapers which has averaged about 160*l.* or 180*l.* a year.

7261. Admitting, which I see no reason to doubt, that the expenditure in regard to this newspaper was a single instance of the kind, do you think it desirable that there should be such a system of accounts established as would render it impossible for any kind of concealment to take place in the expenditure of public money?—I am not aware that there was anything like concealment. This sum appeared in the accounts.

7262. Did not it appear in such a form as to render it impossible that the public could have discovered that money was actually spent in that manner?—I am not aware that that is so.

7263. Another instance was brought before us in regard to Smithfield Market. A considerable sum was expended in opposing the bill for the removal of the market. Without entering into the question whether it was a right or a wrong way of spending money, do not you think a full statement of such expenditure ought to appear ultimately before the body whose money is expended?—No payment could be made by the chamberlain to any person without a warrant signed by seven members of the committee to authorize it?—

7264. Do not you think it desirable that there should be some stricter and more accurate mode of rendering the accounts established, which would really account for every hundred pounds spent in such a manner as that those whose money it is should see how it is gone?—I think there should be such a statement of accounts as would inform the minds of any persons reading the account of the nature of the expenditure. Perhaps it would be impossible always to put the detail of every particular sum in a general account such as we print. The matter of the expenditure would appear upon the warrant to the chamberlain, and upon the report of the particular committee.

7265. The question is one entirely apart from the propriety of the expenditure If such a sum as 2,500*l.* could be concealed from public observation by the mode of stating the purposes for which it was granted, of course there would be a means of concealing the expenditure of any sum for any purpose whatever?—I have not looked into the particular question which the Commisssioner refers to. I am not a member of the Markets Improvement committee. If that sum was the expenditure incurred in opposing that particular bill, I think a general statement of the object of it would be sufficient for the general account; but I think there should be some means of arriving at the details. The Consolidated committee considered it desirable to take some effectual means of promoting the circulation of reports of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council, and it was referred to a sub-committee to carry out temporarily that resolution, at a cost not exceeding 20*l.* per week, and to devise such means as they might think expedient for a permanent arrangement, and to report the same for the approbation of the Consolidated committee. That sub-committee consisted of myself as chairman of the committee, it being usual to put the chairman upon those sub-committees; Mr. Norris, Mr. Lowman Taylor, Mr. Blake, Mr. Low, Mr. Richard Taylor, and Mr. Holt. I believe nothing final was done under that resolution. Various suggestions were made. One was, that short-hand writers should be asked to take notes of the proceedings of the corporation, and that transcripts of those notes should be sent to the various newspapers; but the expense of that, it was estimated might amount to something like 2,000*l.* a year, and that was abandoned. Other propositions were made, and at length it was suggested that, whenever anything took place in our court, we should be furnished with 300 copies of the following day's newspaper. In respect to the committees, there is one to which I will refer. We have large sums of money to pay annually for law and conveyancing business; and a committee was appointed about ten years ago, called the Law Bills committee, consisting of the solicitors in the court and some few other members, and the chairmen of all the other committees. Of course the amount of the bills has every year been large; out of those amounts however, the necessary disbursements have also been large, and I may say, that I think the corporation have every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which that committee has acted, though I am not quite sure that the officers of the corporation might be so well satisfied themselves. Previously to the appointment of the Law Bills committee, it was usual to refer any bill incurred by direction of any particular committee to some solicitor who happened be a member of it; if there was no solicitor on the committee, it was referred to some solicitor in the court, who was asked to examine it. This led to anything but uniformity in dealing with bills. What one solicitor would allow, another solicitor would disallow; and it was thought that by constituting a committee of this kind, and placing upon it all the solicitors in the court, troubling them to examine the bills, first seeing that the bill was certified by the particular committee by whose direction the business was transacted, uniformity would be secured. They meet in committee. The chairman of the particular committee will state that the business was done; the vouchers would be produced; sometimes the members of the committee take bills home and carefully go through them. They make such deductions as they think proper, and then report to the committee. This system has all the effect of a taxation by a taxing master, except that I think it is true what some of the officers have stated to me, that possibly, if their bills were to go to a taxing officer they would be dealt with more liberally than they are by the members of the court,

7266. As far as your observation goes, you believe that the expenditure under the head of Law Proceedings, is effectually controlled?—I am quite sure of it. It cannot be open in my opinion to anything like abuse. When referring to the Consolidated committee, the business of which has been very laborious to its members, and of considerable anxiety to them, I may be permitted to say that there has been no allowance to it, and the committee has desired that there should not be any allowance. It has been suggested to them more than once, but looking to the nature of the business before them, they have thought it right to decline. There are matters before them of great importance to to the public. One of them, the question relating to the bed and soil of the river. Although I cannot think that the corporation have been in any way to blame in resisting a claim which they considered was not warranted on the part of the Crown, or in taking such steps as they have been from time to time advised by counsel of the greatest eminence it was their duty to take,—I may say, that from first to last, there has been a strong and anxious desire on their part to effect the settlement of that question. Very large sums of money would by this time have been expended in the improvement of the river, if there had been a settlement of the question; and the corporation hope and trust that there will yet be such a settlement.

7267. Have you found any inconvenience to arise from the practice of not making any allowances to the Consolidated committee, with regard to the attendance of its members? —I have not. The matters referred to the committee have been known to be of that interest, and so much connected with the welfare of the corporation generally, that there has been always a very fair attendance indeed of the members. The deputation consisting of seven or eight members I think, have attended constantly to the business which has come before them.

Adjourned to Wednesday next at 12 o'clock.

CHARLES FAREBROTHER, Esq., was further examined as follows:

7268. Is there any point in regard to your former evidence to which you are desirous of calling our attention?—Yes. In reference to a question put to me the other day, I stated to the Commissioners that, from the best information I could obtain, and from my own memory, there was a power given in the Police Act to the magistrates in the City to appoint further magistrates. I stated that the Act was passed in 1838. I find, upon referring to the Act, that it passed in the year 1839, and the power to which I have referred is contained in that Act, the 2d & 3d Victoria, chapter 94, section 6, and is confined to the appointment of the Commissioner of Police.

Francis Bennoch, Esq.

FRANCIS BENNOCH, Esq., was further examined as follows:

7269. The Commissioners understand that you are desirous of making some statements to them in regard to the Gresham committee?—I am. I appear here to-day not in my individual capacity, but as chairman of a committee appointed to endeavour to establish in London a mercantile and maritime college. I am accompanied by Dr. Waddilove, Mr. T. P. Lowell, Mr. Cook, Mr. Leone Levi, and Mr. Anderson, who wait upon you as a deputation from the committee. In that position we were early brought into connection with the Gresham committee, for the purpose of endeavouring to induce them to assist us; and a number of the merchants of London to whom we applied to aid in the establishment of this college, regarding the Gresham College foundation as the nucleus of an institution on which might be built the superstructure we desired to raise,—in consequence of that, a sub-committee arrived at a resolution, recommending that that should be taken as the basis; and a public meeting was held in the month of May last, at the London Tavern, presided over by Lord Harrowby, at which were present 100 or 150 of the leading merchants, ship-owners, and traders of London, who came to certain resolutions recommending that communications should be opened with the Gresham committee, with the corporation, and with Her Majesty's government, in connection with the subject. In this way it was that we happened, I may say almost incidentally, to come into connection with the Gresham committee. The meeting was held, and I have a report here containing various resolutions, and the names of the gentlemen who were appointed on the committee. We put ourselves in communication with the Gresham committee, requesting to be heard either by deputations or by any other means which they might think proper. To that application we had no answer. We subsequently wrote another letter to the Gresham professors, who requested us to draw up a statement, so far as we could, of what were our views in connection with the Gresham College, and what suggestions we wished to make in respect of the scheme we had propounded. For the purpose of saving time we condensed into one statement, so far as we could, the whole history of the Gresham College, from its commencement, referring to many works of authority, so as to have the matter fully elucidated. In this statement it is just possible that there may be some inaccuracy, because we could only avail ourselves of the documents which came before us, and some documents may possibly have been overlooked, others we had not in our possession, and could not obtain. For the purpose of being accurate, we recommend the Commissioners to call before them some gentlemen in connection with the college, who can put us right it we are wrong in anything, and at the same time show the disposition which exists in regard to it. It may perhaps be most convenient to the Commission that I should read this statement, so that it may become a substantial document before you; and we shall be prepared to be examined on any incidental points of doubt that may arise out of it. "1. That in the "year 1575 Sir Thomas Gresham, merchant of London, by his last will and testament, "bequeathed his own dwelling-house, after the decease of Lady Gresham, to the corporation "of the City of London and the Mercers' company, in trust, for the purpose of founding "a college. 2. That seven professors were to be appointed to read daily, within the "college, lectures on divinity, astronomy, music, geometry, law, physic, and rhetoric—the "same professors to inhabit and study in the college, being allowed a salary of 50*l.* per "annum each, provided they did not marry. 3. That to endow such professorship, the "Royal Exchange (built by Sir Thomas Gresham, on the ground purchased by the "citizens of London for more than 4,000*l.*), its shops, cellars, &c., were also bequeathed "to the same corporation and the Mercers' company. This will was confirmed by an Act "of Parliament (23d Elizabeth) in 1581. 4. That, in conformity with such dispositions, "on the decease of Lady Gresham in 1596, the joint trustees took possession of "the house bequeathed, appointed professors, and fixed the times for the reading "of the lectures; and in 1641 they took a patent from the Crown to possess for ever the "Royal Exchange, and Gresham's house, already converted into a college. 5. That, for a "time, the college acquired great celebrity, and counted amongst its professors Sir "Christopher Wren, Barrow, Hooke, Sir William Petty, and other men of science. It "was within its walls that the Royal Society had its origin, and that Charles II. signed "its charter in 1663; and apartments were assigned for their books, instruments, and "rarities. 6. That, during the plague and great fire of London in 1665-1666, Gresham "college was used as a place of meeting for merchants, and therefore the delivery of the "lectures was for a time suspended, and the Royal Society removed to Arundel House, "whence, however, they returned to Gresham College in 1673, and there remained till "1710, when they purchased the house of Dr. Brown, in Crane Court, Fleet Street, "whither they removed with their museum, &c. 7. That, the Royal Exchange having "been burnt down in the Fire of London, the Gresham committee were called upon to "rebuild it in 1667; and subsequently, on the plea of the expense which they had thereby "incurred, the trustees of Gresham college, as early as 1699, stopped the salaries of the "professors for two years, and refused to keep up the building. 8. That in 1701 the "Gresham committee petitioned Parliament for power to pull down the old mansion and "to erect smaller buildings for the use of the professors; but Parliament refused to "entertain their petition, and thereafter for some time the lectures became of little "practical value. 9. That great complaints having been made of the management of the "college, an inquiry was instituted before the Lord Mayor, the Gresham committee, and "professors, whereupon the lectures were resumed, and greater attention paid to the "conduct of its affairs. 10. That in 1717 the trustees again petitioned Parliament for "authority to pull down the college, proposing to erect on the same site another building "capable of accommodating the professors and their audience, but their request was "once more rejected. 11. That in 1760 they again petitioned Parliament to the same "effect, in this instance proposing to build a convenient room for the lectures, and to "build in addition thereto houses for merchants and others, but they again met with "a similar refusal. 12. That in 1767, Government requiring a new Excise office, the "trustees sold Gresham college and the ground attached to it for no other consideration "than an annual ground rent of 500*l.*, the corporation of the City agreeing to pay 1,800*l.* "in one month, towards pulling down the college. An Act of Parliament (8 George III., "cap. 32), was passed to confirm the transfer. That Act provided that, by reason of the "professors being deprived of their lodgings, their salaries should be raised from 50*l.* to "100*l.* per annum; that the trustees should provide a place for the delivery of the "lectures; and that it should be lawful for the professors to marry, notwithstanding any "restrictions in the will of Sir Thomas Gresham to the contrary. 13. That, for a "considerable time afterwards, an upper apartment of the Exchange was used for the "delivery of the Gresham lectures, during which they became comparatively unknown, "and consequently neglected. 14. That in 1838, the Royal Exchange being again burnt "down, the delivery of the lectures was transferred to the City of London School, until "the present building was erected in Gresham-street, where the lectures are now "delivered during the law terms. The Royal Exchange was again built by the Gresham "committee, and opened in 1844. 15. That in 1852, the building erected for the "purpose of an Excise office, together with the ground attached to it, were sold by "Government for 108,000*l.* It is understood, however, that the Crown still pays the 500*l.* "per annum to the trustees of Sir Thomas Gresham. 16. That the lectures now delivered "at Gresham College consist of lectures on astronomy, physic, divinity, law, rhetoric, "geometry—in Latin, at 12 o'clock at noon, and in English at one o'clock in the afternoon; "and on music and geometry, in English, at seven o'clock in the evening, delivered during "term time. 17. That the delivery of such lectures in Latin is comparatively useless at "the present day, although at the date of the foundation of the college it was useful, as "Latin was often the medium of communication with foreign merchants. Moreover, the

" lectures being delivered during term time only, the merchants have long ceased to " attend them, and the professors are often unable to secure an audience. 18. That, owing " to the progress of commerce, the great competition existing with all countries, and the " advanced state of science, the educational wants of the mercantile and maritime classes " are at present far greater than those felt in the 16th and 17th centuries; and that the " City of London has long suffered considerable injury in having been deprived of the " advantages intended to be conferred by the illustrious founder of Gresham College. " 19. That the pecuniary trust is generally unknown. Its revenues are supposed to " consist of the rentals received from the Royal Exchange, with its offices, and the annual " ground rent of 500*l.*, arising from the original site of the college. Its expenditure would " seem to include the cost of rebuilding twice the Royal Exchange, less the sum for " which they were insured; the building of the present Gresham College in Gresham-" street; the salaries of the professors and other officers, exclusive of any charges in respect " of the alms-houses founded by Sir Thomas Gresham. 20. That considering the vast " importance of the trust and its great practical value, it is important to ascertain with " what amount of debt the property is at present charged; the interest paid upon such " debt; the amount annually paid in liquidation of the same; and the annual rental, so " as to indicate at what future time the whole property will be wholly applicable to the " purposes of the trust." Accompanying this historical sketch, we sent this scheme to be engrafted, as it were, upon the other. We did not wish it to interfere in the least degree with what seemed to be the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, but we wish to establish something which should be in harmony with the times in which we live, and be a great aid to the mercantile classes. The scheme is as follows:—" Proposed constitution of the " Mercantile and Maritime College, subject to such modifications as may hereafter appear " desirable: That, having regard to the foregoing statement, it is suggested that the " income arising from the Gresham trust, as well as the property itself, should, together " with a sufficient amount to be subscribed by the merchants and bankers of the City of " London, be devoted to the establishment of a Mercantile and Maritime College, the " management of which should devolve on a committee, composed of the Gresham " committee, and persons elected by the donors and subscribers to the college funds. That " the proposed institution should, amongst its other advantages, afford courses of lectures " on the different branches of sciences, more especially directed to meet the requirements " of the mercantile and maritime classes; and also that there should be attached to the " college a trade museum, constantly replenished and supplied with every commercial " information, besides a collection of statistics of commerce, Parliamentary papers and " returns, a complete commercial library, models, charts, &c.; and to be provided with an " active machinery to promote objects of national and international importance. That " certificates should be granted of attendance at the lectures, which might serve as " recommendations to appointments of trust. That it is intended that such college shall be " self-supporting, the fees to be sufficiently moderate to attract students of every grade. " The object contemplated is entirely practical. It is desired to adapt the original plan " of Sir Thomas Gresham to the extended requirements of the present time; and whilst " the college will furnish complete instruction upon the theory and practice of commerce " and navigation, it will also form a centre of union for the promotion of the mercantile " and maritime interests of the country." Upon the other side is a list of the committee. In connection with that subject, it is very curious to find that we have not in London, at the present moment, a single place in which boys can be thoroughly educated for the pursuits of commerce and the marine. There is no place in which they can be first educated thoroughly, and afterwards properly examined. There are two or three nautical colleges in various parts of the country which are doing their work well. We sent the document which I have read to the Gresham professors, from whom we received a reply, showing, that instead of being antagonistic in the matter, they are perfectly desirous to do all they can to carry out the views of the merchants of London. All they require is, that perfect faith shall be kept with the trust which they are appointed to carry out. I will first read the following letter to them, and then their answer: " Sir, I am directed " by the committee for promoting a Mercantile and Maritime College in the City of London " to transmit to you a statement respecting the Gresham trust, together with a scheme for " the above proposed institution, and to add that the contents of that statement have been " collected with a view of arriving at truthful accuracy. The scheme submitted must " necessarily be immature, since it must depend upon future circumstances how far its " development can be carried out; and the committee will be happy to receive any " communication, or to confer with you and your colleagues on the subject, should you and " they be so disposed. A copy of the statement and the proposed scheme will be forth-" with sent to the Royal Commissioners now inquiring into the state of the corporation " of the City of London, and also to the Gresham committee. I beg to forward to " you another copy of the report of the public meeting." We received this reply from Mr. Palmer, who is one of the professors, the lecturer in law: " Sir,—I have the honour " to inform you that, at a meeting of the Gresham professors, held at their college on the " the 12th instant, the statement and scheme proposed by the committee for the " establishment of a Mercantile and Maritime College in the City of London was read " and considered; and, on the part of the Gresham professors, I am now authorized to " reply to you as follows:—1st. That the idea of devoting the whole income and property

Francis Bennoch, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

" of the Gresham Trust to the new project of establishing a Mercantile and Maritime " College in the City of London, is not to be entertained. 2nd. That in any arrangement " suggested by the requirements of the present time, the integrity and the independence of " the Gresham foundation must be preserved. 3rd. That passing over the numerous errors " in the statement and the unjust clamour against Gresham College, the Gresham professors " would hail with satisfaction the establishment of new commercial professorships, with a " museum and library on an independent foundation, or under proper regulations—and, " subject to the consent of the trustees being obtained, would cheerfully lend the aid of " their college to promote so desirable an object. Trusting that, for the present, the senti- " ments of the professors are now sufficiently explained—I am, sir, your obedient servant, " William Palmer, Gresham lecturer in law." The point to which we wish to draw the attention of the Commissioners is this, that though any opposition to an established system may seem to be clamour, the only clamour now raised, is to show that they have there a staff of seven lecturers, and a sum of money equal to 1,200*l.* or 1,300*l.* per annum, to deliver lectures for the benefit of the citizens; and with the exception of the amusement lecture on music, they are scarcely ever able to obtain an audience. The audience, such as it is, is chiefly made up of loiterers; and does not, I imagine, average more than twenty throughout the year. We wrote a similar letter to the Gresham committee, from whom we received this answer. "Sir,—The statement you transmitted me respecting the Gresham " trust, having reference to a proposed scheme for engrafting thereon a Mercantile and " Maritime College, has been submitted to the Gresham committee, who have given the " same their serious consideration, and now desire me to request you to inform the gentlemen " constituting your committee, that, with every desire to make the purposes of Gresham " College as effective as possible for the general good, yet, the trust being constituted for " specific objects, expressly mentioned in the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, they do not " deem it expedient to entertain the proposition you have submitted to them." We also addressed letters to the companies to assist us in the matter. We addressed a letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, from whom we received a very courteous, but not very satisfactory reply, in regard to the amount of money realized by the sale of the Excise office. As a proof that the merchants of London are seeking such an institution, I may mention that, in consequence of Mr. Leone Levi, who established a similar institution in Liverpool, having delivered some lectures at King's College, several of the merchants were invited by Dr. Self to attend there and ascertain whether it would be of public importance to the mercantile classes if such a course of lectures were established in connection with that institution. Some of the leading merchants not only attended the lectures, but immediately enrolled themselves as students; and Mr. Levi has now a class of forty, which proves a striking contrast to the small numbers attending the Gresham lectures. There are three sessions in the year, and they pay two guineas each for each session. Several of the large mercantile houses have enrolled some of their principal clerks, and likewise attend many of the lectures themselves. Generally speaking, the only knowledge at present obtained of commercial law and commercial practice, is gained from mere practice in the counting-house, from which youths rise step by step, until they become senior clerks or partners in the house; and then, on the first occasion of any difficulty, they find themselves unable to move without calling in a lawyer. While we have been discussing this question in London, colleges of this character have been established in Sweden, in Austria, and in Belgium. In Sweden it is rather a resuscitation than a new establishment, but in reality they have established colleges of this particular kind. What is particularly interesting to us just now, is another fact. In consequence of a movement that took place in the City some two years ago, for the purpose of effecting certain reforms in the Customs, a committee was appointed; and their labour having ceased, gentlemen have been desirous of presenting a testimonial to their chairman, Mr. Ingram Travers. To the pleasure of everybody taking interest in such matters, instead of receiving a testimonial in the shape of a piece of plate or in money—as a merchant looking at the importance of a higher standard of education in connexion with commerce and commercial law, he has written a long letter to the Testimonial committee, some lines of which bear so pointedly on this subject, that I cannot forbear quoting them, as they cannot fail to be interesting to the Commissioners. Mr. Travers says,—" It has occurred to me to suggest, that the testimonial so generally " tendered by you in commemoration of Customs reform, should be applied to the founda- " tion of an annual series of lectures in the City, on subjects connected with commerce " and commercial law. It has long been a matter of regret that the City of London " should have possessed no established means for the advancement of commercial learning— " in this age, and in this City, surely as important as the learning of our universities— " commerce contains in its history the lives of some of the most useful men who have ever " lived. A whole course of lectures abounding in interest might be given on commercial " biographies alone. How much this kind of instruction is needed, every one must be aware " who has taken part in any question of commercial reform. Lectures upon commercial " subjects annually delivered in London by the most able and distinguished men of the day, " whether men of business, lawyers, or statesmen, could not fail to influence not only the " rising generation of commercial men in this country, but the action of other countries " upon commercial matters. The most grievous evils have followed from insufficient " commercial information. We have had commercial laws, bankruptcy laws, and other " matters, so ill devised as to punish the unfortunate honest trader, and afford a premium

Francis Bennoch, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

" to the dishonest. From the same want of general commercial knowledge, we have " periodical outbreaks of speculation, scattering in the wildest schemes the fairly gathered " fruits of years of legitimate trade." Then he says,—" The way is now open for the " advancement of sound commercial knowledge ; and I hope to see, before long, a true " commercial institute established in London, such as Sir Thomas Gresham meant to found " and thought he had founded." Such are the opinions, I believe, of the great mass of the trading and mercantile class in the City of London ; and it is greatly to the honour and high reputation of Sir Thomas Gresham that, 300 years ago, he saw the evil and provided for its extinction—and yet, 300 years later, the merchants of London are only now awakening to the full importance of a thorough system of education as applied to commerce and commercial law. We observe that, simultaneously with the merchants, even the Government itself have discovered the importance of education being directed to a specific and particular object, and consider that it will be important to them in regard to their civil officers, and of advantage to the public interest, to have some sort of examination as a guarantee of the fitness of individuals to perform the duties which shall come before them. This is another branch of the same tree, springing from the same root ; the necessity of gentlemen being trained early for the particular purposes for which they are intended in future life ; and we cannot begin too early with such a system of practical education. I may mention that Mr. Cook is present, who can show the great importance of a nautical education being applied to the youths who enter our Mercantile Marine. Mr. Anderson, who has great experience in mercantile affairs, will also show that this is no evanescent feeling—that it is no mere bubble on the surface of a pool which may be soon dried up—but that it is a principle which has taken possession of the minds of the metropolitan merchants, and will not be permitted to subside. It has been felt that we could not do better than bring this matter before the Commission ; in order that, if they think it a subject of sufficient importance, they may say something respecting it in their report, and so lead to the conversion of what is now a comparatively useless theatre, for the delivery of lectures which few attend and still fewer understand, into a noble institution, by which the merchants of the metropolis and the youths who are entering on the pursuits of commercial life might be greatly benefited. Dr. Waddilove has gone into the question with regard to the legal position of Gresham College and some matters connected with the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, and some matters, tending to show that the trustees have not been so faithful to their trust as they ought to have been—that they seem to have been rather desirous of getting rid of a troublesome duty, than of extending its advantages as widely as possible. This has been partly proved by the applications frequently made to Parliament to get rid of or modify the trust in a variety of ways, which they at last accomplished, in a manner that was certainly most unwise if not at the time illegal. Whenever the question is thoroughly investigated, it will, I fear be proved that, instead of the trustees and professors working harmoniously together for the public good, they have too frequently acted in a spirit of antagonism, caring less for the duties imposed than for the self-interest involved ; and thus reduced one of the finest foundations in the kingdom from a condition of life and usefulness to one where men of genius speak to a few idlers, uttering living thoughts in a dead language, which they address to dead walls.

Alfred Waddilove, Esq D.C.L.

ALFRED WADDILOVE, Esq., D.C.L., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7270. In what profession are you ?—I am a doctor of civil law, practising at Doctor's Commons.

7271. Have you given your attention to the past history and the present condition of Gresham College ?—Yes, I have. I am practising at Doctor's Commons. I practise in the Court of Admiralty ; and in so doing I have had an opportunity of seeing the inconvenience and the serious injury which often result to owners of vessels and the underwriters from the want of education and general intelligence of captains and mates. They are often placed in difficult positions, which require legal knowledge as well as tact and discretion,—such as taking up money on bottomry, selling cargoes for repair, and so on. I have, therefore, thought it right to forward, as far as I can, the objects which the committee, of which I am a member, has in view. In so doing, I very early turned my attention to the Gresham College, with the hope that the fund which had been devoted to instruction by Sir Thomas Gresham might be rendered more applicable to the wants of the present day than it is, and made more generally useful. For that purpose I have looked into the will of Sir Thomas Gresham ; and I have endeavoured to cull from every paper which I could obtain, all the facts which bear upon the nature of the trust. I will not go into the general statement, because Mr. Bennoch has already given you a summary of the will of Sir Thomas Gresham and the foundation of the College ; but, if the Commissioners will allow me, I will endeavour to show them what has been the conduct of the professors and of the trustees since the establishment of the college. Its affairs do not appear to have run very smoothly. Sir Thomas Gresham died on the 21st of November 1579. His will was proved on the 26th of November following. After the death of Lady Gresham in 1595, the trust devolved upon the Mayor and corporation of the City of London and the Mercer's company. The Mayor and corporation were to appoint four lecturers in divinity, astronomy, geometry, and music. The wardens of the Mercers' company were to appoint three lecturers in law, rhetoric, and physic. In 1597 or 1598 the professors took possession of their apartments, in Sir Thomas Gresham's late mansion-house. The trustees had consulted the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to guide them in the appointment of fit persons as professors. It appears that three were appointed from each University, and Queen Elizabeth nominated the seventh; her nomination being Dr. Bull, an eminent musician of those days. The first record which I have been able to find, relative to the management of the affairs of the college, is in Evelyn's diary, wherein, under date of the 30th of July 1662, is this entry,—"To London, where there was a "meeting about charitable uses, and particularly to inquire how the City had disposed "of the revenues of Gresham College; and why the salaries of the professors were no "better improved. I was on this commission, with divers bishops and lords of the "council, but little was the progress which we could make." Again, under September the 4th, in the same year, there is another entry,—"Commission for charitable uses. Lord "Mayor and aldermen again summoned, and the improvements of Sir Thomas Gresham's "estate examined. There were present the Bishop of London, the lord chief justice, and "the King's attorney." That was in 1662. A few years after this, the fire of London destroyed the Exchange and other public buildings. Gresham College having escaped destruction, became a rendezvous for the merchants of London, and the Mayor and corporation had their court and held their chamber there, and made other public uses of it; and in the piazza shops were erected. That impeded the ordinary course of the lectures. They were, however, again renewed; but, in 1697, owing to the expense which the Gresham trustees had been put to, they proposed to deduct four shillings in the pound from the stipend of each professor. The professors resisted this reduction; and took counsel's opinion as to how far the trustees were justified in so doing. That I take from a tract in the British Museum, published anonymously, 1707. The account which Maitland, in his "History of London," gives, is, that the trustees having rebuilt the Exchange, and thereby expended so much, and owing so much interest on money borrowed for that purpose, alleged that they could not pay the salaries of the professors, nor keep the college in repair; whereupon the professors, after taking counsel's opinion, filed a bill against the trustees; and to the question put, whether the readers should bring in a bill in chancery for the performance of the will in their own names, and for their salaries only, or whether, in the name of the attorney-general, at their relation, for the payment of their salaries and the other charities in the will. The opinion was, "I conceive it most proper to bring the "bill in the name of the attorney-general, at the relation of the lecturers." So that at that day Gresham College was considered to be a charitable foundation, within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. A bill was filed, but the further proceedings were stayed; the professors being bought off by a promise to apply for an Act of Parliament to enable the rebuilding of Gresham College on a smaller scale, with more commodious lodgings for the professors. The bill was brought in in the year 1701. It was opposed by one of the professors, Dr. Hook, and it did not pass. After his death, they applied again in 1703-4 for a bill. That bill passed the House of Lords, but was lost in the House of Commons; a clause being added, imposing a penalty of 2,000*l.* if the buildings, &c. were not erected within five years. In 1706 an attempt to assess the professors to parochial rates, as holding dictinct houses, being defeated, the parish authorities induced low and disorderly people to attend the lectures, (as Maitland says,) with the object of insulting the professors. Notwithstanding this, they continued to deliver their lectures. It was then said, among other things, that the lecturers ought to deliver their lectures every day throughout the year, and the divinity one on Sundays. The writer of the tract I have named says, that a petition was presented to the Lord Mayor, complaining that the professors read only in term time; and then at such uncertain hours, that those who would attend were prevented thereby. The committee was summoned to institute inquiry, and give redress, if required. Stowe, in his "Survey," says, "Thel ecturers were "appointed to begin their readings in the month of June 1797. Their lectures are read "daily, Sundays excepted, in the term time, by every one, upon his day—in the morning, "between nine and ten, in Latin, and in the afternoon, between two and three, in English; "save that Dr. Bull was dispensed with, to read the music lectures in English only; and "upon two several days, Thursdays and Saturdays, in the afternoon, between three and "four o'clock." That may account for the practice which at present exists with respect to the music lecture, which is now given, not as the other lectures are, in the course of the day, but in the evening. The professors relied upon this statement. They were accused of not giving their lectures daily, and only during term time; and they quoted these words from Stowe, to show that they were justified in declining to give their lectures beyond the strict duration of term time. They also cited, as their authority, Dr. Gwynne, who was the first reader of physic; Sir George Buck; Anthony Mauday, the editor of "Stowe;" Dr. Holdsworth, divinity reader; and other persons. The trustees then, on the 4th October 1706, made an order to the effect that the professors should give their lectures on the days they now do; that is, each person, as Stowe says, taking a day at four terms in every year—the first term to begin the Monday before Michaelmas term of the common law, and to end with that term; the second to begin the Monday before Hilary term, and so on. The third term to begin the Monday se'nnight before Easter day, (that, I suppose, was in order that they should not break into Passion week,) and to end with Easter term. The fourth to commence the Monday before Trinity term, and to continue a month, namely, twenty-eight days; the lecture to begin at nine o'clock a.m., and three p.m. precisely. To this the greater part of the professors objected, and drew up a statement which they presented to Sir Thomas Rawlinson, the then Lord Mayor, containing the reasons why they did not conform to this order; they say, "We are, at our being chosen into our respective places, "directed to perform our duty according to the custom and practice of the place." "Secondly, we are able to give unquestionable proof that the custom has been, without any "interruption, to read only in Term time; and since it has been so, we are advised to be "very careful how we charge ourselves or our successors with unnecessary burthens. "Thirdly, we are informed that the ground on which the order to read out of term is "founded, is taken from some articles which were never legally ratified or admitted as "legally ratified, either by the then trustees or professors. We therefore, that our "compliance with this order might not be looked upon as allowing of the authority of "those articles, and so subject us to the rest of them, which, when under consideration "appeared unreasonable both to you and our predecessors, have rejected it." The result of that inquiry was, that the trustees made an order that the professors' salaries should be constantly paid them one year under another, without troubling the committee from time to time for particular orders. And in the year 1719, upon the professors petitioning that the year's arrears then remaining might be discharged, the trustees after some debate came to the resolution, that though the Exchange brought them in debt, yet that should not tend to the prejudice of the professors, but the inconvenience thereof should be on the City and company of Mercers. Wherefore they then ordered the immediate payment of the said arrears; and that the future payments should be made regularly as they became due. Mr. Palmer, the present learned professor of law, published in 1837 two of his lectures; in one of which he states a circumstance which I will refer to, to show the difficulties that have arisen and the disagreements which have taken place between the professors and the trustees. It would seem that the trustees, in order to secure obedience to the rules on the part of the lecturers, required them to enter into a bond, when they were appointed, that they would do so, on condition of some forfeiture if they did not. One of these bonds was sought to be enforced, but Lord Talbot set it aside. Since then the professors have gone on as they now do, giving their lectures merely in term time only, at twelve o'clock in the day in Latin, and at one o'clock in English.

Alfred Waddilove, Esq. D.C.L.

7272. Have you been in the habit of going into the lecture-room occasionally, and seeing what the audience consists of?—No, I have never been inside the building; but I understand that the attendance is very scanty. Ward, who has given the lives of the Professors, brings his history down to 1755; that was thirteen years before the sale of the college. I have endeavoured to show the state of the college, and the way in which the professors performed their duties up to the year 1755. Thirteen years after that, in the year 1768, the college was sold. It was agreed by the Government of the day with the Gresham trustees, that for a perpetual annuity of 500*l.* the buildings and grounds on which Gresham College stood should be conveyed to them, and also that the corporation should give 1,800*l.* towards the pulling-down of Gresham College itself, which I suspect was then considerably out of repair; so that in fact, the City only received 8,200*l.* Supposing the annuity was worth 10,000*l.* they gave back 1,800*l.* of what they received, therefore they only received in fact, about 8,200*l.* An Act of Parliament was passed legalizing the sale, to which it may be important to refer, because that Act totally altered the constitution of the college. Sir Thomas Gresham provided, by his will, that the professors should inhabit the dwelling-house, and that they should not give lectures nor receive their stipend after they were married. I find, in the time of Cromwell, one of those lecturers, Dr. Horton, married while he was a professor—and in order to enable him, notwithstanding, to continue to hold his professorship, he petitioned the Commission of Parliament for Ecclesiastical matters, established during the "Commonwealth,"—and he obtained a dispensation to enable him to do so. Charles the Second, however, revoked the dispensation. I also find that a Mr. Greaves, a professor of geometry, who was one of the lecturers, was removed in 1643, by reason of long absence and neglect of his lectures. The Act of Parliament to which I have referred, is the 8th of George the Third, and the last clause of the Act is this, "And whereas, in and by the said last Will and Testament of the late "Sir Thomas Gresham, the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London, "and the wardens and commonalty of the mystery of Mercers of the City of London, were "directed to permit and suffer the seven persons elected and appointed to read the seven "lectures in the said will, mentioned to have the occupation of all the Mansion-"house Gardens and other appurtenances (now called Gresham College) for them "and every of them there to inhabit, study, and daily to read the said several lectures. "And whereas in and by the said will it is directed that no person chosen to "read any of the said lectures should be suffered to read any of the said "lectures after that he should be married, nor should receive any fee or stipend "appointed for the reading of the said lectures: And whereas, in pursuance of this "Act, the said college will be pulled down and taken away, and the collegiate life "of the said lecturers intended by the said Sir Thomas Gresham, will, by the pulling "down of the said college be put an end to; be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, "That from and after the passing of this Act, it shall and may be lawful to and for the seven lecturers or their successors, or any of them, to marry, notwithstanding any "restriction contained in the said will; and each and every of the said lecturers and "their successors shall, notwithstanding their being married, be suffered to read "their said several lectures after they shall be married, and shall be entitled to "receive the appointed fee or stipend"—and so on. That Act, therefore, totally subverted the foundation of the college. So the matter rests to this day. It appears that, in consequence of their being deprived of the lodging and the convenience which this house afforded them, their salaries were increased from 50*l.* to 100*l.* a year. One of the professors of that day, Dr. Pemberton, refused to assent to that proposal, and his salary was increased to 150*l.* After that building was pulled down, the lectures were read, I believe, in a small apartment in the Exchange. They were afterwards removed to the City of London school; and since then a building has been erected in Basinghall Street, where they are now given during term time, at twelve o'clock in Latin and at one o'clock in English. After the lectures are delivered each day, and when the term ends, the building is shut up, and no use whatever is made of it. I do not know whether I may call the attention of the Commissioners to the Charitable Trusts Act. In the correspondence which the committee for forming a Mercantile and Maritime college has had with the Gresham trustees, the latter have expressed themselves,—"That, with "every desire to make the purposes of Gresham College as effective as possible for the "general good, yet, the trust being constituted for specific objects, expressly mentioned "in the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, they do not deem it expedient to entertain "the proposition" (that of co-operating with the committee for the formation of a Mercantile and Commercial college submitted to them.) The professors say, "We should "hail with satisfaction the establishment of new commercial professorships, with "a museum and library on an independent foundation or under proper regulations; and, "subject to the consent of the trustees being obtained, would cheerfully lend the aid of "their college to promote so desirable an object, but they do not feel disposed to "depart from what they consider to have been the intention of Sir Thomas Gresham in the "foundation of their professorships." It has occurred to me whether, under the late Charitable Trusts Act, the trustees might not, if anxious to render their lectures more in accordance with the wants of the present day—more useful, in fact, apply to the Charity Commissioners for a scheme. I would venture to suggest that—supposing you should think fit to summon any of those gentlemen before you, or they should offer themselves for examination, it might be desirable to put the question to them, whether they think the Trust comes within the purview and spirit of the Charitable Trusts Act, and whether they contemplate or think it desirable that they should apply to the Commissioners for a scheme for the purpose of making the funds at their command more serviceable for the public purposes.

MR. CHARLES LUCEY having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7273. You are master of the company of watermen and lightmen?—I am.

7274. How long have you held that situation?—Only a few weeks. I have been on the court for some years.

7275. Are you a freeman of the City of London?—I am a freeman of the watermen's company.

7276. Is there any statement which you are desirous of submitting to the Commission?—The court of the watermen's company has drawn up a statement in consequence of the evidence which has been given before the Commissioners, for the purpose of explaining several things which have been said adverse to the company. If it is the pleasure of the Commissioners, the clerk will read it.

Mr. Henry Humpheries, Clerk of the Company, read as follows:—

"To Her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the corporation of London.

"The Court of Master Wardens and Assistants of the Company of Watermen and Lightermen of the river Thames, beg leave to present this statement in consequence of the complaints which have been made by several of the witnesses examined before you, touching the alleged acts of divers members of our body, and the prejudice said to result to the public from the privileges which the company possess.

"Before proceeding, however, to notice that evidence, we think it expedient to call the attention of the Commissioners to the Acts of Parliament by which we are governed, and to some ancient statutes passed having reference to the company. With the exception of the statute by which the company was incorporated, and by which it is now governed (7 & 8 George IV., chapter 75), the only statute affecting the company is the 4th & 5th Anne, mentioned in Mr. Pillow's evidence (3049), intituled 'An Act for the Encouragement and Increase of Seamen, and for the better and speedier manning Her Majesty's Fleet,' which after reciting that, it being highly necessary 'that a convenient number of watermen, bargemen, lightermen, and wherrymen should from time to time be obliged to serve on board Her Majesty's Fleet,' enacts, 'That in case such a number of them as the Lord High Admiral or any three or more of the Commissioners for executing the

Mr. Charles Luccy.

'office of Lord High Admiral of England for the time being shall from time to time give 'notice to the said company of watermen there shall be occasion for to serve Her Majesty, 'her heirs and successors, shall not appear before the rulers of the said watermen's com- 'pany, to be sent on board Her Majesty's Fleet they shall suffer one month's imprisonment, 'and be disabled from rowing or working upon the said river of Thames and of enjoying 'any of the advantages or privileges of the said company for the space of two years.'

"By the 1st section of the statute 7th & 8th George IV., all the ancient statutes relating to the company, except the before-mentioned statute of 4th & 5th Anne, were repeated. The statement contained in that section, with reference to the ancient statutes, perhaps sufficiently shows the object with which they were passed, namely, the public safety; but if any doubt should exist on that subject, a reference to the statutes themselves will put the matter beyond all doubt. It then recites that the purposes of the said Acts would be better effected if the watermen, wherrymen, and lightermen on the river Thames, at and between Windsor and Yantlet Creek, were incorporated, and the several laws respecting them were consolidated and amended.

"It then repeals the ancient statutes therein enumerated, and incorporates the company —declaring of whom it shall consist, and the limits of the Act. In the belief, however, that the Commissioners will abstain from entering upon any matter which is not intimately connected with their present inquiry, the court of the company confine their remarks to matters connected with the corporation of London, and a short statement of their own privileges.

"By the 13th section of the statute, it is enacted that the master of the company and the several wardens (four in number) shall be presented annually to the Court of Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, and if not approved by them, that others shall be elected in manner therein mentioned until they shall be approved by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen before whom they are required to be sworn before they can act in their respective offices.

"By the 15th section, it is enacted that in case of the death, resignation, or removal from the court of the company, another master or warden shall be elected, who must be presented to and be approved by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen, and be sworn before them in manner before mentioned.

"By the 18th section, it is enacted that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the court, the court shall elect from amongst the freemen of the company such three persons as to them shall seem meet for supplying such vacancy, and the persons so elected shall be presented to the next Court of Mayor and Aldermen, and such court shall elect from the three persons so presented to them such one as they shall most approve of, who shall thereupon become a member of the said court of the said company, and shall be sworn before the said Court of Mayor and Aldermen.

"By section 20, any person so elected master or warden, or a member of the court, is subjected to a pecuniary penalty if he shall neglect or refuse to be presented to the said Court of Mayor and Aldermen, or shall neglect or refuse to execute the office after having been presented to and approved or selected by the said Court of Mayor and Aldermen.

"By the 56th section, the court of the company are empowered from time to time to make rules and bye-laws for the good government of the said company, and for determining the fees which shall be taken on the binding of apprentices and the assignment of them, and the admission of members, and on other occasions for the better maintenance of the company, and the quarterage or other sums to be paid by the freemen, and for regulating the freemen of the said company and their widows, and apprentices, and the boats or other craft to be worked or rowed by them within the limits of the Act, and to annex reasonable penalties and forfeitures for the breach of such rules or byelaws respectively, which rules and byelaws must be approved by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen.

"By the 57th section, the Court of Mayor and Aldermen are also empowered from time to time to make rules and byelaws for the good government and regulation of the freemen of the said company and their widows and apprentices, and the boats, vessels, and other craft to be rowed or worked within the limits of the Act, and to annex reasonable penalties and forfeitures for the breach of such rules and byelaws respectively, which rules and byelaws, by section 106, are declared to extend to the government and regulation of the western barges, ferries and lighters' boats, and vessels of woodmongers and owners of laystalls, chalk hoys, gardeners, fishermen, and ballast-men, and all other lighters' boats and vessels in the said river within the limits of the Act, although otherwise exempted from the provisions of the Act,

"By section 58, all the before-mentioned bye-laws must be allowed by one of the judges of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster.

"By section 61, the Court of Mayor and Aldermen are empowered from time to time to fix the fares of watermen for carrying passengers, which fares must be approved by three at least of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

"The court of the company and the other members of the company are governed by the provisions of the before-mentioned statute, and the rules, byelaws, and list of fares, which have been made in pursuance of the provisions before referred to, viz., by certain rule and byelaws made at Courts of Mayor and Aldermen, holden respectively on the 15th April 1828, the 29th March 1836, and the 29th September 1845; and by certain rules and byelaws made at the court of the company holden on the 2d April 1828, and a table of fares fixed by a Court of Mayor and Aldermen holden on the 19th September. 1827.

" Having thus stated their connection with the corporation of London, they proceed to a statement of their own privileges. By section 5 of the statute (7th & 8th Geo. IV.) it is declared that the company shall consist of the watermen, wherrymen, and lightermen, whose names had been registered by the overseers and rulers of the said company in pursuance of the said recited Acts, or some of them, previously to the passing of that Act, and who shall be called freemen of the said company, and of such other persons as should be admitted freemen of the said company, as therein-after mentioned.

" By section 26, it is declared that the court of the company shall admit to be freemen of the said company such persons as shall have duly served their apprenticeship, either before or after the passing of that Act, or partly before and partly after the passing of that Act, to watermen, or lightermen, or widows, then or thereafter authorized to take such apprentices, and no other persons, and that such persons, when admitted by the said court and sworn as therein-after mentioned, should become freemen of the said company.

" By section 28, it is declared, that no person shall be admitted a freeman of the said company unless he shall have rowed and worked on the said river as the apprentice of some freeman of the said company, or of the widow of some freeman, for the full space of seven years. And by section 34, it is declared, that no apprentice who shall thereafter be bound, contrary to the true intent and meaning of that Act, shall obtain or be admitted to the freedom of the said company by reason of such apprenticeship.

" The privileges of the company are protected by section 37, which enacts, that if any person, not being a freeman of the said company, or an apprentice to a freeman, or to the widow of a freeman of the said company, (except as therein-after is mentioned,) shall, at any time, act as a waterman or lighterman, or ply, or work, or navigate, or cause to be worked or navigated, any wherry, lighter, or other craft, upon the said river, from or to any place or places, or ship, or vessel, within the limits of that Act, for hire or gain, (except as thereinafter mentioned,) every such person shall forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum not exceeding 10*l.*

" The freemen of the company possess no other privilege, and, therefore, if any of the imputations or charges of malpractices which have been made against the 'Long Shore Men,' with respect to the election of Members of Parliament or City officers, apply to any members of the waterman's company, it is in respect of their being freemen of London, and liverymen of other companies, with which the waterman's company have no connection or concern. The freemen of the waterman's company have no vote in any such elections. It here becomes important to notice the various exceptions referred to in the 37th section. They are as follows. Section 70 saves the rights of the master, wardens, and assistants of the Trinity House, and all the men employed by them. Sections 94-5-6-7 & 8 save the rights of the parties therein mentioned. Section 99 saves the rights and privileges to which the owners of all private ferries are entitled. Section 100 saves the rights of owners of docks and canals with respect to the navigation in the same. Section 101 saves the rights of the owners of western barges, which may be navigated as low as London Bridge. Section 102 saves the rights of all persons keeping lighters, or other large craft, for carrying their own goods, provided the persons working the same be freemen of the company ; and section 104 saves the rights of the owners or lessees of laystalls and chalk hoys and gardeners, and also fishermen and ballast-men, provided such persons do not carry passengers or goods for hire.

" The only complaint, therefore, which can be made against the privileges of the company is, that individuals, who have not served an apprenticeship agreeably to the provisions of the before-mentioned statute, cannot carry on the business of watermen and lightermen for hire and gain, or in other words, cannot obtain their livelihood by that business. That some, and perhaps, indeed, many individuals, who have not been brought up to the business, but who are desirous of entering into it, should complain of the privilege enjoyed by the freemen of the company is not unnatural. Many unqualified persons would doubtless be exceedingly glad to carry on the business of apothecaries, surgeons, or solicitors, without being subjected to the necessary forms and tests preparatory to their admission into such professions; but the public safety requires that they should submit to the laws which have been established for the protection of the public ; and we think the same rule applicable to the business of watermen and lightermen. With respect to the evidence of Mr. Beck, (4104,) in which he states that the laws regulating the company are easily evaded. Firstly, by binding a boy as an apprentice who seldom shows himself on board a barge, and can never be capable of managing one ; and secondly, by purchasing the use of the number and name of a free waterman, or of the widow of a free waterman. We would observe, that a person is never admitted to his freedom without the approval of his master, and a certificate from not less than four freemen of the company, that the party applying for admission has actually rowed and worked upon the river during the period of his apprenticeship, and is qualified to become a freeman of the company ; and that a freeman, or the widow of a freeman, permitting a non-freeman to use his or her name or number, would, for every offence, incur a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* The witness adds, that instances of both evasions are under his daily observation ; but we know of no such instances of evasion, and would not knowingly sanction them. If the privileges of the company should be abolished, and any, or rather indeed, everybody, permitted to work and row, and navigate vessels upon the river, the consequences would be most disastrous to those who have occasion to pass or transmit their goods upon the river. Mr. Ashby, who thinks the trade with respect to barges and lighters (being the sort of craft in which he is interested) ought to be entirely free, gives his opinion, (4123) that as to pleasure-boats there ought to be some stringent regulations. We think such regulations equally necessary with respect to barges, lighters, steam-boats, and sailing craft, in the management of which there is greater difficulty and danger. The freemen of the company form a very useful body of men for the conveyance of passengers and goods upon the river, which by reason of the number of steam-boats and other vessels constantly passing thereon, is a work of considerable difficulty and danger; and they also form, in case of need, a body from whom a deficiency in seamen for the Royal navy might speedily be made up; and many commanders of vessels in the Royal navy have borne testimony to the efficient manner in which their services as seamen have been performed. The number of freemen is fully adequate to the work to be performed, and, we believe, that if the trade were completely thrown open, causes of complaint, like that made by Mr. Pratt (2486), would arise, as they do at present,—the Steam Navigation Company requiring their vessels to be unladen and reladen with more haste and expedition than is practicable with safety. With respect to the strike, of which Mr. Pratt, and also Mr. Acland (504) complained, it might, perhaps, be sufficient to observe, that strikes have taken place in various parts of the country amongst workmen who enjoy no class or trade privileges; but as it respects the freemen of the watermen's company, we may observe, that it was limited to a very small number, namely, about sixty, and that there was an ample number of other freemen to supply their place. The whole body of working men being upwards of 5,000, on such occasions it is extremely difficult at the moment to find men to take the place of those who have struck, for fear of personal violence, either immediately or at some distant time.

"The estimation in which the services of free watermen are held, is evidenced by the fact that very many, and, indeed, most of the ships and vessels coming into the river, when the masters of such are not free watermen, receive free watermen on board, to take charge of their vessels, although not compelled so to do; and the General Steam Navigation Company themselves do the same thing from Gravesend to London Bridge. And further, we beg to observe, that most of the river pilots employed by the Trinity House are freemen of the company. We know of no better mode of making men practically acquainted with the various parts of the river, and qualifying them for the various duties which they have to perform, than the apprenticeship which they now serve; and we think that any change in the mode of admission would be a serious injury to the public at large. In reply to the complaint of Mr. Ashby, made in his evidence, (4116,) the company take leave to state the facts of the case. The principal witness, H. E. Roake, who was then in regular work at Kingston, happened to be near, and saw that Mr. Ashby's lug-boat was in trouble for want of proper management. He suggested to those on board the mode of extricating themselves from the difficulty in which they were; when a gentleman standing by said, 'If you are a waterman you had better go on board and prevent the craft being knocked about,' suggesting to the witness that he would be paid for his trouble. He went on board, and got the boat out of her difficulty; but, having been refused any remuneration, he lodged a complaint at Watermen's Hall; and the court of the company thinking it a case which they ought to prosecute, directed a prosecution accordingly, which ended in Mr. Ashby being fined 40*s.* and costs. That penalty Mr. A. informed the magistrate he should call upon the captain, who was a freeman, to repay. Mr. A's statement (4117) that if the captain had been on board, but asleep, the offence would not have been committed, is incorrect; the offence being the permitting, or suffering a person, not being free, to navigate or work his boat. With respect to his complaint, (4113,) that monkey-boats which travel in Paris on the river, require two watermen, although actually moving as one boat, the law applies only to large craft, when travelling below Vauxhall bridge, in obedience to one of the byelaws passed by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen in 1845. We know not whether the Commissioners propose to enter into the question whether the privileges which have so long been enjoyed by the watermen and lightermen of the river Thames should be abrogated or continued; or whether it will be expected of us to bring forward witnesses to support the opinion which we have ventured to express, namely, that such privileges are for the general benefit of the public. If such witnesses are required, we shall have no difficulty in producing them; meantime, we beg to call the attention of the commissioners to the favourable evidence given on that subject by Mr. Kearns, (2337), and Mr. Whistler (2631).

(By the Court) "Henry Humphries, Clerk."

7277. The whole number of persons on the roll of the company amounts to about 7,000?—Yes; near 8,000, and there are also 1,680 apprentices, but, probably, not more than 5,000 or 6,000 are working on the river; the remainder consisting of master lightermen, persons not following the business, and others in the sea service, pensioners, &c.

7278. Has every one of those persons the right, upon taking out his freedom of the company of watermen, to vote at elections in common hall?—No right whatever. A person upon becoming a freeman of the waterman's company obtains no such right, or is he thereby enabled to obtain the freedom of the City of London.

7279. You do not stand on the footing of one of the trading companies?—Not at all.

EDWARD HARRISON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Edward Harrison, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

7280. In what way are you connected with the corporation of the City of London?—I am deputy of Cornhill ward, and therefore one of the corporation.

7281. How long have you been connected with the corporation?—Sixteen years.

7282. Have you filled any corporate offices?—I have filled several in the course of that period. I have been chairman of the Freedoms' committee, who had the prosecution of certain bills for the reform of the constitution of the City. I was chairman of that particular committee when those two applications were made to parliament. I am also to-day attending more particularly as a member of the commission of Sewers, the chairman not being able to attend. I am on the Consolidated committee also, and have been from its commencement one of the deputation; and I am appointed by the corporation as one of the four gentlemen in the Metropolitan Commission of Sewers. I may also say, that I have been, from the commencement of my connection with the corporation up to the present time, upon the Improvements committee.

7283. Are you yourself engaged in trade?—Yes; I am a stationer.

7284. Are there any points to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—I desired, as an old member of the corporation, to call the attention of the Commissioners to certain evidence which has been given by gentlemen with reference to the position and character of members of the corporation at the present time, as compared with a former period. That evidence is highly objectionable, I think, and I cannot conceive that it can be at all justified by the facts. I pass over the evidence of Mr. Acland entirely, because he represented himself, and truly, as an agent in matters of this kind; and I have no doubt, therefore, he acts in this case as in all other cases, ably, if he undertakes any particular duty. The evidence of Mr. Travers is of much importance, because, in answer to question 209 (and it is a singular introduction to such opinions as are afterwards given), he states, "I have not much directed my attention to the municipal concerns of the City of London." In 211 he says, "I believe, in common with most of my class, that the corporation of the City of "London is in a very unsatisfactory condition; it is unsatisfactory in its management, and "in my belief is more unsatisfactory in its system, which is obsolete, old, and, I think, "worn out; quite unfit for the requirements of the present day." If he had not introduced those words, "with most of my class," in the early part of that answer, I should not have referred to it all. Mr. Travers, I believe, is the son of the late Mr. Travers, who was so well known as connected with reform measures in the City of London. He, therefore, has a name; and I believe this gentleman is also connected with that body. As he speaks of a class, I presume he must speak of the gentlemen with whom he is associated to promote certain political views.

7285. The Commissioners rather understood Mr. Travers to mean the class in the mercantile and commercial world to which he belonged?—It is rather difficult to understand his meaning. Mr. Travers is a wholesale grocer. Does he mean that he speaks the opinions of the class of wholesale grocers? He is a man of great respectability; therefore an opinion expressed in that way is one which gives pain to gentlemen who have been many years in the corporation, and who desire to promote public improvements in every way in their power. In answer to question 212, he gives other evidence to this extent, "I believe the best way would be to sweep away the corporation and the local government "of the City altogether. That is the conclusion to which I have come." In No. 215, he says, "I would have no municipal body of any sort or kind in the City of London." The next evidence to which I would beg respectfully to call your attention is in No 1181. The evidence of that witness is to this effect; speaking of the corporation, he says, "they "have never led, and it has been with great difficulty that they have been dragged at the "tail of popular opinion." Then he speaks of some date at which they refused to take up the question of establishing docks on the side of the river; and he concludes in this way—"from that day we may consider the great downfall of the corporation to have commenced; and now the merchants spurn them, I believe, as something loathsome." This is the evidence of a gentleman who has been very much respected as one of our body. The next question that I will call your attention to is 1216. The answer to that question is, "I do "not believe it is in the power of human ingenuity to propose a plan which would give "to the corporation of the present City of London a power to conduct its affairs so as to "conduce to the advantage of the whole metropolis." The next question to which I beg your attention is 2146. Mr. Samuel Morley, in answer to that question, says, "I have no "idea that the citizens of London look at the thing with any other feelings than those of "repugnance." Evidence of this character, coming from highly respectable gentlemen, is exceedingly painful to the feelings of members who are acting upon the corporation, and I do hope, in some respects at any rate, for the public good. The other parts of the evidence to which I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners, are with reference to the sewers of London. In No. 234, Mr. Travers says, the management of the sewers is very unsatisfactory. In 722, Mr. Dillon says, "I think it desirable that the sewerage of the metropolis should be placed under a single authority." In 723 he repeats the same opinion, adding the words "lighting and paving" to it. Mr. Thomson Hankey, jun., in 1726, gives his opinion that the sewerage and drainage are particularly interesting to the whole metropolis, and should be regulated as a whole. The only observation which I will make upon that is, that upon the other side, in No. 1718, he states, "I think certainly that part

Edward Harrison, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

" of the duties should be taken away ; but the improvements, the street lighting, paving, " sewerage and cleansing, should be with the City commissioners." Those two observations, therefore, I think decidedly answer each other, and I may pass them over. In other parts of the evidence it is said, that we do not promote public measures as we ought to do, and that it is with great difficulty we are " dragged at the tail of public opinion." I make no further observation upon that subject, except that I will draw your attention to what we have done in order to show that such remarks are not justified by the fact. I will refer again to the two Acts of Parliament, by which we desired to increase the constituency. The corporation were sincere in those endeavours, but they were not successful. That is not a matter for which we can be at all censured, since the result rested with the the House of Commons. In the next place, with regard to the sewers ; before we had any pressure from without, we were very anxious to improve the sewerage of the City of London, and to obtain very largely increased powers for regulating slaughter-houses, the supply of water, and every other matter of that description. We applied to parliament. We communicated with the government, and ultimately succeeded in obtaining powers larger than had been given to any body of commissioners at that time. There were powers for regulating the consumption of smoke given to the City of London, I apprehend as an experiment to see whether any general principles could be applied to the consumption of smoke from furnaces beyond the limits of the City. We have tried the experiment. We worked it favourably for twelve months, and since that period, the same power has been given to the metropolis generally, which was given to us in the first instance, to see if the thing could be done effectually. Still there were some other powers required. And in 1851, finding that the provisions of the former Act did not work well, we obtained further powers from Parliament, which they most readily consented to, and gave us every provision that we then thought necessary for the improved working of everything connected with sewerage and sanitary matters in the City of London. We proceeded in that way, with a view to promote the public good, without being goaded on, as one of the witnesses intimated, by anybody. The Commissioners have had evidence that the commissioners of sewers have set on foot a treaty for the purchase of a very large plot of ground, which I believe is about being completed this day, for the purpose of a burial ground. There are many powers which that body has which are not granted to the metropolitan commissioners of sewers. The metropolitan commission is a sewerage commission almost exclusively, whereas our powers are very much larger than theirs. In reference to the sewerage of the City, I may say that we have now completed it. There is not a court, a street, nor a lane in the City of London, in which there is not a proper drainage. There is such a perfect system of sewerage as to enable every house to be drained. I believe the rate for the present year will not exceed a penny in the pound. We have ordered a rate to that amount to be made, and I believe with the balance in hand that will be quite sufficient to provide for the whole sewerage of the City of London. It has been suggested that there can be no unity of action between the metropolitan commissioners and the City commissioners when great public works are under construction. I may say, in answer to that, from my own experience, having been on both boards ever since the metropolitan commission has been appointed, there never has been the slightest inconvenience whatever. Our officers confer together. There is a very large and very important scheme now under consideration for the drainage of the entire northern side of the metropolis. We met the commissioners. Our officers met ; and nothing can be more useful for the public good, I apprehend, than the co-operation of the two bodies in reference to that very great question. And the reason why I think it would hardly be consistent to adopt the principle of having one board for the sewerage of the metropolis, including the City, is this : having completed our sewerage, it would be really a hardship to call upon us, rated as we are very highly, to contribute towards similar works in other districts, they not having completed their works or brought them to the state of perfection which we have. As an act of justice to the citizens, I think that is a strong point for consideration, before this Commission can contemplate for a moment connecting them for any metropolitan purposes with the sewerage. I do not desire to draw any comparison as to the per centage of the two establishments for carrying out their works, but I will state in reference to the City of London, that the whole of our expenses in the works executed by the commission are under seven per cent. upon the amount rated. I have had some information given me, and I think that is an extraordinarily small amount, compared with the amount which other commissions have spent in a similar way.

7286. Upon how many years expenditure do you make the calculation ?—You may take it as an average, the result will be the same. I take it as the whole expense for last year.

7287. Are you comparing an expenditure of precisely the same character ? Is not the expenditure which has been going on in other places upon larger works, whereas yours is more a detailed sewerage ?—They are not of a similar character, but the dissimilarity is in favour of the corporation, inasmuch as, in our expenditure, a large salary to our officer of health, and to the inspectors connected with that department, are included in the seven per cent. of expenditure.

7288. Are the sewerage works which you are comparing in different districts of the same character ?—Quite so. We are obliged to increase our establishment of inspectors very much. We have power to deal with the internal drainage of houses. We are having plans taken of the internal drainage of every house in the City of London as rapidly as it can be done. It is a work of immense magnitude, and yet that expense comes within the seven per cent. Our consolidated rate for the year was 71,888*l.*; the sewers rate, 13,758*l.*; making together 85,646*l.* The expenditure on works being 78,129*l.*, the entire cost was under seven per cent, including all our sanitary staff. I apprehend, comparing it with others, that will be found a remarkably small expenditure, looking at the magnitude of the works executed under the Commission of the City of London. At the same time I believe the work to have been done most admirably. We cannot be perfect, but we are approaching perfection as rapidly as we can. It would be almost unjust to unite us with the metropolitan commission, because we should be called upon to pay for works in other districts, similar to those we have completed in our own. The whole of the rates upon property in the City of London at the present time amounts to 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound. That includes the consolidated rate, the police rate, the sewers rate, and taking the City of London union, it amounts altogether to 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound.

Edward Harrison, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

7289. The poor rates would vary in each parish, would not they?—I have obtained the information from the board of guardians. I have the rental and I have the expenditure.

7290. There are three City unions?—I have not had an opportunity of getting the account from the three, but I have taken the largest one.

7291. Do you know whether the poor rate varies much in the different unions?—It does vary. In the City of London union, there are some parishes where we have no poor's rate, and in others we have very heavy rates indeed. As they all vary, I take the average expenditure and the average poundage. Those sums being put together, it will be found that the expenses in the City of London, all money raised by taxes, taking the poor's rate as I have been able to obtain it, amount to 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound; similar rates in Marylebone come to 3*s.* 6*d.*, and in St. Pancras, to 3*s.* 9*d.*

7292. Do you take the police rate in Marylebone?—I take all the rates they are called upon to pay in one particular year, which is the year 1853.

7293. Do you include the county rate in Marylebone?—No. I have no personal experience as to the amount, but I went to the remembrancer who has the information, and he gave me those returns from the actual receipts in the two parishes. I am prepared under these circumstances to show that we have so well managed our affairs in the City of London, that we pay less than they do in those immense districts. I hope that I have now shown that we have done our duty to the public in reference to sewerage, and have done everything we can in a sanitary point of view to improve the sanitary state of the City of London. We have managed it, I believe, more economically than any other board has managed similar works, and I believe to the entire satisfaction of the citizens of London, and that without any kind of inconvenience in the construction of any large works for the general drainage of the metropolis. I should now wish to say a word upon the common hall elections. I have had some experience in these elections, and I believe the evidence at present, so far as I have read it, does not go quite to the length that it should have gone in informing the minds of the Commissioners as to the amount of bribery and treating and improper conduct as connected with those elections. I would rather not mention names, but I am prepared to say this, that transactions are entered into between parties in the confidence of candidates and other parties who are agents for voters, absolutely to buy votes by the hundred. Their names are handed in, and the nature of the contract is, if every one of those men does not vote for you, you shall not pay me.

7294. Are you able to make this statement from your personal knowledge?—I am. There were four gentlemen, of whom I was one, who were the confidential friends of a candidate in an election; and I had to draw upon his bankers for such money as, in the department which I undertook, I was obliged to pay; and I did draw for a very large sum,—such buying of votes was not in my department, but a paper containing the names of those men came through my hands, and I handed it to the party who then made a contract respecting those votes. There is another mode by which we have to pay for getting a hall, as they call it. You pay a certain sum of money to have so many in the hall. I was naturally anxious to know how they got into the hall—they ought to pass through the respective wickets. I was called on to pay at the rate of 5*l.* a hundred, to one of those persons for letting what I presumed to be non-voters pass through a particular wicket. That requires an alteration; and the corporation have twice tried to alter it, but the opponents were too strong for us on both occasions. On one occasion in 1849, the committee on Standing Orders in the House of Commons decided that we could not proceed unless we struck out those clauses, because we had not given sufficient notice, under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, to those companies. We obtained our Act in August 1849, without any provision to modify the system of those common halls. On the other occasion the committee of the House of Commons, on the opposition of the livery companies, declared the preamble not proved, and threw out the bill altogether. I am mentioning this to show that we desire to do what is right and good for the public, and that we do not deserve to be told that we are unwilling even to be dragged at the tail of public opinion. We are desirous to carry out great improvements as economically as we possibly can. I do not like to say anything about the improvements which have been going on in connexion with the corporation, because the chairman of the committee will be before the Commissioners, and he will do it more ably than I can. With reference to the evidence you have before you, the corporation would appear to prefer to appoint an incompetent man rather than a competent one, upon a committee. The very reverse is the course of the corporation. From my experience, I can state distinctly, that the very reverse of that proposition is the course taken in reference to appointments on committees. I can illustrate that better by referring to the chairman of the Improvement committee at the present day. Mr. Hall has been many years connected with it; he has been chairman of it for some years; and he has actually been, out of his course, put on that committee, and upon the commission of sewers, because he knows the nature of the business to be transacted. I know many similar instances. My friend Mr. Lambert Jones was another instance of it. The corporation kept him in the chair from the commencement of the great improvements at London Bridge, till almost the termination of them, because he was so useful and understood every department of business; and yet how can a gentleman who has been connected with the corporation say, that a knowledge of the subject seems almost to amount to a reason why a gentleman is not to be put upon the committee. I cannot hear it with patience, and I hope it will not weigh upon you when you come to estimate the value of the public works which have been performed lately by the corporation.

Edward Harrison, Esq.

7295. Do you think that the committees of the common council are too numerous?—I do not know that there would be any advantage in a reduction of the number as regards the working of the corporation. It might be desirable in saving the time of some of the members. Yesterday, for instance, we met upon one question. If that question had been before a committee which had a dozen questions before it, probably we should have disposed of them all on one single day, instead of the single question upon which we were called together. I do not wish in anything I have said to be supposed to express an opinion that the corporation, as it at present exists, is not susceptible of considerable improvement, because, I think, there may be and will probably be suggestions for making alterations in a variety of respects, but as they are constituted they have done their best to promote purposes of public usefulness.

7296. Are there any other points to which you desire to call our attention?—I am one of the Consolidated committee, and have been from the commencement. I have been with the chairman upon all deputations to the government.

7297. Do you think that the number of members placed upon those committees is inconveniently large for the transaction of business or not?—I think the business could be as well transacted with a smaller number certainly. We do not very often meet the whole committee.

7298. Does it happen that members of a committee come in and vote upon important subjects at the close of the inquiry without having regularly attended the whole of the proceedings?—I should say that that circumstance may have arisen.

7299. Would not it be more satisfactory to yourself, for instance, to be able to devote your whole attention to one committee instead of having to devote it to the proceedings of three?—I cannot say that it would. I devote a good deal of time and of attention to public interests. I am so circumstanced as to be able to do so.

7300. Do several committees often meet on the same day?—Sometimes there are three or four on the same day.

7301. Does it often happen in your own experience, that the three committees of which you are a member meet upon the same day and at the same hour?—Not often, but it will at times so happen.

7302. Do not you find that inconvenient?—I am not able to attend to all of course.

7303. Do you think there would be inconvenience found if the rule were adopted that a member should not be put upon more than one important committee at the same time?—We could not lay down such a rule under the present arrangements of the corporation, for this reason,—they appoint one member from each ward, in my own ward we have six representatives in the court, and that will give more than one committee for each member.

7304. Are you acquainted with the proceedings of the Navigation committee?—I have been on the Navigation committee for four years.

7305. Have you been in the habit of attending it?—When I was a member of the committee I used to attend pretty regularly.

7306. Do you believe that the business of that committee is transacted in a manner which is beneficial to the public?—Quite the reverse, but it only arises from the litigation that is going on upon the question; they have no power to deal with the river as they desire to do.

7307. Otherwise you think that their arrangement of the conservancy is satisfactory?—I believe perfectly so. When I was on the committee four years ago I do not recollect ever having heard a complaint. The mode of proceeding is to sit and hear both sides before we determine a question as to an embankment, for instance. Those are very common questions. If an application is made to embank, the committee will not entertain the question unless they have in writing the consent of the persons who occupy the property on either side. The committee then goes down to view, and it hears all the parties. Some members of the committee are more particularly connected with the navigation, and understand the subject practically. I of course do not, but still I feel that a committee so constituted is quite competent; they have hitherto performed the duty most satisfactorily, and I believe they will continue to do so.

Edward Harrison, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

T. H. HALL, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

T. H. Hall, Esq.

7308. You are a member of the common council?—I am.

7309. You are chairman of the Improvement committee, are you not?—I have been so for some years.

7310. What are the functions of that committee?—Carrying out improvements in the City which have been entrusted to them by the corporation by Act, as well as those which relate to districts outside the metropolis which they have been empowered by the government to carry out.

7311. What have you to do with regard to those improvements which are carried on outside the City of London?—There is one instance of the kind, the Clerkenwell improvement.

7312. Will you proceed to make any statement which you desire to lay before the Commission?—I have felt it to be my duty to come before the Commissioners that they may have an opportunity of questioning me, as one of the body which has been very much maligned during the inquiry which has been going on. If there is anything in connection with the body of the corporation which you think you ought to question, it is our duty to put ourselves before you, that you may see whether the statements made by our officers are borne out by the testimony of the members. I have felt that, or I would not have placed myself in the situation which I am now in. I have represented the ward with which I am now connected for twenty-five years. My father and myself have been resident in it for ninety years, and having taken a very large interest in corporate matters, I thought it right to place myself before you.

7313. Are you engaged in trade?—I am a wholesale hat manufacturer.

7314. You are chairman of the Improvement committee?—I am.

7315. How long have you been in the chair?—I think I have been there six years. I was for ten years a member of the London Bridge Approaches committee, acting with Mr. Richard Lambert Jones, and at his retirement from the chair I was placed in it. The election is annual; but I have been placed in the chair each year for the last six years.

7316. What is the mode of transacting the business in this committee?—We meet very constantly; but I believe as to the number of meetings the town clerk has given evidence, and it will not be necessary for me to repeat it. We meet very constantly, and have very important business. The committee conduct, as if they were a jury, the examinations of the parties who have claims upon them, leaving the value of the freehold or the leasehold property to their able adviser, Mr. Bunning, who tells them the amount which he conceives they ought to pay. The committee, who are men of business, almost every one of them being connected with one special jury system, sit, often to the number of eighteen or twenty, to listen to the various cases. Every particular is taken down. There is sure to be present a person who has been connected with the neighbourhood, or who knows something of it, so that no claimant can come before them without his claim being sifted to the utmost. There are never less than from fifteen to twenty persons devoting their time to purposes connected with the public interests.

7317. The Improvement committee do not decide upon the great improvements or alterations which are to be made, do they; they only carry out the detail of those operations when they have been decided on?—A committee like this has a reference to it upon the subject of every improvement which is suggested. Such a line having been marked out, they place it before their officer; they desire him to lay down the best line in the direction which has been contemplated, pointing out where it should deviate, or where it should be altered. Upon his report to them, and thus having obtained the best advice they can from a man competent to give it, they report to the court, and then the subject is discussed as any matter would be discussed in the House of Commons. There are a variety of interests urging improvements in their own neighbourhood, and the whole subject is canvassed in every way and settled, and then an Act of Parliament is applied for, which enables them to carry it out.

7318. In the case of any great improvement, such as those which took place in the approaches to London Bridge, the suggestion comes from the Improvement committee, the plan is discussed by the Court of Common Council, and if approved by them, the scheme goes to Parliament for obtaining an Act?—Yes; and the Act, having been obtained, is referred to that committee to carry it out, and to treat with all the claimants under it. The committee issue notices, treat with claimants, and either settle the claims, or carry them to a jury.

7318 A. Who is your adviser upon the committee in the arrangement of an extensive scheme of that description; is it the City architect?—I think you must have ascertained in the evidence which has been given you that a variety of gentlemen raise projects of their own. By a notice of motion they bring them before the Court of Common Council.

7319. Do those plans generally originate with your committee?—No; there are always suggestions made in the court either by a petition from the locality, or in some other way; and a discussion takes place in the court before it is referred to any committee to consider.

T. H. Hall, Esq.

1st Feb. 1854.

7320. Of course it is necessary, in a question of importance of this description, to take professional advice. Before your committee expresses a formal opinion upon any great scheme of that kind, what is the professional advice by which you would be principally guided; would it be that of the City architect?—Assuredly. First of all there must be a suggestion, which is particular; it must have a view, and it must state the direction in which the parties who bring it before the court desire it to pass. Then, having got the reference, it is sent to the surveyor; he points out deviations or objections to the line proposed, and he suggests the line which he thinks best. Then the report goes up, and is discussed by the Court of Common Council.

7321. By the surveyor do you mean the City architect?—Yes. In reference to the manner in which the committee conduct their affairs I could almost wish, instead of having explanations of the conduct of the business, it were possible that you could have a view of them while the business was being conducted; and your estimate of it, it strikes me, would be very different to that which persons knowing little of it endeavour to imprint upon your minds.

7322. Is the amount of the business large?—Very large. This committee have had to deal with claims to the extent of 1,200,000*l.*, which they have settled for a much smaller sum.

7323. Are there any architects or builders upon your committee?—There may be one or two, but if you were to ask me whether I desire it; I would say that the corporation wish that all the members should be disinterested; that they should as little as possible have an interest in any building scheme or anything to interfere with the discharge of their public duties. The jealousy of the corporation as to any of their body moving in a direction to obtain a personal advantage is very great.

7324. The practice of the committee is to decide upon all the details themselves, and not to trust to the discretion of the officers?—Assuredly, with an excellent adviser by their side whose advice is taken, and, generally speaking, such as the committee would adopt. He is not asked as to a question of mere expediency—a committee of thirteen or fourteen men of business who know something of the world will know what is expedient as well as any officer can tell them. If it is necessary to ask the solicitor who sits by our side—is that agreement the same as a lease, and are we bound to look at it as a lease?—no member of the board will dispute that the solicitor can answer that question in the best way. We get his answer, and treat with the party, either as a tenant who may have had the promise of a lease; or if he has a lease, that lease is referred to a competent person to value. I should say that the earnestness with which the committee examine all claims and sift them in every way is very great; persons have a right to go to a jury, but if every case were driven to a jury an enormous expense would be incurred. A committee sitting with thirteen or fourteen of those claims before them in a day might commit the corporation to an expenditure of 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* by carelessness in such matters. I will refer the commission to the large amount of settlements we have made, among which there has been scarcely a claim carried to a jury.

7325. The general principle of the corporation is that all the details of the executive business should be transacted by committees, and that the officers should merely advise and carry into execution the decision of the committees, is that the case?—It is. Mr. Richardson, on behalf of the comptroller, informed you that as soon as the committee had settled the whole claim it was referred to him formally to carry out that which the committee had done. The number of questions respecting improvements which are constantly arising in the corporation is very great—there are numbers of them at this moment. Cannon Street is now approaching completion, and I would say that the corporation will have devoted 500,000*l.* of their money to that improvement. There are questions arising as to Tower Street, Leadenhall Street, and the small improvement in Dowgate Street; and the improvement in Newgate Street is one which has been going on economically. The corporation have not carried that out by a public Act; but, as the leases fall in, the corporation, being connected with those leases, have refused to grant fresh ones—but they have granted building leases, so as to avoid the large sum which would otherwise have to be paid to claimants. The committee report annually to the corporation the whole of the business which they have transacted; and after having carried out the Act of Parliament thoroughly, they report the result of it, that they may judge whether it has been carried out at the value which had originally been fixed, giving the corporation an opportunity of testing that. The corporation are constantly devoting a portion of their property to improvements. They are now carrying out, without an Act of Parliament, the improvement opposite Billiter Lane in Fenchurch Street, for the purpose of making a better avenue to the Blackwall Railway. That is done by the corporation, with their own property, by an arrangement with the Blackwall Railway managers. I would ask the attention of the Commissioners to the evidence of Mr. Bennoch at 1182. He speaks of the corporation having been goaded into improvements, when I think, some time before he was a member, they brought in a bill and devoted their money to that very purpose. Drawing your attention to the subject of New Cannon Street, he says, it is one of the last streets which ought to have been constructed. That is a very strong opinion for a gentleman not a professional person to offer. "It is a great improve-

"ment no doubt," he says, "but it is burrowing behind other streets." Can you imagine in the City of London any improvement which can be carried out which must not burrow as it were behind some street or other. It was done on purpose to relieve Cheapside. He appears to have considered it as being done to relieve Ludgate Hill, There are two large avenues leading into Cheapside, Newgate Street and Ludgate Hill—one winding round St. Paul's Church-yard and the other leading through Newgate-street, converging in a very narrow place, the Poultry. The corporation thought it would be desirable to cut a line east and west that should divide a portion of that traffic—a large number of omnibuses, it is quite clear, will be drawn off from Cheapside to the new street—the object was, where so much was demanded, to take that which needed to be effected first. The corporation have now before them a project for a new street from Cannon Street West to Earl Street. Carriages coming from the South Western Railway passing over Blackfriars Bridge would then be able to come up to the east end of the City without passing round Ludgate Hill. It is believed that that would be a very great relief to that part of the City. In 5265, the question is put to Mr. Bunning whether the improvements in Cannon Street will not considerably increase the value of the property belonging to the City. It appeared to me that that question did not receive quite a sufficient answer. I say at once that they will not improve the value of the property belonging to the corporation to the extent of 1*s.* The corporation receive no advantage from the improvement; they devote their money to it without receiving any pecuniary advantage. In reference to questions 5268, 5269, and 5270, I will only make the observation that where every street must be cut through at the expense of many thousands of pounds, what improvement shall really be made, of course must depend upon the means there are for making improvements. I should state that there is a report before the corporation, now for their approval, with respect to continuing the new line of street to Earl Street at an expenditure of 195,000*l.* If the corporation, when that shall be discussed, approve of it, there must be means adopted for raising the money, and there must be an Act of Parliament applied for. With respect to Clerkenwell, the Commissioners are aware that the Old Improvement Commissioners, who had expended the funds which had been entrusted to them, besought the corporation to take that improvement up; it was a long time before we felt we ought to do so, but still there was a street which we had expended 50,000*l.* upon, and which was of no use till the other was completed. The corporation therefore took a great deal of trouble to carry out a work which was not within the City—they conducted the matter as they would conduct their own affairs, and agreed to receive 88,000*l.*, and to charge their own estate for three years longer with 11,500*l.* per annum. That is a contribution which we made to carry out improvements for the rest of the metropolis in a district which is not within our own boundaries.

7326. All this time you were receiving the proceeds of the coal duty; which was paid, not only by the inhabitants of the City proper, but by the inhabitants of the metropolis and the adjoining districts?—The corporation have a prescriptive right to the 4*d.* duty. This 11,500*l.* was given out of their general estate.

7327. The corporation do not make much distinction between the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty upon coals and their general estate, do they; they consider they have the same claim to the whole?—Clearly; but they have charged the 4*d.* duty with the large improvement in Cannon Street.

7328. Do not you think it reasonable and equitable on the part of the City that, as long as they are in possession of a fund like the 4*d.* duty upon coals, derived from payments made, not only by the inhabitants of the City of London proper, but of the whole of the metropolis, they should in their expenditure consider the interests of those who contribute to this duty, even if they reside out of the precincts of the City?—I do, most heartily; and I believe it is one of those things seldom granted to a corporation that you will trust them to carry on business not within their own boundaries. The corporation readily give their own time, and that without any payment, for the purpose of carrying out such works. When we were before Sir Charles Wood, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the member for Middlesex was present, the magistrates for Middlesex were present, and all parties urged the corporation to undertake it. I have liberty from the corporation to say that there is a contemplated improvement for raising the valley of Holborn; that matter is now before the common council upon a report, the amount required being 333,000*l.* I would say that something on that subject must be positively arranged. Before that street can be carried out, it is absolutely necessary for the public good that it should be decided whether Holborn is to remain a valley, as it now is, or whether it shall be raised, for the benefit of all parties. How so large a sum for that improvement, and 195,000*l.* for another purpose, is to be raised I know not. The corporation are ready to take any step to assist in carrying out those great improvements which is in their power. A fire took place three or four years back at Holborn Hill. The corporation immediately bought the property sooner than see it rebuilt, that it might not offer an obstacle to the pulling down of the old houses which are near it, and that there might not be a new one to buy at treble the amount. In all such cases there is somebody or other connected with the corporation who is able to point out the course which ought to be taken, and it is constantly done. The corporation cannot venture to let the ground in Clerkenwell along that line till they know whether they have the government's sanction to improve Holborn valley. Should new houses be built upon it to the extent of thousands no improvement can be possibly carried out. I myself say that the object must be met, and met by the government as well as by the corporation, in some shape or other. Mr. Bennoch, in 2051, says that money has been charged for lodging-houses, but not a brick laid. The fact is, the money charged is for the purpose of the purchase of freehold ground, —bricks are not laid for that purpose. That only shows, when persons know nothing of what they are talking about, how easy it is to make representations of that kind, which are forthwith published in all the newspapers.

7329. What Mr. Bennoch says, in question 2052, is this,—"They intended, I believe, in "connexion with the improvement of Farringdon Street, when they had built the houses "for the labouring poor, to build baths and wash-houses; but the proposed scheme of a "new central railway coming into that position is, I think, a fair excuse for the delay of "those works?"—It is all very well to appear to give credit to the corporation, and then at the latter end of the statement to throw a slur upon them. He says, "The purpose "professedly was, that of building lodging-houses for the labouring poor. The "foundations of those houses, however, are not laid, though it appears here in the account "of payments." The only money which we have charged has been for purchasing the ground, and not for the erection of the houses, as Mr. Bennoch implies. I would say that the improvements which are at present pressed upon the corporation are—Holborn Hill, Earl Street—a very large one, by parties carrying on business in Lower Thames Street, near the Custom House, who are urging that there should be another way made into East Cheap, and that part of Lower Thames Street should be widened. The property there is of immense value. The subject is now before our architect; the amount required will be very large. The widening of Tower Street also has been very long in agitation; and, by an improvement we are now able to effect, the east end of Thames Street will be thrown open. There is a petition before the corporation for an improvement in Lime Street. Mark Lane improvement and Dowgate Street improvement are being carried on. At Fenchurch Street the corporation are pulling down their own houses, losing the rack rent and letting them upon ground rents. Upper Thames Street is being constantly widened, whenever an opportunity offers. Newgate Street, on the north side, is being widened. With respect to the eastern end of Newgate Street, abutting upon the Post-office, many interviews have been held with the government, to know whether there is a probability of their extending the Post-office. Putting all the amounts together, there are projects involving an expenditure of above two millions of money now being pressed upon the corporation for streets only. In addition to that, there appears to be a large sum wanted to widen London Bridge, or make some improvement there. There is a question how to sustain Blackfriars Bridge. If that cannot be sustained, if the engineer cannot hold it up, a very large expense will be required for a new bridge. Every one is trying, as it were, to get the corporation to receive less and to expend more.

7330. You have stated that there are a great number of schemes urged upon the corporation of extensive improvements in the City of London. Who is it who takes a general view of the state of the City of London, compares the relative importance and urgency of those various schemes, with reference to the probable cost of them, and decides which of them shall be referred?—If there is a scheme fairly proposed, it is always sent to a committee; and then we have the best advice upon the subject that we can obtain.

7331. Who is it who considers the whole case of the City of London, the various projects that are proposed for improving it, and then decides which of all those schemes shall be adopted?—The corporation, after having a report of the surveyor and considered it, determines whether it has the means of carrying it out, as well as whether it will be proper to do so.

7332. Weighing not only the value of the scheme itself, but comparing it with the relative value of other schemes?—The commissioners have seen Mr. Norris and Mr. Bennoch who have been witnesses before you; and you must be quite sure if they had a scheme to urge, they have the ability to urge it upon the common council.

7333. Who decides between the relative importance of all these schemes which are perpetually being urged upon the corporation?—There is no more an improver-general in the corporation than there is at the West end. Schemes are considered as they arise.

7334. Do not you consider that there ought to be a competent authority to whom the corporation, having those large sums of money to expend, and the important duty of improving the City of London to discharge, should have recourse, with a view of obtaining a deliberate and well-weighed opinion what is the scheme which they should prefer among all those which are put before them?—I consider that there are few persons, in consequence of their intimacy with improvements, to whom the corporation could better refer upon such a subject than Mr. Bunning, the City architect.

7335. Does the corporation, in point of fact, refer all those schemes to the City architect to be reported on, and to advise them which, out of them all, is the one he should recommend them to carry into effect?—They invariably refer every improvement which is suggested to him, after they have determined to entertain it.

7336. Does the city architect report merely upon those schemes separately, upon their separate and individual merits, or does he take a general view of the improvements suggested for the whole City of London,—having reference to the money at the disposal of the City of London for those improvements,—and then report what scheme, in his opinion should have the priority and be carried into effect?—I think the Commissioners will gather the answer from this:—In reporting upon the Holborn Bridge improvement, he says: "I deem it right, while these extensive improvements are in contemplation in "this locality, to call your attention to the desirableness of forming a new street from the "south east corner of Victoria Street to Long Lane, and also for the continuation of Cow "Cross Street southward into King Street, Snow Hill. The first-named new street "would afford greatly increased facilities of access to Smithfield, the site proposed by the "Markets Improvement committee for dead meat and poultry markets." The corporation have not yet adopted that; but when urged, as the Commissioners urge me to say, whether an enlarged view is taken, I feel that I am not doing justice to the architect if I do not show how his report does draw the attention of the corporation to the subject.

7337. Do your committee think it their duty to take a general view of the state of the City of London, when money is to be spent for those improvements, and consider all the plans which are laid before them for improvements; and then, upon a general view, state which they think should be preferred in point of time or importance?—We invariably say which we think ought to be done first. I thought I had explained myself very fully. It must be brought before the corporation before they will refer it to the committee. Having been brought before the corporation, if they refer it to the committee that committee report what they think to be desirable—then the corporation consider whether they will adopt the report or take some other in preference to it, first having before them the most desirable.

7338. Do your committee make any annual report to the common council, stating the progress which has been made in the improvements already ordered, and any suggestions as to the future course which the corporation ought to adopt in the matter of City improvements?—The corporation are jealous, and very properly so, as to their committees suggesting things that they have no authority to do. The corporation do not empower the committee to travel about the City, and tell the corporation what they ought to do. The larger body refers particular suggestions to the smaller body, and not the smaller body to the larger one. I observe the Commissioners have examined several of the witnesses with respect to Southwark Bridge. The corporation act as cautiously as they can upon these subjects. They have passed a resolution, "That the report of "the Bridge House committee be referred back to the committee, to ascertain by "professional inquiry the state of Southwark Bridge, with reference to its strength "and durability, and its sufficiency to bear the traffic likely to come upon it, and "to report thereon to the court." It appears to be thought that we ought not to make a question between 250,000*l.* and 300,000*l.* The corporation think before they go into any question as to how much it will cost, they ought to understand the state in which the bridge is. As it will involve a large outlay of money, they have looked at it a little while before they undertake anything. They are now taking means to obtain an account as to what state the bridge is in, and then will come the question of value. In 4396, a question was put to Mr. Edward Wilson,—"Do you think that any "gentleman who has not turned his attention to such subjects could judge very well of "the effect of an embankment on the river Thames?" No such question can arise in the Navigation committee. The corporation, under the advice of Mr. Walker and Captain Bullock, have fixed a line that the committee has not power to deviate from. When you ask whether any person upon that committee can do so and so, the answer is that they have not the power to do it. It has been decided by the best advice which the corporation can procure what shall be done, and the object of the Navigation committee is to carry that out. No merchant or dock director who could be added to that committee could ever be competent to answer the question. The committee must be bound to the line which has been approved by Mr. Walker; it would never do for individuals to be judging for themselves on such a subject.

7339. Do you think the present management of the conservancy could be improved?—I was chairman of the Navigation committee upon the occasion when the corporation agreed, if it were the wish of the government, that there should be a fixed committee, consisting of something like 18, supposing the Lord Mayor would be one, some of the aldermen and some of the commoners others, so that you would be sure of having an efficient committee of eight or nine attending. They agreed to that; and it was part of the plan. The committee of the House of Commons however, rather wished it to be changeable. As evidence that the corporation wish for an improvement,—when the bill was brought in for a large embankment at Battersea and Vauxhall, the corporation said in a moment, we agree to that; it is carrying out our own views; it is Mr. Walker's line with the slightest possible deviation; we should be glad to see bills for all parts of the river that would enable the plan to be carried out.

7340. Do you think the present system of managing the conservancy of the river is susceptible of improvement?—It is a very difficult question. There is scarcely an institution in the world which is not susceptible of improvement; but if you mean that they are incompetent or cannot do their duties, I at once decidedly negative it. If you have interested parties, whether from the docks or from among the merchants, it will not be done eventually as successfully, and so much with the approbation of the public, as it is now. I ventured, before Lord Auckland, to say that I believed if there were a board appointed such as we desired, there would not be an appeal from its decisions; and I thought there never would be a reversal if there were an appeal.

7341. Is it your opinion that it would not be easy to make any substantial improvement in the present management of the conservancy?—My firm belief is that the corporation, if they had powers which were undisputed, with a power of appeal, would appoint a body to perform the duties; and you would not have complaints, or at least complaints upon which there would be a reversal of their decision. That is the result of my own experience. The present body are independent; they give their decisions firmly, and I believe they would be generally sanctioned. As Mr. Norris said, there is the greatest fear of having private interests on the committee; if anything would be injurious, certainly that would be injurious above everything else. Mr. Clement George, in speaking of the rates, says, the corporation have a 4*d.* and a 1*d.* rate. I see he went away under that impression. That is quite a mistake; we have no property in the 1*d.* rate; it was given up. I admit that in Marylebone a great deal of improvement has not been carried out; that is one of the matters which must rest with the government, or with Parliament, to bring forward; the corporation are not answerable for that. Mr. George says that the corporation are an irresponsible body. I do not think it is correct to say that of a body which is elected annually. In the case of the vestry, of which he is a member, only one-third part is elected annually. He spoke also in favour of local management; the corporation assuredly join him in that. It should be borne in mind that the City of London, with its large rental, pay 9*d.* to metropolitan improvements beyond their own 4*d.* There is a constant complaint of how much is paid towards the purposes of the City, but not a word about what the City pay on the other side. I think it must be the general impression upon the minds of the Commissioners that the business of the City of London does not seem to have been injured by the corporation. It is constantly rising and extending. While they speak of us as small traders, the City of London is rising in character to a very great extent. The small traders are being carried into the suburbs, and you find that the City is really the warehouse for the whole of the metropolis, and its business is becoming almost wholly wholesale. There is no doubt that you have warehousemen now whose business monthly must be equal to that which was carried on by the merchants who are spoken of in former days in the course of a year. I was on the committee that was nominated upon the suggestion of Mr. Williams in 1834, and I worked with him during the whole time that that committee sat as long as he remained in the corporation. He says the committee was appointed most honourably and most uprightly, and they constantly worked together. Does it appear to the Commissioners that a body can be bad who granted to a gentleman who required it, and was known to be a reformer, a committee which he says decidedly was all that it ought to be? Can he get such a thing elsewhere? He spoke of the Mansion House as the corporation's great feasting place. I deny it. The corporation of London give that house as the residence of the chief magistrate; they never intrude themselves upon it; he generally invites the members of the corporation once during his year, as the Speakers may be said to invite members of Parliament; they are no more feasting at the Mansion House than it may be said the House of Commons are at the Speaker's house. That he does invite large bodies of men, merchants, such as Mr. Hankey and others, to the Mansion House very constantly, and occasionally asks the chairmen of the committees, is true; but that the invitation is universal to the corporation is not the fact. I think Mr. Williams, who has been at the Mansion House as a member of Parliament, knows that it was not what he ought to say. In 2819 Mr. Williams says that the 8*d.* duty is expended for City improvements up to this time. That is not the fact. We have it in evidence that we have paid over an enormous sum to the Board of Works, and that we have been doing so for a considerable time. The evidence of Mr. Travers has been remarked upon before. I have taken down several of his answers for the purpose of noticing them. I was connected for many years with the father of Mr. Travers, and acted together with him a long time during the Reform agitation in the City. I am very sorry to see that Mr. Travers should have made such assertions as he has done. I think one particular assertion which he has made is an error. He is asked if he knows what the ordinary business of the common council is; he says, "I cannot give a guess at it. I do not know what they do." He says he is on the Court of the Fishmongers' Company. I have no doubt in a small way they have some of the duties which the corporation have in a large way; they have small debts to manage, and so on; but I believe likewise that they have some pay for doing it. I fancy Mr. Travers must be as well aware of the value of the business as any one can be. Mr. Hankey called your attention to the question of London Bridge. I am afraid that the corporation can hardly be considered answerable for it. The evil is the increasing traffic, and they want the means for doing all the good which it might be desirable to do. Mr. Pulling, in 954, says the officers are very numerous; in 955 he says there are an immense number of officers; and in 979 there are too many officers, too large a staff. I believe Mr. Pulling is really a victim to our desire to decrease the number. He was a candidate for the office of pleader. I had an interview with him myself, being acquainted with his family, and I stated that if it were possible to do without we desired to do without any addition to the number. The corporation did decide not to fill up the office, or, I am informed by those who took an active part, that Mr. Pulling would have been almost certain to have obtained it. I think he should have hardly said what he did, seeing that he was himself urging the corporation to suffer him to fill one of the offices, and has lost the opportunity of serving the corporation by our desire to reform it. In one of his answers, Mr. Bennoch speaks of the desire of the committees rather to take the most inefficient of the body for the office of chairman. I was one who joined in the report to the corporation in 1835 for a reduction of the amount allowed to the committees. The General Purposes committee was one; their allowance was reduced from 500*l.* to 200*l.* I was one of the members of the committee, and in my third year. A party said to me, "If you will join and enforce this reform you will surely never be elected." I said, that does not signify. I only wish to show you that the corporation do not act as Mr. Bennoch said; for I actually was unanimously elected to the chair—having, two months before they elected me, cut off from the committee's allowance 300*l.* out of 500*l.*, leaving them only 200*l.*

7342. Do you think that the discontinuance of the allowances to the committees would produce any bad effects?—The corporation, in the report to which I was a party, resolved that there should be a certain amount continued to each committee, the purpose of its continuance being, if possible, to secure the attendances of the members so as to make the committee useful.

7343. Do you believe that there would be any difficulty in securing the attendance of members upon an important committee without allowances of this description?—I feel that it is one of those things which gives an opportunity for cavil. It is clearly not the money which is the object, because I have repeatedly gone to a committee of this description instead of going to the board of a life office, where I should receive a considerable remuneration. Again, as a special juror, the day I was sixty, I had my name taken off the list, that I might not be called from attending corporate matters to get a guinea. It is generally the case that, where you once feel an anxiety or a desire to render yourself useful, you are willing to do it, even at some sacrifice.

7344. Do not you think that the lax attendance upon the committees may be partly attributed to the numbers which are upon those different committees. If there were only a few persons upon a committee, and it was understood that no one would be placed upon it without a kind of engagement that he would attend to the business, would not the members of the committee feel it their duty to attend regularly, even if there were no allowance of this description?—Having signed my name to a report, in which I urged that some small allowance should be continued to a committee, and given my reasons for that opinion, I still remain of the same mind, that it would not be right to say that a corporate body should meet, and should neither be allowed line money nor any amount at all. Mr. Bower gave a very good reason for it. I have kept the Improvement committee from one o'clock to seven o'clock constantly at work—almost all those gentlemen live out of town—I do not suppose that twenty or thirty out of the whole 200 common councilmen sleep in the City. Where are they to go at seven o'clock to dinner? I cannot be brought to say that the corporation ought to have no return at all for services performed.

7345. Is this allowance money spent in that needful refreshment which, in a case such as you describe, gentlemen having met together for the discharge of business, must require, or is it spent rather in a sort of good fellowship meeting of a festive nature at the end of the labours of the committee?—There have been various reasons given—each one must account for his own. I can only say as chairman of our committee, we have no such festive meeting. Once in a year we dine at Blackwall, in the summer; but the money is really given for the purpose of procuring refreshment, and it has sometimes not been decided that there shall be any till the business is seen to drag on to so late an hour as to require it.

7346. Do not you think that the necessity may depend very much upon the present mode of constituting the committees. If, on the appointment of a committee gentlemen were chosen as they are now in the House of Commons, from their willingness to undertake the particular business for which the committee is appointed, would not that alter the case?—I think if they had a comfortable place like there is in the House of Commons, to which they could withdraw a few at a time, coming back again to business, it is very possible that they might sit for hours, and not require a dinner afterwards. In answer to question 2029, Mr. Bennoch paid a compliment to the corporation. He is asked the question, "You mean, having such patronage, "it would not be necessary for them when they wished to pay a compliment to any one, "to vote him a sum of money, but they would give him an office?" He says, "I think "so. So general has the tendency become to elect relations of members of the common "council to offices of that kind, that last year the sons of three members of the "common council became candidates for one office. The more independent part of "the common council considered this to be offensive and unwise; and they moved and "passed a resolution, which is now one of the byelaws of the court, that the son of a "common councilman shall not be eligible to be elected, so long as his father continues in the corporation." I put that notice of motion on the paper, and it was carried. Mr. Bennoch very fairly bears evidence to what is the real desire of the corporation. I think, however, it would show the working of the corporation more than any other thing, if the commissioners were to hear how that was carried. I brought forward the motion, and stated that I would not make a reference to former occasions, but I thought it would be an improvement if they got rid of the practice. There was no observation of mine that would be at all offensive to any body. Various members spoke upon the subject, and I will read you what Mr. Bennoch himself said upon it. Mr. Bennoch said that "The motion was nothing less than a substantial vote of censure

" upon the court itself, and he ridiculed the project of keeping it in a state of positive " purity by such means. Why a man who discharged his obligations as a member of the " court with unquestionable skill and integrity should be prevented from allowing his son " to be a candidate for an office, he could not at all comprehend. Why should it happen, " if a son was more competent to perform all the duties of the office than any other " likely to present himself, should he be shut out from the chance of election?" Mr. Bennoch therefore was the gentleman who opposed the motion which I brought forward, for the very purpose of which he now expresses his approbation, but for which he appears then to have thought there was no necessity.

Thursday, 2nd February 1854.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P. IN THE CHAIR.

THOMAS DAKIN, Esq, having been sworn was examined as follows.

7347. What is your connection with the corporation of London?—I have been a member of the corporation of London between ten and eleven years.

7348. Are you a trader in the City?—I am.

7349. What description of trade do you carry on?—I am a chemist and druggist.

7350. Do you reside in the City of London?—I do not.

7351. You are a common councilman?—I am.

7352. Is there any part of the business of the corporation with which you have been particularly connected?—Somewhat to my surprise I was one day summoned by the corporation to attend here without any intimation being given as to what I was expected to prove. The corporation have sent summonses to many of its members. I do not object to it, because I have taken an active part in the corporation business, and may therefore be fairly presumed to be able to give some information to the Commissioners, but my attention has not been directed to any particular points, nor I believe has the attention of any of the other witnesses. I was present during the whole of yesterday and heard the course of the examination, and I saw the inconvenience which has sometimes arisen from there not being organization among the witnesses. I am prepared to give information as to any points which I may be asked about.

7353. Are there any committees of the common council in whose proceedings you have particularly taken a part?—Some evidence was brought before the committee yesterday in regard to the Gresham trust and Gresham college. I have served upon the Gresham committee and they did me the honour of electing me chairman of the City side of that committee. That is a point upon which I shall be very happy to give any information to the Commissioners. There seemed to be on the part of the witnesses yesterday, Mr. Bennoch, and Dr. Waddilove, a desire to know the amount of the property of the Gresham trust, and how it was expended. I therefore went down to the Guildhall this morning, with a view of obtaining that information, which is printed upon the papers of the common council under date the 30th of June 1853. If my friend Mr. Bennoch had known the course of business and attended to it, he would have found that information, which he said he had a difficulty in obtaining, upon the printed papers of the common council which are sent round to every member. In those papers will be found a brief statement of the receipts and expenditure of the City's moiety of the estate of Sir Thomas Gresham, for the year ending the 10th of October 1852. It appears that in that year there was a transfer of the loan which is made upon the security of the Gresham trust, to the amount of 85,000*l.* Taking that away on both sides, the accounts of receipts and expenditure seem very nearly to balance each other. The charge is a balance in hand of 578*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.*, rents received 5,033*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, income-duty retained on loans 95*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* That is the moiety of the estate of Sir Thomas Gresham, received by the City. The disbursements are salaries which were allotted to the professors 663*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*; allowance to poor prisoners, 55*l.* Allowances of clothing &c. to poor almsmen, and repairs to almshouses, 284*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*; rates, taxes, &c. in respect to site of Royal Exchange, 425*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; salaries to clerk of committee, exchange keepers and constables, 337*l.* 17*s.*; law expenses, 14*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*; incidental expenses, 71*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*; interest on money advanced, 56*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*; interest on loans raised, 3,267*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that the City of London, acting as joint trustees under the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, have advanced from time to time very large sums of money over and above the amount which they have received as trustees. After the fire of London there was a debt of 20,000*l.*, which has been written off from the accounts of the City, which, with the accumulated interest from the year 1706, would make 120,000*l.*, which the corporation have advanced out of their own funds in sustentation of the trust under Sir Thomas Gresham's will. That amount has been entirely written off. Besides that, the City have made a loan of 25,000*l.* to the trust, over and above the 85,000*l.* which they have borrowed on the security of their corporate seal, and for which they are responsible.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

7354. Do you mean that the debt at present of the Gresham trust is 110,000*l.*?—85,000*l.* in bonds, and the loan which I have spoken of, of 25,000*l.* I adduce this to show that, as trustees under Sir Thomas Gresham's will, the City have advanced out of their own funds, from time to time, very large sums to carry out the objects which he had in view.

7355. Do you consider the Gresham trust to be in a solvent state?—No. I am now speaking of the moiety belonging to the City. The other moiety which is administered by the Mercers' Company is similarly indebted to the private funds of that company for efficiently carrying out the trust, the payment of salaries to the lecturers, and so on. But for the private advances of the Mercers' Company and the City, the trust of Sir Thomas Gresham's will would not have been carried out.

7356. You mean that the Gresham trust, after paying the interest of its debt, has not sufficient reserve to carry on the necessary expenditure without having recourse to the funds of the City, and the Mercers' Company?—That is the condition of the trust. Dr. Waddilove stated that the Exchange brought the trustees into debt, and that at one time they had a difficulty of paying the salaries of the professors, but that after the lapse of one or two years they had paid them out of their own funds. That state of things exists to the present time. I am very anxious to say that there is a strong feeling in the City which corresponds very much with the representations made yesterday to the Commissioners, with regard to the necessity of adapting in some way the present Gresham college to the wants of the community. It is undoubtedly a fact that the college is for all purposes of public instruction almost a dead letter.

7357. Has the Gresham trust at this moment any surplus revenue whatever to devote to the purposes of education after the payment of the debt?—None whatever. On the contrary; the trusts of the will being fulfilled, the salaries to the lecturers paid, the allowance for almsmen, and the necessary expenditure for the custody and repair of the Royal Exchange provided for, in addition to the interest on the money advanced, they not only have no surplus, but they must draw upon their own funds.

7358. Even for the payment of the professors, and the other expenses which are now incurred with the professed object of the communication of information to the inhabitants of the City, what surplus funds have they which can be devoted to that object after the payment of the debt?—They have not any.

7359. The trust in short is really insolvent?—That is rather a strong description to give to it, because the difference is so very small between the charge and the amount.

7360. If the trust were left to itself, and the City of London and the Mercers' Company out of their own funds did not come to its assistance, could the Gresham trust continue its expenditure for educational purposes, even to the degree, and upon the scale which it has hitherto done?—I think not.

7361. What is the amount of the charities under the Gresham trust?—284*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*, for almsmen, and 55*l.*, a payment to poor prisoners. Speaking on behalf of the City and the citizens generally, any help which the Commission may be able to give towards altering the state of things in regard to Sir Thomas Gresham's will would be considered as a very great boon. I likewise heard some evidence yesterday with regard to the City improvements. It appeared to me that several questions which came from the Commissioners with regard to the mode in which suggestions for City improvements emanated, and the authority on which they are afterwards carried out, were not quite understood. Suggestions for improvements come, I think, from the best source from which they can come, viz.: the inhabitants of the City, who have an opportunity of witnessing the interruption to the traffic, and who feel the hardship of being subjected to those interruptions. From my experience, I have found that those wants and those necessities have constantly found a voice in the court, and that they have been talked about from time to time. I may mention, for instance, the narrow thoroughfare of Watling-street. It was constantly urged upon the court by the representatives of that district, that Watling-street was inconveniently narrow; that it was a great drawback to that particular locality, and consequently, it had a claim upon any help which the City might give from its resources. That it might be reported for two or three years; other matters would spring up with regard to widening Tower-street; those would take the same shape, and would be referred to the Improvements committee. The Improvements committee, in 1846, caused one of Wylde's maps of London to be marked with all those improvements which were called for by the wishes of the inhabitants, and referred that map and those suggestions to the consideration of the Improvements committee. The course then taken is, that the Improvements committee refers the question to the City architect. He looks at it, and gives his judgment as to the priority in which those improvements might reasonably be taken, and as to the amount of the expenditure which would be incurred by their being executed; and then the matter, so considered by the Improvements committee and so reported upon by the architect, is, in the course of business, brought back to the Court of Common Council. Then, if they entertained any one of the plans, they would refer it to another committee, called the Coal, Corn, and Finance committee; or they might empower the Improvements committee itself to consider how the necessary funds could be obtained from the City resources for the purpose of carrying out the improvement. If that plan became so far matured, the remembrancer would have instructions to draw a Bill and submit it to the Legislature. It appears to me, that that is a convenient course of following up improvements. If it occurred that some general action, with regard to the metropolis which I thought the question yesterday pointed at, was necessary, you have the machinery here by which consultation or communication could be had with any other body of gentlemen acting for any other part of the metropolis, so as to preserve some degree of unity of action and uniformity of result.

7362. Is the course which you have been describing the one which was taken on some particular occasion, or is it the usual course?—The usual course.

7363. Is there any annual report made by the City architect as to the state of the improvements which have been going on or are contemplated?—Such report is presented from time to time, and the Improvements committee itself, when any plan of improvement has been entrusted to it to carry out, makes a detailed report of the cost, not only generally, but of each individual property,—how the property has been assessed, whether by arbitration, by agreement, or by jury.

7364. Are the common council and the members of the court regularly and accurately informed of the course adopted in regard to improvements in the City of London?—I think so. I think the course I have detailed shows that they are.

7365. Are those reports published?—They are printed in a blue book. I may say, that we are always very anxious to obtain the utmost publicity that we can. That is one of the very elements of our usefulness; and our over-eagerness to obtain that object, has, in some instances, subjected us to suspicion, which, I think, is not warranted by the facts of the case. As regards the conduct of the corporation, in respect to any trusts of which they are possessed, that which I have detailed in respect to the Gresham trust is carried out. I may mention, for example, the navigation trust, upon which the corporation has advanced from time to time large sums of money. Instead of its being as charged that the corporation, in its character of conservators of the river Thames, has made use of that office for the sake of adding to its own resources, the direct contrary has been the result.

7366. Do you know the position in which the City architect stands to the corporation?—I think I do.

7367. Do you think the corporation would be bound, in the event of the erection of any great public building in the City being contemplated or considered necessary, to resort exclusively to the advice of the City architect?—I do not think by any means they are bound to that. If, for example, another calamity should befal the Royal Exchange, it is very likely they might have recourse to competition. I speak upon this subject with diffidence, because the results of competition in that very matter of the Royal Exchange were not of that kind to lead us to any favourable conclusion. If I recollect right, the erection of that building was submitted to public competition, the cost to be incurred being set down in the specifications sent out, and also particulars with regard to the amount of rental which would be necessary to enable the Gresham trustees to carry out their trust. In that case, those two particulars being specified, it went to competition, and I believe out of the large number of plans which were sent in, there was scarcely found one which either did not exceed the amount which was at the disposal of the trustees, or which did not fail in producing the amount of rental which was necessary to sustain the trusts of the Gresham will. Afterwards, three celebrated architects were called in to give their advice. They were asked if they would conpete, and they declined, and ultimately the plan was adopted of Mr. Tite, which cannot be said to have been the result of competition. Competition in that case, instead of leading directly to the object which the trustees had in view, rather embarrassed their proceedings.

7368. It does not necessarily follow that you should resort to public and open competition as the alternative to confining yourself to the advice of a single architect upon a point of that kind?—Possibly not. I have stated generally that the trusts of the corporation are usually a source of heavy expense to them from their private sources, and not a source of aid to them. I may mention the operations of the Navigation committee in the conservancy of the river, as an instance of that. I find that the Navigation committee has advanced from time to time 40,000*l.*, and that the debt under bonds, though charged upon the tolls of the navigation, is an amount of 135,000*l.*, which the City is considered to be security for.

7369. If that be so, I suppose if the conservancy of the Thames were altogether separated from the jurisdiction of the City of London, no pecuniary injury would be done to the City?—I consider not.

7370. On the contrary, it would be a pecuniary benefit to them?—It would relieve them from the charges to which their funds are now liable. I do not mention this with a view of showing that they are impatient under the charge, or unwilling to discharge the duties assigned to them. A statement has been made before this Commission that the officers of the corporation as a body are very greatly overpaid. I wish to say, as far as my capability of judgment goes, knowing both what they receive and the services which are rendered, that the sums which they receive are not at all large in comparison with the sums which they would receive in the open market of labour or the professional arena, considering the talents which they bring to bear upon the duties which they perform, and the amount of duties which they are called on to perform. I will take for example the City solicitor, whom I have the honour of knowing very well. I know the weighty duties which he has to perform, and I consider that in the case of that gentleman, instead of being an overpaid officer, he is underpaid. His salary and emoluments have been stated to the Commission at 1,750*l.* a-year. It has only been within the last few years, I think not more than four or five years, that an addition of some 600*l.* or 700*l.* has been made to his salary. Therefore, before that, he was an officer with something like 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* a-year; and it was with the greatest difficulty that the Court of Common Council could be induced to consider the question with a view to that increase. I have reason to know that the City solicitor considers now the citizens and the corporation, whenever they are either in good humour or in good funds, owe him several thousand pounds, which he is fairly entitled to. I may say that before any addition is made to the salary of any officer, a most rigorous investigation is made as to the amount of his emoluments. In that case, I know the books of the City solicitor were carefully gone through. We have in the Court of Common Council a body of men who are always arrayed on the side of economy, and retrenchment, and reform, who look very carefully after those things. They are generally put upon the committee, and they look minutely into the question of the amount received and the duties performed, and it is with the greatest difficulty that any addition to such salaries is made. The same is the case with the City architect. Before the increase of his emolument he was dissatisfied. He expressed himself that he considered the best part of his life was occupied in the service of the City; that he was doing an amount of professional service, for which he received a very incompetent emolument; that he could not hope for many years to do it; and that it was not such as would enable him to have that fair amount of retiring property which every man in the highest walks of his profession has a right to expect.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

7371. It has been given in evidence that, with regard to some of the most lucrative situations connected with the corporation which are filled by popular election, individuals have thought it worth while to spend large sums of money in attaining those offices; would not that show, in regard to those offices, that there is a feeling that they are of value?—That I think particularly applies to the office of chamberlain. In the bridge-master's office, which is the only other one, I should think they must look rather to the honour than the profit of it. Unless the holder enjoys the office for a number of years, the expense he must go to is more than the amount of the emolument which he receives.

7372. You have stated that you do not think the officers of the City, considered as a whole, are overpaid?—I do not.

7373. Do you think the offices are more numerous than are required?—I think in the case of many of the older offices, which I do not see in active operation, they might with great judgment be abolished. I allude to the office of bridge-master. I think that is an office almost obsolete, and there are some others of that class; but with respect to those officers who have to conduct the active business of the corporation, I do not believe they are overpaid, nor are there too many of them. Where there are large revenues to deal with, it is of the greatest importance to have men of the highest character and talent, and I do not believe it is a wise economy to seek to underpay them. With respect to the architect of the City, I may mention a fact which is within my own knowledge, that that gentleman was only known to the corporation by his competition in the case of the erection of the City of London School; he was quite a stranger to them. He gained that employment by public competition; he executed it within his estimates. That brought him so favourably under the notice of the corporation that when, some time after, the office of City architect became vacant, though he was unknown before that, and had no private interest or influence to push him forward, he was elected to the office he now holds. With regard generally to the election of officers, I must say that, in the main, the efficient discharge of the duties is alone looked to, and not any undue partiality.

7374. Are there any other observations which you desire to make?—I do not know whether the Commission will allow me to make a few remarks upon the charges which have been made against the corporation. I allude principally to those assertions which have been made in the evidence that the members of the corporation, as it now exists, belong to the class of shop-keepers, and the more specific statement of Mr. Travers, that they are the small class of shop-keepers. Though, perhaps Mr Travers might have such traders as I am in view, considering my own ward and the wards in my neighbourhood, I maintain that that is not a fair or correct representation of the present state of the City.

7375. What is your own ward?—Candlewick. I should have taken no exception if Mr. Travers had described the present municipality of the City of London as I find Mr. Macaulay in his history describes it. He says, "The City is no longer regarded by "the wealthiest traders with that attachment that every man naturally feels for his "home; it is no longer associated in their minds with domestic affections and endearments, "the fireside, the nursery, the social table, the quiet bed are not there—Lombard-street "and Threadneedle-street are merely places where men toil and accumulate." That I think is a fair description; he then goes on to state, speaking of the municipality, that "its honours and duties are abandoned to men who, though useful and highly respectable, "seldom belong to the princely commercial houses of which the names are renowned "throughout the world." I take it that that is a fair description. I should, therefore, demur to the description of Mr. Travers that we are small shop-keepers. I may mention, as a matter of fact within my own knowledge, that the wards of the City adjoining mine do not correspond with his description,—Bridge ward returns eight members ; of those eight six are wholesale dealers exclusively. In Dowgate ward, which adjoins Bridge ward, the whole six are wholesale dealers and some of them in a very large way of business, and might be described, as Mr. Travers describes himself, as wholesale grocers. In Billingsgate ward the whole eight are of that class. In Walbrook, Mr. Travers's own ward, it so happens that the whole six of them are wholesale men, and two of them might be appropriately described, as he describes himself, as wholesale grocers; one of them, Mr. Rowley, is of the firm of Rowley, Davis, and Co., who are wholesale tea dealers, another of them, Mr. Conder, is a large colonial dealer, and the four others are also wholesale men. I think, therefore, it is rather unpardonable that Mr. Travers, in coming to give evidence before this Commission, should not have taken the trouble to make himself somewhat acquainted with the matter which he had to speak about. In my own ward we return six members, and I am the only one who can be at all designated as a retail dealer, but that would not be a fair description of my position. I think the distinctions of retail and wholesale are very fast wearing away. Almost all of those who might be called retail dealers in the principal streets of the City would not be fairly described in that way. My principal business is that of a wholesale and export dealer; also I have large mercantile transactions with China and the East Indies.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

7376. You yourself do not reside in the City of London, do you?—No. I believe this class of distinction is unfairly taken. My principal occupation is not of a retail character, that is done for me. I have another establishment, close by, where I have a large wholesale business, and I may say perhaps that the fact of having a shop, which is my case, does not prevent my being invited by large bodies to take part in large commercial transactions. I think it is only fair to say that I am chairman of two companies carrying on business under special Acts of Parliament. I am a director of a dock company which is now a' out to establish docks twice the size of the London Docks, and I am a director of one of the London insurance companies. I feel, therefore, that I may be allowed to represent my class, and disabuse your minds of that impression which has been sought to be created—that we are not men who fairly represent the trading interests of the City of London.

7377. What has been stated to the Commissioners is that the great merchants and bankers of London for the most part keep aloof from the business of the corporation. As a matter of fact that is true, is not it?—I think there are men in very large trade who are connected now with the corporation of London. They are not men perhaps whose names are eminent to the world, such men I do not think take any part in the public business of the City. A class of business has sprung up within the last quarter of a century which may be termed that of public companies. These are banks, insurance companies, dock companies, mining companies, and others. Those gentlemen whom I have particularly in view, some of whom perhaps, though they stand more highly, are not better known, and do not obtain the large income which some of the other men do. Consequently in many cases those gentlemen who describe themselves as South American merchants and West India merchants, though they have not time to attend to the affairs of the municipality, we find have time to attend to those other affairs where there is a payment connected with them. I may mention that Mr. Powles, who is a South American merchant, though he has not time to attend to the affairs of the municipality of the City where he carries on his business, has time to give to public companies of various kinds, dock companies and mining companies, but there is this distinction, that for such occupations he gets paid.

7378. Persons take that as a part of their profitable business?—Certainly. But I would venture to ask the Commissioners whether it necessarily casts any reflection upon that class of the community, who, perhaps equally respectable and equally competent to give their judgment upon important matters, devote their time to avocations for which they receive no remuneration of any kind except the satisfaction of being put in a position to discharge public duties, and availing themselves of an avenue to distinction which the others do not want, they being men who have their names distinguished by their grandfathers or their fathers before them having pursued the path which some of us are now taking.

7379. You say you do not live in the City?—I do not.

7380. Can you give a guess what proportion of the common council may be supposed to reside in the City?—I should think of the 200 there are not above twenty-five who live in the City.

7381. I suppose you think, if it could be effected, what would be desirable would be that all the mercantile classes, not excluding either large general merchants or retail shopkeepers who may be men of character and intelligence, should co-operate in the management of the municipal affairs of a City like that of London?—I think it is most devoutly to be wished, but I am very much afraid that, alter the constitution as you will, it will be a matter of very difficult attainment, from the principle which I have ventured to sketch out.

7382. You think, in the present condition of the trade of the country and the City, however desirable it may be in theory it would be difficult in practice to bring about?—

Yes; it would be very difficult to bring in those gentlemen who are engaged in business as first-class merchants and bankers in the City, but if the position of an alderman or common councilman be estimated by the duties to be performed it must be one of the greatest honour and importance.

7383. You are of opinion that if a first-class merchant were, from a sense of duty, to show himself disposed to take his share of the business and functions of the corporation, there would be no jealousy and no indisposition on the part of the traders of London to elect him to that office?—Certainly not; my own impression is quite opposed to the opinion which has been given by my friend Mr. Bennoch. I believe that the more distinguished a man is, either in position or from talent, and the more aptitude he shows for public business the warmer is the welcome which he gets in the corporation of London. I can speak most distinctly upon that point that the amount of regard a man has, the influence he has, and the position in which he is placed altogether depend upon his character and talent, and the desire he has to make them available to the use of the corporation.

7384. Do you believe there to be no jealousy between the different classes of traders in the City of London? Do you think the retail trader would not be jealous of the wholesale trader having a fair share in the government of the City, and vice versâ?—Certainly not. I think the wholesale and the retail business run so much one into the other that no broad line of distinction can be drawn.

7385. Still there is a class of gentlemen in London, large general merchants and bankers, who are altogether removed from retail dealing; is not that so?—No doubt about it. A good deal of observation, I think, was made in the evidence with regard to the disposition of the corporation to meet the wants and requirements of the public in regard to Southwark Bridge. Having been appointed one of the deputation to confer with the directors of Southwark Bridge, I am able to state to the Commissioners the position in which that question stands. There is every disposition on the part of the corporation of the City of London to give, either in street accommodation or in communication by means of bridges, all the help they can to the citizens. Although, as in the case of the Gresham trust and the Navigation trust, the Bridge House property is already occupied and pledged to a considerable extent, so that I do not think any part of that fund could be brought into operation for the purpose of purchasing Southwark Bridge, yet, from what I know of the feeling and mind of the corporation of London, if the owners of the bridge had any disposition to meet the corporation in an equitable spirit, the corporation would make an effort to find from their own funds some reasonable amount, in conjunction probably with the Government, to make the bridge available for the public. The committee to which I belonged had instructions to open a communication with the directors of Southwark Bridge, with a view of seeing what value they fixed upon their property. They had before stated that 300,000*l.* was the sum they expected to get; but from information communicated to the Court of Common Council, it was stated that they had moderated their demands, and we should very likely find them disposed to take a smaller sum than that for it. A deputation of four gentlemen waited upon them with a view of seeing whether they were disposed to meet the corporation in their views as to price. We were furnished with the report of the select committee of the House of Commons in 1836, which gave us a precise account of the net amount of profits which the Bridge Company received from their undertaking, and though we should not ask them to deal with us upon the question of profits purely, yet that we thought might fairly be taken as an element of the consideration. We found that, in the year 1848, the entire net proceeds of the bridge were 1,875*l.* per annum. Acting as trustees for others, it did appear to the deputation that the directors of Southwark Bridge might reasonably have moderated their demand of 300,000*l.*, for the property which was only yielding a profit of 1,875*l.* per annum. The deputation expressed that to the Southwark Bridge directors; but instead of meeting any feeling of that kind, they stated that they were quite aware that the public must have the bridge, that the state of the traffic over London Bridge was such that it was absolutely necessary that the bridge should be bought; and they said further: "We will not promise you that the proprietors will take that sum, but if you do "not agree to this now, the probability is when you come again you will have to pay a "much larger sum." In the face of a treaty of that kind, I think it was not fair of Mr. Thomson Hankey to state that the City showed an incompetency to provide for the wants of the public by raising a question of whether they would pay 300,000*l.* or 350,000*l.* for Southwark Bridge. The corporation, on the contrary, have shown every desire as far as they could to provide for the wants of the public, and in that particular are not chargeable with a dereliction of duty. I may mention that, in addition to the sum which the bridge would be purchased for, we ascertained from our own officer that in all probability the sum of 150,000*l.* might be required to make the approaches to the bridge what it would be necessary they should be to meet the exigencies of the public traffic. I have before me a report of the Royal Entertainment committee. The Commissioners have asked several of the witnesses the cost of the ordinary banquets and feastings in the corporation; and as I happened to be chairman of that committee, and took an active part in moving it originally, from what I thought to be a sense of public duty, which has been fulfilled by its results, I think the Commissioners might choose to see this report. I merely put in that document as an evidence of the care which is taken with regard to getting up entertainments of that kind. Considering the position of the City, and the occasions which give rise to them, it is done with all due economy, and it is made, as far as we can judge, to subserve important public purposes. It is rather with that view that I would invite the attention of the Commissioners to it, for I see in the evidence it has been proposed by some of the witnesses to sweep away the municipality altogether, and by one witness, I think, it was proposed to make the expenditure of the municipality bear that relation to the State which it would do if it were under the federal government of America. I have rather a strong view upon that point, and, indeed, I expressed those views when I moved for the committee and for the grant of 5,000 guineas which was afforded by the City for the purpose of giving this entertainment. I have a strong impression that in a city like London, which has been so long associated with the functions of the Government and with the monarchy, it may be a useful function to continue to it, that it should afford a means of access of the highest personage in the State occasionally, and the ministers and the nobles of the country constantly, that they may there meet the middle classes of society, and that that may probably have a tendency to strengthen the Government and to strengthen the fabric of society at large. That is the view which I strongly took of it when I moved for the committee. There is a letter in that report which I would venture to refer to, which shows that, as far as regards her Majesty, it was very acceptable to her to receive that loyal welcome which she had at that time from her subjects. It is from Lord John Russell, directed to the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor: "My Lord,—I have received Her Majesty's command to "express to the corporation of the City of London, through your Lordship, Her Majesty's "cordial thanks for the manner in which the corporation received Her Majesty yesterday "evening, and for the splendid entertainment in the Guildhall. The hearty, kind, and "enthusiastic greetings which accompanied the progress of Her Majesty through the City, "both in going and returning, have afforded her the highest gratification. The Queen "and the Prince Albert were deeply affected by these spontaneous marks of attachment; "their only anxiety has been lest any accident should have occurred from the pressure "of the crowd. The Queen has been pleased to direct that the dignity of a baronet "should be conferred upon your Lordship as a proof of her satisfaction, and an enduring "testimony of her regard for the citizens of London." I think that is a matter which has a tendency to strengthen the general links of society. In cases which occurred not long before, when the whole fabric of society was threatened by an outbreak of the Chartists, the citizens generally, as a wall of defence, stood round the monarchy and the institutions of the country. I think it may be considered useful to continue some such functions as are now enjoyed by the City of London. Another good effect of that expenditure of the municipality is, that the French municipality responded to an invitation which they in common with all connected with the Exhibition of all Nations received. They invited the municipality of London through its members back to Paris, and a very friendly interchange of civilities took place, and even during the last year some record of that has been transmitted to the chamber of London, duly emblazoned, to keep alive the memory of that fact. I think that may possibly, in the view which I have ventured to throw out, be an example of useful expenditure of a limited sum of money by a municipality like that of London, not only in regard to our own institutions, but as encouraging a friendly feeling on the part of a neighbouring nation. Looking to the expenditure of the banquets, according to a report in 3d July 1817, to the allied sovereigns and the Duke of Wellington, I found it involved the sum of 25,000*l.*—that is about one-third of a century ago. We profess to be improving, and we have improved. A good deal of the obloquy and the disfavour which has been by common consent thrown upon the corporation does not properly belong to it on account of its own proceedings, but on account perhaps of some misdoings of some former time. I may mention that these entertainments entailed an expense of 25,083*l.* 14*s.* 0*d.*; at this entertainment, on the contrary, we had 5,000 guineas voted for the expense, and we returned into the chamber a balance of between 100*l.* and 200*l.* The committee of which I was chairman had no personal expenditure whatever.

7386. Were the two entertainments of the same character?—No. In the former case they were dinners. I venture to draw the attention of the Commissioners to this. In the year following the report of 1817, there is a report of the Finance committee of the corporation on the corporation difficulties. Of course the propriety of any expenditure of that kind may be fairly measured by the condition in which the exchequer may be. If by prudent management and good conduct the financial condition of the corporation is prosperous, you may, perhaps, have a right to adopt a plan of that kind; and that I take to be the present condition of the corporation of London. Upon that occasion, I find, on the 2nd of February 1818, there is a report on the financial difficulties of the corporation. It is stated that there is a debt due to the Bridge House fund of 33,000*l.* There is 25,000*l.* in the 3 per cent. consols due likewise. There is due to the Norwich bank 10,000*l.*; to Sir Richard Carr Glyn 5,000*l.* Mr. Chamberlain's interest 1,508*l.* Claim of Mr. Remembrancer, one of their own officers, 17,000*l.*; and another, Mr. Solicitor, 6,000*l.*; showing a debt of 92,508*l.*, which, from the nature of the items, I should say, was of a pressing nature; the committee recommending at that time that a county rate should be assessed upon the inhabitants of the City to relieve them. The condition of things is now very different, and which I think justified a limited and careful expenditure of that kind for the public objects which I have named. I have only further to say, that I have been ten years connected with the corporation. I have taken a very active part in most of its proceedings. I have the means of knowing what has been going on; and I can state most confidently, that the charges which I am happy to say are now dropped of personal corruption and jobbery, or any means of enriching individuals, are utterly untrue. If I had been inclined, or it had been necessary for me to obtain a single shilling in any way, directly or indirectly, I can only say, I never have received it; and under the arrangements and the constitution of the corporation I never could receive any such sum.

7387. The Commissioners understand that it is the practice of the committees of the common council to conduct, to a considerable extent, the details of the business which is referred to them?—That is so.

7388. They exercise not merely a general control, but a very minute control over the officers who are attached to each committee?—They have no general control over the officers; the general control of the officers is with the Court. The assistance of the officers of the corporation is required by each committee according to the business which is laid before it.

7389. Do you think it desirable that the committees should enter so much into detail, as it appears practically they do. Would the business be equally well done if more discretion were left to the officers?—I think it would be a very dangerous principle to lay down. However respectable and talented the officers of a corporation may be, it is of the very essence of a proper municipal institution that all the principles, and to some extent the details, should be carefully overlooked by the members themselves.

BENJAMIN BOWER, Esquire, was further examined as follows.

Benjamin Bower, Esq.

7390. Is there any point in the evidence which you gave on a former day to which you are desirous of calling our attention?—I should wish to correct one statement. I stated that Mr. Bennoch had accused the corporation of being men of no mark, and generally retail dealers. I find, on examining the evidence, that it is not Mr. Bennoch who made the statement, but it is made in No. 146 by Mr. Acland, and in 216 by Mr. Travers. It is a circumstance which will be in your minds that that has been an accusation against the corporation, and I gave an opinion in opposition to it.

JOHN SIMON, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

John Simon, Esq.

7391. What is your connection with the corporation of the City of London?—I am officer of health to the City of London.

7392. When were you appointed to that situation?—In 1848.

7393. What is the salary attached to that office?—800*l.* a year; to which it was raised a year ago from 500*l.*, its previous amount.

7394. Are there any other emoluments?—None.

7395. What are your duties?—I have to advise generally on all sanitary proceedings; to be cognisant of all important facts relating to public health within the jurisdiction; and to superintend from day to day that systematic visitation of the dwellings of the poorer classes, which, during the last few years, has been organized within the City for sanitary purposes, 7396. I suppose you act immediately under the commission of sewers?—I do. I attend its meetings and those of its committees as often as may be necessary.

7397. Are there any statements which you desire to make to the Commissioners?—Perhaps the Commissioners would like to know something of the detail of the work; much of it being, I believe, peculiar to the City. I said that I have to advise the commission generally on its sanitary proceedings, that is to say, sometimes on the smallest details of sanitary work, sometimes on much larger subjects. Here (handing in the same) are two of the more extensive reports which I had occasion to present during last year; one is the annual report of the year; the other is a report suggesting principles for the provision of a cemetery, and generally for the organization of their proposed system of extra-mural interment. With respect to the details of work from week to week, they are of this kind. The commission of sewers has six inspectors of nuisances, who fulfil a double function; acting partly for sanitary purposes, under my direction, with the title of Inspectors of Nuisances; partly under direction of my colleague (the engineer to the commission) Mr. Haywood, as Inspectors of Lamps and Pavements. It may be reckoned that somewhat less than half their time is due to the former office; in which they act systematically under my superintendence, for the purposes of sanitary inspection. I am expected to turn their industry to the most useful account. Having myself acquired, by frequent personal examination, an intimate knowledge of the several districts of the City, as to their sanitary defects and requirements; and knowing also from week to week what deaths of all kinds are occurring in each part of the City, and what particular prevalence of fever there may be here or there, in its poorer districts. I prepare for the inspectors every week a list of places to be inspected by them in a very circumstantial manner. The information which I direct them to seek refers of course to the various details of sanitary condition—to questions of lodgment, ventilation, cleanliness, drainage, water-supply, privy accommodation, removal of dust, paving of yards and cellars, existence of nuisances and the like; and I have constructed tabular forms for the inspectors (producing the same) which enable them to record this information most compendiously. The weekly returns resulting from this inquiry constantly bring under my notice a very large number of cases requiring immediate correction; cases very often of mal-condition dangerous to life. In respect of all such instances where the lawful powers of the commission can be usefully exerted, I always at the next ensuing court recommend the requisite orders to be issued, having first, whenever I deem it necessary, myself made visits of verification or inquiry; and it is a matter of routine at every meeting of the commission to proceed, on these recommendations, to issue a considerable number of orders for sanitary improvement. Take for instance this week:—anticipating that I might have to give evidence upon the point, I summed up, at the meeting of the court last Tuesday, the number of houses in respect of which I then had to recommend orders for sanitary work; and I counted 95 such houses upon my list. That was one week's work. I need hardly say that it is a matter of great importance to the poorer classes, that their dwellings should be inspected periodically for the enforcement of cleanly and wholesome conditions. A further part of my weekly routine is to receive from the inspectors an account of the progress made towards compliance with orders previously issued. For in the case of each order, a fixed time is allowed for fulfilment; on the expiration of that time, I receive information whether the work be done or not done; and in the latter case, I again bring the matter before the court, with a view to such further proceedings as the circumstances may require.

John Simon, Esq.

7398. When those orders are enforced on a private house, how is the expense paid?—By the landlord. Under the Sewers Act, the commission is empowered to call upon landlords to amend their property in respect of all the particulars to which I have adverted.

7399. Is that a general Act?—A local Act and one of vast utility.

7400. Is that peculiar to the City?—Yes. The City Sewers Act of 1848, passed at the same time as the Public Health Act; and the powers of the commission were afterwards much increased for sanitary purposes by a second Act, passed in 1851.

7401. Is there a similar Act for any other part of the metropolis?—No.

7402. Have you found it necessary in many cases to resort to extreme measures?—Not very often.

7403. Is the house property of the City chiefly in the hands of men of substance?—The poorer house property of the City is very often in the hands of wealthy people, who have only the most general notion of its whereabouts, have perhaps never visited the place from which they receive rent, and in short know their property only through their agents. Instances have come to my knowledge of the very worst description of property being thus held ignorantly and carelessly by wealthy persons. But for the most part such owners are unknown to us; and often for years we can get at no representative of the property, other than the agent or collector who receives the weekly rent for some anonymous employer.

7404. But they are well able to incur the expense to which they are put?—I believe so. In further reference to the duties of my office, I may mention that I compile the mortuary records of the City into a shape suitable for statistical inferences. My weekly list of sanitary recommendations is always accompanied by a tabular statement of the past week's mortality; wherein I distinguish the several causes of death, and the ages at which it has occurred. From the material of the weekly tables, I construct every year the more comprehensive tables which exist as an appendix at the end of my annual reports, and which form the basis of such general conclusions on the health of the City as I lay annually before the court.

7405. You are not the superintendent registrar of either of the unions?—I am not. The registrar general is kind enough to lend me the detailed reports of the several local registrars. I am then enabled to make all requisite corrections for the mortality of hospitals and workhouses, and to compile the result in a convenient and accurate form.

7406. Do you consider that the sanitary inspection of the City is in an efficient state?—Very much so. An improvement has been lately made in it by the appointment of additional inspectors.

7407. As compared with the rest of the metropolis, how would you describe it? Do you consider it more efficient?—Simply to this extent; the City enjoys, I believe, a very efficient sanitary supervision; and the rest of the metropolis has none. I do not know any better way in which that issue can be tried than the following:—Let any one in the confidence of your Commission walk the City boundary from Temple Bar to Aldgate, with the City on his right hand and the county on his left; let him look into each court, as he goes along, and record the result; let him observe whether the paving, whether the scavenage, whether the house-drainage, whether the water-supply to houses, whether the gas-lighting, whether the general freedom from nuisance, be better cared for in the poor neighbourhoods on his right hand, (which lie within the City,) or on his left hand, where he may test the efficiency of several other jurisdictions. I believe that, in nine cases out of ten, his record would show a marked difference in favour of the City courts; and in the tenth case, if it were exceptional and did not show the same superiority, I will venture to say that the commissioners of sewers would be able to find in their minutes a very good reason for it; probably that they had endeavoured to improve the place but had been defeated on some technical ground. There is paving universally in the courts of the City, which is an important contribution to the hindrance of disease; they are scavenged daily; their details of house-drainage and water-supply have been much amended, and are still in daily progress of improvement; they are systematically visited by officers, whose special business is to report on unclean conditions of highways or houses, and all nuisances whatsoever. It may be true that the sanitary improvement of the City is far from complete; and indeed there are many sanitary evils which tend to relapse from week to week—often from the slovenly habits of the poor; but as regards a comparison of its poorer districts with similar localities in the adjoining jurisdictions, I believe that the City would show evidences of sanitary supervision that could not be traced in other parts of the metropolis.

7408. Are you at all hampered for the want of funds in the execution of your duty, or do you find that the funds at the disposal of the commission are sufficient to enable you to do in general what you consider desirable?—The commissioners spend their funds very liberally for public purposes; but I confess I wish that there were money to spend in pulling down houses, and making open spaces. From the way in which the City has grown up, there are many parts where the residences of the poor are so enclosed by taller houses as to be unfit for habitation. More or less this may be the case in every considerable urban area, especially in old towns; but it is peculiarly the case in the City.

7409. Do you think that the City is worse off in those respects than other parts of the metropolis?—I suppose, speaking generally, that the buildings of the metropolis are more or less densely packed in various districts, in proportion as the ground on which they stand has been long covered with houses or otherwise. And in the City proper there is a special cause for houses having been cramned together, in the fact of its having been originally surrounded with walls. The population also is very dense; the most crowded part of the metropolis being the area of the East London Union.

7410. During the last half century, the population of the City proper has remained rather stationary, has not it, rather diminishing than increasing?—I think the population of the entire City has increased about 5,000 within the last ten years; it is now 130,000, at the previous census it was about 125,000.

7411. Had not it been 130,000 in a previous year?—That census, I believe, related to a somewhat different area. The recent increase has taken place almost exclusively in the East London Union, a part without the original City proper, including the districts of Cripplegate, and Bishopsgate.

7412. The number of houses used for the purpose of counting-houses, and for purposes of business, probably somewhat increases every year, does not it?—I am not well informed upon that subject.

7413. The increase of the population has probably taken place principally among the poorer classes?—Undoubtedly; and perhaps to a more considerable extent than the census would suggest; for their increase has been partially masked by that comparative depopulation of certain parts of the City, which arises in the conversion of dwellings into offices and warehouses. The number of houses having been considerably reduced, the additional population must be taken chiefly to represent an increased crowding of the poor houses.

7414. When it happens in the course of a City improvement that a number of poorer houses are taken down, and the poor people are turned out of their lodgings, have any steps ever been taken to provide accommodation anywhere else?—Not within my knowledge. Within the time I have been connected with the City, there has been no extensive disturbance of the poorer dwellings. Some courts have been destroyed in the construction of New Cannon Street, but I do not believe that a very large poor population has been removed by that proceeding. The City has had it in contemplation to build lodging-houses for the labouring classes; and I believe that a considerable sum of money was destined for this purpose, in connexion with the plan for re-constructing Smithfield as a central market. Nothing to my knowledge has yet been done in the matter; but I have heard that the intention is not abandoned.

7415. Upon what scale is it proposed that the operation shall be conducted?—I have not been consulted about the plan, and I know nothing of its proposed details.

7416. Is there anything else which you desire to state?—Nothing else.

THOMAS DAKIN, Esq. was further examined as follows:

7417. You have been a member of the common council?—Yes.

7418. Have you ever been connected with the management of the Irish estates?—Yes, I have. I have been a member of the Irish society, and in that capacity I was elected deputy governor of that society, and served the office.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

2d Feb. 1854.

7419. When was that?—Three years ago.

7420. How long did you hold the office?—It is an annual office; by the charter the members are appointed for two years, and then go off in rotation.

7421. Will you have the goodness to describe to us what is the constitution of the Irish society, and its connection with the corporation of the City of London?—The origin of the Irish society was that, in the reign of James the First, the province of Ulster was forfeited to the Crown, and they were anxious to settle it, as it was then termed, with Protestants from England and Scotland. It was offered to the citizens of London on condition of their erecting certain fortresses, and taking possession of the country with a view to cultivating and settling it, and peopling it, and defending it against any attack; and there were also certain terms of payment to the monarch. The twelve companies of London advanced certain sums of money to the then government, in consequence of which they had this particular portion of the province of Ulster parcelled out among them. The companies of London at that time were synonymous almost with the corporation of London, because they were closely connected. In the process of time, however, a separation between the companies of London and the corporation of London took place, and then the property so held was divided among the companies in proportion to the amount which they had originally subscribed for the settlement and occupation of the estates.

7422. Was any money advanced originally by the corporation of the City of London distinct from any of the companies?—I am not aware that there was. At that time, when a division took place, a certain portion of the property was considered as an indivisible portion, and was left under the control of the Irish society.

7423. As the joint property of all those companies?—No. I think as far as the general property could be divided, each company had its separate portion allocated to itself. This portion which could not be divided, which consisted of the townlands of Derby and Coleraine, and the fisheries of the rivers Bann and Lough Foyle, which are very productive, was retained by the Irish society as an indivisible portion of the general property, and it has been so managed by the Irish society.

7424. Of whom are those townlands and fisheries considered to be the joint property?—They are considered to be the property of the Irish society itself.

7425. Is the Irish society part of the corporation of the City of London?—Yes, it is. It is elected from their body.

7426. In respect to their joint property, the Irish society do not act as trustees but as proprietors?—They act as proprietors, having solely in view public objects.

7427. And they are a body emanating from the corporation of the City of London?—They are.

7428. They are elected by the common council, are not they?—They are. But they claim to be altogether distinct from the corporation, and that the corporation has no power over them. I remember, during the year I held the office of deputy governor, that question was raised as to what power the corporation of London had over the Irish society. The question was referred to the law officers of the corporation, and they decided that, according to the charter, the corporation had no other than a visitorial power over the Irish society: that is, if they could be impeached of any breach of trust then the corporation of London in the character of visitor might step in and inquire into their management of their funds, but in no other way could the corporation interfere with the Irish society.

7429. What becomes of the funds of the Irish society?—The funds of the Irish society are mainly returned to Ireland in the shape of charitable benefactions,—the support of schools and charities, and bridges generally. The funds are returned by the Irish society in that shape.

7430. What becomes of any surplus after those expenses have been provided for?—During the time that I was connected with the Irish society, they were in debt; they had had a very expensive litigation. The Skinners' Company had an action against the Irish society for some portion of this which was termed indivisible property. This action had been carried from one court to another, and ultimately to the House of Lords, and in the course of that litigation a very large debt was incurred by the Irish society.

7431. Do you mean that there has never been any surplus upon this estate which is managed directly by the Irish society, so as to raise the question how it should be applied?—Not within my experience.

7432. Do you know whose property it would be as a matter of law?—I take it it would be in the disposition of the Irish society as now constituted under their charters.

7433. Do you mean that they have power to do what they like with it?—If they did anything contrary to the trust, they might be called to account for it.

7434. As I understand you, this is a valuable property managed by trustees. Do you mean that the whole income derived from this property is absorbed in the management, and that there is no surplus, and never has been?—The entire cost of the management of the Irish society is restricted to the sum of 600*l.* a year. The expenses in London are 600*l.* a year; besides that, they have a secretary to whom they pay 500*l.* a year, and a messenger and clerk.

7435. It appears that the receipts for the year 1852, including a balance of 1,556*l.* from the previous year, are 12,775*l.* The governor's salary I see is charged upon that amount, but the main expenditure seems to be for schools?—Schools and charitable purposes.

7436. There does not appear upon that account to be any surplus after those expenses have been defrayed?—I take it when the debt is paid off there will be a surplus.

7437. Would the Irish society apply the revenue to the benefit of the estate?—I take it that would be their course of action. They would apply it in improvements or in some other way for the benefit of the property.

7438. You do not consider it as the income of the Irish society, to be applied as they think fit?—Certainly not. They have a strong sense that they are acting as trustees under the strict regulations of the charter. The way in which the question as to the jurisdiction of the corporation was raised was, it was considered very undesirable that the members should be placed upon it for two years only, and it was thought that that term might be extended with advantage. Directly a member acquired a knowledge of the property and the particulars connected with it, he was removed. The question was raised in the Court of Common Council whether they had the power of interfering with the mode of management, so as to increase the duration of time of the members sitting upon it. It was referred to the law officers of the corporation to consider that question, and they decided that they had no power to deal with the constitution or management of the Irish society, excepting, in the capacity of visitors, that if any wrong were done they might step in and enquire into it.

7439. Has the Irish society any jurisdiction or control with regard to any matters in the boroughs of Coleraine and Londonderry?—Not except as owners of property there. They contribute a certain portion to the expense of the town council of Londonderry. Generally, when any necessities arise in that part of Ireland, the first persons applied to are the Irish society. I remember when I was one of the society the question arose as to the erection of a college for the education of the youth of that neighbourhood. The Irish society were applied to, and manifested a desire to give a large donation, and to give a yearly sum for the support of it.

7440. That is, just as an application would be made to any great landowner?—Yes.

7441. They have no peculiar power or jurisdiction given to them to interfere in municipal matters?—Not in the slightest degree.

7442. It is stated in a former report that, by letters patent of Charles II., of the 10th April 1662, power is given to the common council of Londonderry "to make byelaws for "the government of the estate, so as such laws be certified to the society in London within "four months after the making of them, and approved and confirmed by the said society, "within six months after delivery of the certificates," is that the practice now?—There may be that power; but, in my experience, it is one which has never been exercised. I do not remember that any byelaws have been submitted by the corporation of Londonderry for the approval of the society in London.

7443. Are they ever sent over, according to your experience?—In my experience nothing of the kind has happened. I know there is a payment made to the municipal authorities of Londonderry by the Irish society. When they required a supply of water to the city they applied to the Irish society and were assisted.

7444. In short, by your account, the Irish society would seem to have no beneficial interest in this estate?—None whatever.

7445. I find in the account of the Irish society which has been furnished to us, printed by the order of the court, an entry under October, 1736. "The society wrote a letter to "the corporation of Londonderry, whereby they required that the corporation should send "the society forthwith a transcript or transcripts of all their byelaws, statutes, ordinances, "and constitutions which had not theretofore been certified under their common seal, to the "end that they might receive the allowance or disapprobation of the society, as the charter "directed, and until that was done the society declared that they should be considered "invalid and of no use, force, or effect, and that no person or persons should be obliged or "ought to pay any obedience or conformity to them, or submit to any pains or penalties to "be inflicted by virtue or under colour of them." That seems to show that there is something in the charter requiring that the bye laws of the corporation of Londonderry should be confirmed by the Irish society?—Nothing occurred under that power while I was a member of the society.

7446. Are you aware whether any proposition has ever been considered for the sale of the property of the Irish society?—No proposition of that kind has come under my knowledge.

7447. It has never been considered by persons who have been concerned in the management of those estates, whether, on the whole, it would be more beneficial that the trusts should be put an end to, and that the property should be sold?—That is one of the last things which I think would enter into the conception of the Irish Society as it is constituted. They regard with some feelings of pride their management of that branch of their duty; as they consider it is a very creditable example that, in a country generally troubled and in a state of disorganization, that part which is under the Irish society and the companies of London presents a marked contrast to the state of that which is all around. I have witnessed that myself. When you get without the jurisdiction of the Irish society and the companies of London you find the condition of the property immediately adjoining presents a remarkable contrast. The one is well tilled, and presents a cheerful and flourishing aspect, the other presents an aspect totally the reverse, indicating poverty and neglect.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

2d Feb. 1854.

7448. Have you yourself ever been on the estates of the Irish society in the north of Ireland?—I have.

7449. You can bear witness to the contrast exhibited between the state of that property and the state of the neighbouring property?—I can.

7450. The difference being always in favour of the districts managed by the Irish society?—And the estates of the companies.

7451. Is there a distinct management of the estates of the companies and of that part of the property which is under the Irish society?—Yes.

7452. Supposing the Irish society were to neglect their duty as public officers, to whom would they be amenable?—I believe to the corporation of London; the corporation have a visitorial power.
